Mr. Donohoe: Surely my hon. Friend the Minister accepts that the quick build that occurred during the period that we are talking about, which is mainly the 1960s, resulted in poor architecture. That is why, some 30 years later, we are experiencing problems and the new towns are taking a big hit. No other towns have comparable problems. I challenge him to give an example from any part of the country of a town built in the 1960s that is not a new town.

Mr. McNulty: That is not the point. The comments about the quantity and obsolescence of an array of housing stock are well made—I am not trying to belittle the difficulties—but I can say the same about the mill towns of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. There is seriously low demand in pockets of the north, which is not to do with the fabric, but with social engineering.

Sadly for us all, much that was built in urban areas, especially in the 1960s, has crumbled. The school that I went to was very good, but I spent half my time in mobile units in the playground—the building was condemned because not enough concrete was used to build it. Yes, there are problems in urban areas and in some parts of, perhaps, every new town, but they are not crumbling, decaying wrecks from top to bottom in quite the way that some people would have it.

Mr. McWalter: Most Members accept that every community has major difficulties with renovation of infrastructure, but in any given decade most communities need perhaps 20 per cent. of their infrastructure to receive such renovation. It is unusual for a community to have to deal with a percentage much greater than that. Does my hon. Friend the Minister accept that the extraction of money from local authorities—£10 million from mine—through negative subsidy alone creates special problems and deprives areas of the resources to effect very necessary renovations?

Mr. McNulty: I recognise that there are special problems, not least in terms of volume and the fact that much decaying stock is coming on stream at the same time, but it is indicative that most new towns do not have the significant problems of low demand and abandonment that exist in some areas. I shall return to that when I deal with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright).

I do not mean to over-egg the pudding. It is not appropriate to undermine very real problems, but when we talk about new towns moving to normality, there is nothing sinister in it—that is exactly what they must do. When we talk about the democratic deficit and moving towards the framework of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, people ask, "What does that mean?" Precisely, it means overcoming the democratic deficit that people accept exists in other dimensions. I shall return to that issue.

Of course infrastructure is wearing out. The Radburn layout scheme was a complete travesty, and it was certainly not designed for its durability or on any notion of sustainability. This has been pointed out, and I shall return to it in a moment:

[Mr. McNulty]

> "The Government is not prepared to give up clawback or sales receipts in the New Towns as a general principle."

Fine. Members can refer to that if they want, but please will they quote it in the context of the next two sentences? They are:

> "We need to be sure that the investment the Government has made in the new towns is protected. As we explained . . . in some circumstances, and with the agreement of the Treasury, English Partnerships might waive clawback or transfer the right to receive clawback to the relevant local authority."

If the whole piece is quoted, it makes sense as a response, whether one agrees with it or not. If one simply quotes the first part, one cannot sustain an argument that it is dismissive.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: No, because I shall deal with what the hon. Gentleman was going to ask me in a moment. He will understand that when we get to it.

I am not downplaying some of the new towns' problems, nor the variety between and within new towns, but we could have a similar debate about seaside towns, market towns or the 88 inner-city ward areas. Those places have different problems of different magnitudes, but they are specialised and unique problems none the less.

The point has been made, which is fair in part, that, overwhelmingly, new towns do not receive neighbourhood renewal funding. One response to that is that if they are not in the 88 top wards, why should they receive such funding? The mechanism for distributing those funds uses the condition that an area has to have one of the 88 most deprived wards in the country, and if it does not, it does not get anything. I have significant pockets of deprivation in my constituency, but we do not get neighbourhood renewal money for the same reason—there is a quantum when compared with the overall borough authority.

However, a serious matter underlies that point, as my hon. Friend the Member for Telford said. Although the mechanisms and data did not necessarily exist for smaller-area remuneration districts the last time the index of multiple deprivation was looked at, the neighbourhood renewal unit has now engaged academics and researchers from Oxford university to review that situation. We are about halfway through that review, in which we are trying to capture an area beyond the ward—sub-ward and small-area level. That is problematic, and we are committed to addressing it. That could increase the availability of neighbourhood renewal funding for some new towns and other areas where there are distinct, but very deep, pockets of poverty which are not captured by the wider mechanism.

On setting up market renewal areas in the new towns, I suspect that I have no substantial good news. The pathfinders are quite deliberately focused on the most acute areas of widespread market failure, and, with the best will in the world, we cannot say that that is a significant feature of new towns. I know that Telford has the worst examples and manifestations of the problems affecting the new towns but, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) said, it is nothing like the east Lancashire pathfinder area, where housing problems, in all their forms, are writ large. The new towns do not have the emerging problems of Oldham and Rochdale, where I was on Tuesday, or some parts of Merseyside and South Yorkshire, where there are problems of low demand, abandonment and other complexities.

We will, however, be able to translate to the new towns, and other areas, the significant lessons that we learn from tackling the issues of low demand and abandonment in the nine pathfinder areas. That process happens in a range of our other programmes. We need to learn the lessons of new build in the 1960s in general, and of the new towns in particular, not least in terms of quality, design and density, and the problems with transport that have been mentioned. We should not repeat the mistakes in the growth areas.

Andrew Bennett: Does my hon. Friend accept that in some pathfinder areas where problems are pretty desperate, it may be necessary to put in nine stitches to turn the area round, but in places such as Telford, where market weakness is just starting, we may need to put in only one stitch to achieve that? We should make some effort now in places that are starting to suffer market weakness, rather than waiting until they are in the worst state.

Mr. McNulty: That is exactly what English Partnerships is doing in Woodside and the four other strategic sites that it will retain in Telford. We have made it clear that what is needed is good quality and design, not tinkering and the built-in obsolescence that resulted from a decade of bad design. EP has a positive and productive relationship with its colleagues in the three sites in Hemel Hempstead which will stay on the list of 34 strategic sites. Those good principles will also be followed in Skelmersdale town centre. I spent three years in Liverpool and had the pleasure of going to Skelmersdale once. I will say no more.

I say to my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire that English Partnerships has not, in its new role, acquired the power to buy land outside the new town areas. It has always had that power but it is now incorporated in its plans for new towns. My hon. Friend said that new towns needed to be finished off in the nicest way, but every community and town is a work in progress; it is never finished. The Mortimers did not foresee 12th-century Ludlow as a finished project; 21st-century Ludlow is ever so slightly different but it is still a work in progress. An end game was never intended for these communities. They may have come to the end of their useful life as representatives of the glorious new town movement, but they have moved on and are now substantial communities in their own right. They have moved to different phases and have to address their own problems.

As part of the process of restoring the democratic deficit, we have given the new town authorities and others significant funding to revitalise their planning functions. The planning delivery grant gave authorities such as Telford and Stevenage at least £75,000 for the coming year to improve their planning departments; Milton Keynes got £340,000, Hemel Hempstead £229,000, Harlow £181,000 and Basildon £208,000. We want to get the planning process up to speed, and we are putting our money where our mouth is.

We expect planning arrangements under the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 to become the norm, and we expect to move away from the anti-democratic elements in English Partnerships and the Commission for the New Towns. There is nothing sinister about that; we want to restore the democratic planning process in those areas, and rightly so.

Having responded to hon. Members, I will start my speech. I suspect that there will be no monument to me in a new town. Lewis Silkin, the post-war Minister for Town and Country Planning, shares one side of a monument in Stevenage because people were so happy about what was done.

David Wright: Telford has a Silkin way.

Mr. McNulty: I am pleased to hear it. When Lewis Silkin visited Stevenage before it was expanded, people repainted a sign at the railway station to read "Silkingrad". That was not a 13th-century Stalinist, but there was an allusion to Stalin, none the less.

Andrew Bennett: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a chance that 17 new town shopping centres will be named after him if he comes up with the money?

Mr. McNulty: I am not sure that I want that to be my epitaph—not yet, anyway.

Fifty years after the start of the process, the challenge is for new towns to move into the next phase of the work in progress. The report is useful, and I urge hon. Members to take our response and all that has happened since its publication as a comprehensive reply. We need to heal the parts of some new towns that are showing their age and, when appropriate, find ways of ensuring that new towns play their part in meeting today's housing needs through sustainable growth.

As we tackle both issues, we must keep at the forefront of our minds the fact that sustainable communities are about more than just rebuilding the fabric of housing. As hon. Members have commented, communities need strong economies full of opportunities, jobs with a long-term future, and good schools, hospitals and public transport. I accept the point made about transport in some communities, and many authorities have submitted their transport plans and are already starting to redesign local transport schemes with an eye on the 21st century rather than the 1960s. Communities also need a safe and healthy local environment, well-designed neighbourhoods, more sustainable construction and much more.

There are specific difficulties with our new towns, but many themes are common to all our communities. Our policies for new towns must be seen in the context of our overall action plan for sustainable communities, which is flexible according to the needs of local areas and regions but comprehensive enough to deal with the big issues that confront us today. Although we are alive to the needs and opportunities facing the new towns, we need to deal with those challenges within the approach outlined in our sustainable communities plan.

Putting new towns in a policy isolation tent will not help them. It is much better to integrate them into mainstream housing regeneration and planning, so that they can benefit from our comprehensive approach and other communities can more readily learn the lessons of new towns. As some hon. Members have said, we may be talking about newer new towns for the Thames gateway, but serious thought needs to be given to how that growth area and others will expand to meet the needs of the south-east.

I want to mention the key aspect of the Government's approach which was not fully developed when we made our response to the report; I refer to the role of English Partnerships. Other hon. Members have mentioned that, for which I am grateful. EP is a key player in delivering the Deputy Prime Minister's new agenda, and it has a significant and pro-active role to play in co-ordinating the delivery of plans for key-worker and affordable housing.

English Partnerships is not only about housing; it is at the core of our work to create balanced communities. We can point to the Telford and Milton Keynes millennium communities, the Telford sustainable extension at Lawley and the Northampton south-west district. I have no time to go into them, but they represent progress made by EP and many new towns since the quinquennial review of 24 July. I am grateful to every hon. Member who has said that the relationship with EP before and since the review has been productive and positive, because that is what has been fed back to me.

We have an excellent new dynamic team at English Partnerships which, under Margaret Ford's chairmanship, works with new town authorities on an individual basis to ensure proper dialogue. People can still throw rocks and call it a quango, but it is working effectively with the democratic leadership in each area. I make no excuse for telling EP to focus on 42 strategic sites and projects as the key to its role. As hon. Members will know, 34 of those are in new towns, and a variety of schemes are included to enhance the vitality and sustainability of the new towns. They include work on Skelmersdale town centre, a range of schemes in Milton Keynes, Spencers park, Paradise fields, Brakespear in Hemel Hempstead, and the town centre, Woodside, Lightmoor, East Ketley millennium community and Lawley in Telford.

Equally important is EP's role in improving the quality of ageing housing estates, such as Woodside in Telford, Five Links in Basildon and Castlefields in Runcorn. Those are all under the auspices and tutelage of EP and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. McNulty: I shall give way briefly, although the request is cheeky, as my hon. Friend has only just arrived.

Mr. Hall: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. He just mentioned Castlefields, in my constituency, and that is why I got to my feet. We are delighted with the co-operation that we have with English Partnerships in redeveloping the Castlefields site, and we look forward to wonderful things taking place there. However, to ensure that the site is properly regenerated, we might need to discuss clawback with the Department so that we can reinvest the money in the Castlefields area.

Mr. McNulty: I look forward to those discussions, and to visiting Weaver Vale, as I have been promising to do for the past three months. I shall still visit, despite my hon. Friend's contribution to the debate.

English Partnerships has held very constructive discussions with the new town local authorities. It knows from that experience that each new town is different, and that the package of non-strategic assets and liabilities varies from town to town. Consequently, today I am pleased to announce that English Partnerships has been given discretion by the Deputy Prime Minister to transfer balanced packages of non-strategic landholdings and assets to the local authorities.

We shall, in some cases, have to take some of the financial issues to the Treasury, and we will also need to ensure that such transfers will cause no detriment to the delivery of our plans for sustainable communities. However, I am assured by English Partnerships that we will get more than merely words, and it will actively seek to waive clawback and transfer the right to receive clawback to the relevant local authority. Those matters are being examined in some detail.

Mr. Hammond rose—

Mr. McNulty: Now the hon. Gentleman will ask me about clause 11 of the Local Government Bill, which is why I would not give way to him earlier.

Mr. Hammond: I shall let the Minister answer the question about the interaction of transfer of clawback rights to local authorities or waiver of clawback and clause 11 of the Local Government Bill.

Mr. McNulty: The simple answer to that, which is not intended to be facetious, is that I will not comment on legislation that is currently under consideration, albeit from my Department. I do not want to pre-empt the democratic process and what Parliament will have done with the Bill by the time it emerges from that process.

I am assured that the discussions with the Treasury are taking place in the context of clause 11, and that the ability to waive clawback remains. Unlike the hon. Gentleman, I do not live or die by the daily events and proceedings on the Local Government Bill, so if that proves not to be the case, I will write to him to let him know. However, I am fairly sure that the ability to waive clawback and to pass on the receipts to a local authority rather than to English Partnerships remains outwith clause 11. If that is not the case, I will get back to him.

Mr. Hammond: I am sure that the Minister is right that that is outwith the provisions of clause 11, which deal with local authority sales and the Secretary of State's right to take 75 per cent. of those right-to-buy receipts. However, it seems odd that, on the one hand, the Government say that all local authorities must pass to the Secretary of State 75 per cent. of what they receive, and on the other hand, the Minister is saying that English Partnerships may be empowered to waive that right with respect to certain new town authorities. However, I am grateful to him for offering to write to me.

Mr. McNulty: On that point, as the hon. Gentleman has suggested, there was the unique position of a significant public sector quango—the Commission on the New Towns as was, and English Partnerships as is—having significant landholdings. The quinquennial review said that there are 42 strategic sites—town centres and others—that are crucial to what the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister wants to achieve in its policy framework and the detail of the sustainable communities plan. There is a range of other non-strategic balanced packages of sites that we will—now that the Deputy Prime Minister has signed that off—co-operate with the new town authorities to put back where they should be, with those authorities. I am not, of course, saying that the Deputy Prime Minister has signed a bit of paper and overnight all those assets will revert to the new town authorities, because there must be significant negotiations to unpick all the complexities of ownership that colleagues talked about earlier.

It is a Welsh example, but in Cwmbran, where work to identify all non-strategic assets and liabilities is virtually complete, English Partnerships has no interests suitable for development. The clawback and covenants in relation to community buildings, highway subsoil and miscellaneous open space come to 120 hectares in 20 different sets of legal documents. The local authority sees clawback as an impediment to local regeneration and for 10 years next to nothing has happened. Our proposals would transfer responsibility for all that to the local authority, enabling it to get on with regenerating key areas of the town. The distinction is between receipts for local authorities that are cash windfalls, where 75 per cent. may go back to central Government, and new town clawback, where the receipts will be for reinvestment in new town regeneration. That is part of the answer, but I will still write to the hon. Gentleman with the full answer.

New towns will sit in the vision and strategy that is outlined in the document "Sustainable Communities: Building for the Future". They have a strong role to play in achieving those numbers for growth in London, the south-east and the east. As the Government response says, and as my hon. Friends have mentioned, despite the poor quality of design in some areas and the degradation of some of the public infrastructure and the transport difficulties—issues that are recognised and are being resolved in one form or other—there is still scope to add to many of the new towns in London, the south-east and the east. There is serious need in those communities and beyond for affordable housing and key worker housing.

We are currently a year or so into the starter home initiative, which partly addresses the issues of key workers. Our target is 10,000 starter homes, which we will achieve, and we have reached 2,000 so far. Some 400 of those are in the southern new towns: 400 key workers are now housed because of the starter home initiative. As I said about pathfinder areas, there must be lessons that we can learn from the low demand in those key areas at their worst. People may describe Corby town centre as third world. I have just come back from Delhi, and if it was anything like Delhi I would go there. I loved Delhi. I thought that it was wonderful. The urban regeneration company just launched in Corby has shown wisdom and has an enormously creative and imaginative vision for Corby's future. It has elaborate plans to double the size of the community over the next 30 years. I know that that is what all the new towns will want for their future.

Andrew Bennett: Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that the Select Committee had an impressive presentation from people in Corby about what they would like to do? All they want is a bit of railway from Corby to the mainline so that they can attract people from the rest of the south-east to increase the critical mass of Corby. If he could say yes to that he would be a hero in Corby—

Mr. Donohoe: And he would get a statue.

Mr. McNulty: Perhaps unsurprisingly, I will resist that temptation. As my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Phil Hope) is the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister, I know Corby. I know that those concerns are there. It is also part of one of our growth areas in that key south midlands corridor. The urban development corporation's vision and how that fits in with the overall growth area is quite lively and creative stuff. Whether Corby gets its railway line is a matter for others with far more power than I have.

There are strong examples across the piece of the new towns coming to terms with the next phase of their existence. Yes, with help and support, but with help and support through our main programmes. Their problems are recognised—some are shared or similar and some are unique. What we have done with English Partnerships and the way in which it has come up to speed so soon after the outcome of the review is a tribute to Margaret Ford and her leadership. All the reports stress a professional commitment to creativity and imagination by the new town authorities and by English Partnerships to get to grips with the serious issues that hon. Members have outlined. I repeat that the new towns have been well served by the Committee and its report. I was very pleased, not least because I was only four weeks into my new job, to appear before the Committee. It was enormous fun. I do not know whether enjoying an hour before a Select Committee makes me a sick person, but it was an education.

As I said to hon. Members in my opening statement, one cannot be a Harrow boy without knowing in some detail all the new towns, and especially those in Hertfordshire, dotted around Watford. Those northern towns, as I used to think of them, are part and parcel of the fun and creativity of growing up in north-west London. I accept now that Welwyn, Stevenage and Hemel Hempstead are not northern towns in the generally accepted sense. New towns are at the heart of our approach. Everything that we do in the sustainable communities document will benefit the new towns.

If I let hon. Members go at 5.28 they will not be saying, "That rotten person kept us here until 5.30."

I am also, among other things, the design champion for the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I am responsible for parks and green spaces and other aspects of the public realm that are crucial to the sustainability of our communities. Whether in growth areas, low-demand areas or in reconfiguring and revitalising our new towns, we must learn that the spaces between buildings are important. The public realm in the widest sense is important. These are lessons that the designers of new towns did not take into account. When designing a new town, we must plan out crime not plan it in. We must appreciate that people must live in these towns and walk around them.

Grass verges and public parks are not fripperies: they are central to the vitality of our communities. That is why it is such a pleasure to know that the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment is working closely with Telford on Woodside. We can revitalise all our communities, not least our new towns, by learning the lessons of the past and by insisting that, whether it is dealing with greater numbers in the south or reconfiguring some of our low-demand communities in the north, high quality and good design are not add-ons. We should not adopt an attitude of "Build 'em cheap and build 'em high," so that buildings collapse in 10 or 20 years' time. They must be rooted at the core of everything that we do—public sector, social sector and private sector.

Design and high quality permeate the sustainable communities document, and rightly so, as does the notion that the public realm is vital in those areas.

Mr. McWalter: Will my hon. Friend accept the point made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) that the top design teams simply do not make themselves available to towns as they do to cities?

Mr. McNulty: I accept my hon. Friend's point. That is why I am so pleased that CABE is working with Telford in Woodside, and I encourage that elsewhere. I want to see good, high-quality designers helping us to reconfigure and refocus our low-demand areas. It is quite wrong to characterise our approach to low-demand areas as one of bulldozing empty houses. If that were all that low-demand areas offered, their plans would not be accepted. Plans must accept fully that good design and good quality in the public realm and in public open spaces are crucial. We must ensure that designers are attracted to low-demand areas as well as to growth areas and to new towns. That is fundamental.

We should celebrate the new towns. We are not finishing them off, but they have perhaps come to the end of one phase. We must ensure that, with all other urban communities, they march into the next phase in the context of the sustainable communities document. They must have their needs served as readily and as comprehensively as all other communities.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Five o' clock.

Civil Defence

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Charlotte Atkins.]

9.30 am

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): Since the end of the second world war, except during the early years of the cold war, civil defence has been regarded by successive governments as a Cinderella policy issue, perhaps more so since the Berlin wall came down. Emphatically, that must change, and it must change with dramatic speed and intensity and with resources to match.

Throughout the whole of the cold war, even when a nuclear threat hung over the people of this country, I do not recall a single senior politician or security person saying that they considered that an attack with mass fatalities was inevitable. It is a very different situation today. Last year, the Director of Europol said that it was no longer a question of whether there would be a terrorist attack in Europe but, simply, a question of when. In a recent interview on the BBC's "Breakfast with Frost" programme, Sir John Stevens, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, was asked whether he thought that a terrorist attack on the UK was inevitable. He replied:

> "I am afraid I think it probably is, but that doesn't mean we aren't doing all we can to prevent it."

In a meeting of the Liaison Committee on 21 January, the Prime Minister was asked by the right hon. Member for Swansea, East (Donald Anderson) whether he believed > "that an al-Qaeda attack on the United Kingdom is inevitable?"

The Prime Minister replied:

> "I believe it is inevitable that they will try in some form or other."

In the immediate aftermath of the 11 September attack, the Prime Minister gave the starkest warning as to the forms that an al-Qaeda attack might take. He said in the House on 14 September 2001:

> "We know that these groups are fanatics, capable of killing without discrimination. The limits on the numbers that they kill and their methods of killing are not governed by any sense of morality. The limits are only practical and technical. We know that they would, if they could, go further and use chemical, biological, or even nuclear weapons of mass destruction."—[Official Report, 14 September 2001; Vol. 372, c. 606.]

I do not for a moment suggest that the Government have been inactive on civil defence, but I seriously question whether their priorities are right and whether they have acted with sufficient intensity. Undoubtedly, they have been preparing for the worst case, which is their responsibility. We read in the newspapers that body bags are being stockpiled. The Sunday Times of 17 November stated:

> "Officials involved have revealed that planners are considering the extreme case of hundreds of thousands of deaths being caused by a biological attack involving plague or smallpox."

The same article reported the establishment of a United Kingdom mass fatalities working group and the creation of a strategic disaster mortuaries working group for London, with consideration being given to mobile and modular mortuaries and with the possibility of RAF Northolt being designated to provide, in the delicate phrase of The Sunday Times, an "overflow capacity".

I do not criticise the Government for preparing for mass deaths; that is their unmistakable responsibility and duty. However, I am interested to know what the Government are doing to engage in mass life-saving, if the worst should happen and, in particular, if there is a terrorist attack on the UK involving weapons of mass destruction. I spent four years at the Ministry of Defence and in my experience the military have a particularly accurate way of coining terms of remarkable brutality. I read in another press article that, as a result of their planning and the exercises carried out to prepare for a biological attack on the UK, the armed forces will divide the luckless civilians caught in the vicinity of an attack into three categories: walkers, floppers and goners. Little prospect of survival is held out for the floppers and goners.

I, like any number of Members of Parliament with constituencies in London or its vicinity, have countless thousands of constituents who travel into the city each day in the confident expectation that they will return safely at night to their families. I, for one, want to be satisfied—in detail and by the Government—that should my constituents should be so unfortunate as to find themselves in the wrong place at the wrong time when the worst happens, they will not be consigned to the ranks of the floppers and goners and doomed to die.

There are four issues relating to life-saving that I want to raise with the Minister. First, there is the issue of resources and money. The most successful civil defence is a civil defence plan that never has to be employed for real, and that means prevention. Preventing terrorism is linked to a very simple, even primitive, equation: either we get the terrorists first, or they get us. From my time in Northern Ireland, I remember the resources that are required to put just one person under 24-hour, seven-day-a-week surveillance. How many suspects or potential suspects are there in the UK who may represent al-Qaeda secreted cells? Is it hundreds, thousands or tens of thousands? Are there perhaps over 100,000 people who need to be found and eliminated as potential suspects?

Yesterday in the House, we debated an Intelligence and Security Committee special report on Bali. I very much welcome the fact that the Committee produced the report in quick time. I hope that, right now, the Committee is examining other matters equally quickly and will also be making a special report to the House, as fast as possible, on whether the resources being made available to the intelligence services, the anti-terrorist branch and special branches up and down the country are adequate to the task of finding the terrorist cells that are undoubtedly still secreted in this country.

I have said in the House that, in dealing with terrorism, intelligence is the first, and probably the last, line of defence. In the judgment of those in a position to know, such as the Prime Minister and the head of the Metropolitan police, an attack on the United Kingdom is inevitable. That could result in loss of life far greater than that on 11 September, and I say to the Government that resources must be provided to the intelligence services, the police and the anti-terrorist branch to enable them to do the job that they have to do, while there is still time.

My second life-saving issue is the Government structure for effective counter-terrorism and civil defence. The Home Secretary is the Cabinet Minister in the lead, but does he have sufficient authority to deal with all the other Departments whose co-operation and involvement in civil defence is essential? Is he in a position to take an effective lead in, and charge of, the whole of civil defence planning, preparation and organisation in this country? I doubt it. At least six separate Departments and Cabinet Ministers are involved, including the Cabinet Office and the Prime Minister. It might be of passing interest to the Chamber to know that when this debate was announced, the first Government Department to get on to my office to ask what I was going to say was not the Home Office but the Cabinet Office. The Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are involved, as is the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, which has responsibilities for the regions and local authorities. The Department of Health and the Department for Transport are involved, as are the devolved Administrations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

I may be wrong, but it appears to me that the structure that we have leaves a great deal to be desired if we are to have truly effective and authoritative civil defence planning and organisation in this country. I am not necessarily advocating that we go down the same route as the United States and create a separate Government Department to deal with the issue, although I have been briefed in the United States on its new Department of Homeland Security and I believe that it will prove a very effective answer to that country's civil defence needs. I ask the Government, and the Prime Minister in particular, to consider one fundamental question. If the worst should happen and there were a terrorist attack on this country involving mass civilian casualties, would the civil defence governmental structure in place today continue unchanged? If the answer is emphatically no, and it would be changed radically, then I put it to the Government and the Prime Minister that that change should be made now, before that loss of life occurs.

My third life-saving issue is the need to ensure that emergency personnel are put in the very best position to provide their life-saving services if the worst should happen. I welcome the Home Secretary's announcement yesterday that there will be a major civil defence exercise on the ground in London. It is high time—18 months after 11 September. That exercise should surely have taken place already, and there should be such exercises in other cities and local authorities up and down the country.

I am aware from what I have read in the press that there have been many exercises in COBRA. I spent many happy hours in COBRA as Minister for the Armed Forces, and as the security Minister of State in Northern Ireland. I do not suggest that COBRA exercises are without value, but that value is limited. They are command and control and communications exercises. The only way to get real value is through undertaking exercises on the ground.

The basic principle of exercises is, and has always been, that the closer that one can approximate the exercise to reality, the greater the value of the exercise. In that case, as elsewhere, the United States is well ahead of us. A few months ago, in my hotel room in the United States, I turned on the television and saw a full-scale exercise taking place in the local county based on a simulated anthrax attack. It was played out on the ground, in the streets and throughout the county. At the end, the emergency chiefs were interviewed on television about the lessons learned. One wonders whether any such thing could happen on television in the UK. Mercifully, the United States is a more open society.

One lesson learned, for example, was that the anthrax antibiotic was available only in bulk and that vital life-saving time would be lost in breaking it down into small amounts that could be quickly and easily made available to victims of the attack. I put it to the Minister that one learns such lessons only by means of exercises on the ground.

There is plenty of evidence for thinking that the level of exercises is seriously inadequate in the UK. Last November, the National Audit Office produced a report that examined the preparedness of health authorities. The report demonstrated that one third of health authorities had not tested their plans under the category:

> "Testing of plans—chemical, biological and mass casualty incidents".

When it came to the testing of plans for radiological or nuclear incidents, four fifths of the health authorities had not tested their plans. Only last night, on the BBC television news, Professor Michael Clarke of King's college, London said that at the local health authority level the lack of preparedness was as shambolic as it was two years ago.

I hope that hon. Members will make inquiries in their constituencies about the exercises that have been carried out by emergency services and accident and emergency departments in their areas. They should make the results of their inquiries known to the Minister. There needs to be a dramatic improvement in the level of exercising and training of the emergency personnel on whom the lives of those who may be caught up in a terrorist attack will ultimately depend.

The final issue in my saving of life agenda is the adequacy of the medical treatment policy that the Government are adopting, with reference to an attack with weapons of mass destruction on the United Kingdom. I warmly welcome the decision of the Science and Technology Committee under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) to conduct an inquiry into the scientific response to the terrorist threat. As I have said personally to the hon. Gentleman, the inquiry being carried out by his Committee is the single most important Select Committee inquiry being carried out in this House, and

I say that as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. I hope that that Committee will make all possible speed with its inquiry and will make the earliest possible report, or series of reports, to the House. I hope that it will cover in its report the medical and scientific response to nuclear and radiological attack, toxic chemical attack and biological attack.

The most urgent medical policy issue is protection of the public against a smallpox attack. It is of the utmost urgency for evident reasons. It is the area where there is the greatest potential to save life because a vaccine is available. In the United States recently, I received a confidential briefing on its worst-case scenario of a smallpox attack in the United States. The results were horrific. I am not able to disclose the details, but I shall refer to one assumption that is common and accepted medical knowledge. In the event of a smallpox attack, every person infected with smallpox is likely to infect a further 10. Smallpox will spread like wildfire, and, as we know, its consequences are normally fatal unless vaccination can be provided.

I, like other hon. Members, was interested to hear the person who was described as a senior Government adviser being interviewed on the "Today" programme yesterday. Sadly, owing to the culture of fear that seems to exist in the public sector, he had to remain anonymous because he expressed views that were critical of the Government's policy. He had grave doubts about the adequacy of the Government's policy for dealing with a smallpox attack; indeed, he said that the Departments involved were displaying a lethargic approach to this vital issue.

There is no doubt that the position that the British Government are taking is different from that of others. In the United States and in France, the Governments have already announced that they will procure sufficient smallpox vaccine to vaccinate the entire population. In the UK, the Government treat as confidential how much vaccine is being procured for reasons that I wholly fail to understand or conceive to be justified. The Government have indicated that the amount of vaccine being procured is less than one per head of population in the UK, which is an extraordinary decision given that in the event of a smallpox attack people are likely to disperse and carry the infection with them. They could disperse to any part of the United Kingdom, even to some of the remote islands in Scotland.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the culture of secrecy owes a lot to the cold war, and that the Government ought to grow up? As he rightly implied, the United States has a far more open approach to this kind of thing. Although it is important for security reasons to keep things under wraps when facing down an aggressor such as the Soviet Union, that does not apply, in particular in reference to our preparations for biological attack, to terrorist organisations.

Sir John Stanley: I agree with my hon. Friend. I see no security reason why information should not be disclosed. It is information that the public, whose lives are at risk, are entitled to have.

The all-important computer programme—which is crucial for the emergency services—to simulate how smallpox would spread in the United States is available and up and running. The Government's anonymous senior adviser told us yesterday that that computer programme had still not been completed and was not available for exercises by the emergency planning authorities here.

Lastly—this is not inconsequential—the United States President has, rightly, gone public and said that he will have a smallpox vaccination. In this country, the Prime Minister considers the information about whether he will take that precaution to be highly classified, and No. 10 yesterday made the ludicrous suggestion that it is a personal matter for the Prime Minister. It is a matter of utmost public importance and interest to know whether the Prime Minister is taking all necessary steps to ensure his survival in the event of a smallpox attack. He should have a smallpox jab, but the Government are inhibited because they think that if people know that the Prime Minister has been vaccinated, millions of them will ask why they cannot also be vaccinated. That is a reasonable question for people to ask and the Government should answer it.

Dr. Murrison: Does my right hon. Friend agree that after the MMR debacle, the Prime Minister might be forgiven for being queasy about getting involved with jabs?

Sir John Stanley: I take my hon. Friend's point, but this is a different issue. The Prime Minister should ensure that he is able to survive a smallpox attack.

I hope that the Government are prepared to take on a public debate—I welcome the fact that it has started in the media—on what their policy should be on preventive smallpox vaccination.

On the "Today" programme yesterday two different views were expressed. Professor Alastair Geddes of the Public Health Laboratory said that the advantages of preventive smallpox vaccination of the civilian population outweighed the disadvantages. We also heard the reported views of the chief medical officer that such vaccination is unnecessary and that the Government's policy of waiting until a smallpox attack has happened and then following a programme of ring vaccination would suffice. I question that view. Ring vaccination is uncomfortably redolent of the foot and mouth fiasco and I hope that the Government are not assuming that British civilians caught up in a smallpox attack would conduct themselves in the same way as cattle and meekly stand around waiting to see whether they are culled by smallpox.

There is no doubt in my mind that if such an attack took place, people would do everything possible to break out of the cordons, whatever the so-called quarantine cordons that the Government intend to erect, surrounded by police and armed servicemen apparently equipped with baton rounds. There will be infected people among those who escape, and the infection will spread to all parts of the United Kingdom. Against that background, it is incumbent on the Government to consider very seriously the possibility of enabling the people of this country to have smallpox vaccinations on a voluntary basis.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): On the question of the Prime Minister, but going beyond him as an individual, may I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the Home Secretary's words in the House of Commons yesterday? He said:

> "Given that politicians are not held in high esteem and trust is not readily given, politicians, including me, will not seek vaccination against smallpox unless the vaccine is made generally available to the population."—[Official Report, 3 March 2003; Vol. 400, c. 591.]

Does my right hon. Friend agree that although that might explain Government policy, it clearly implies that the vaccine is not to be made available to the population?

Sir John Stanley: That was the policy view expressed on behalf of the Government by their chief medical officer on the "Today" programme yesterday. That policy should be subject to detailed scrutiny. I question it strongly, and I hope that it will be one of the issues immediately dealt with by the Science and Technology Committee, and the subject of a report to the House.

On all the evidence available, the UK civilian population is at more serious risk of large-scale fatalities than at any time since the end of the second world war, including the worst period of threat to this country from the IRA. Civil defence should be at the very top of the Government's agenda. It should be on the desk not only of the Home Secretary but of the Prime Minister, and it should be on his desk repeatedly. I fear, however, that civil defence in this country is still under-resourced, under-prepared and under-led. I urge the Government to ensure, with the utmost immediacy, that civil defence has the resources, the preparedness and the leadership required before for some—perhaps a horrendous number—it is simply too late.

10.2 am

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury): I am surprised by the relatively poor attendance at this debate. I think that our constituents are most exercised by this issue, and I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) on bringing it to the attention of the House.

The Library has put together an interesting collection of newspaper clippings which reflects the importance of the subject to the fourth estate and the people whom we represent. I shall touch on one or two important issues, and I draw the Chamber's attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. I am a reservist and could therefore be involved in the contingencies that the Government may put in place to deal with a terrorist attack on this country.

When I was serving, I came across some interesting characters called emergency planning officers. They are usually middle-grade ex-servicemen, tasked by local authorities with drawing up plans for emergencies in their localities. It is probably true to say that at that time, they were grossly under-resourced and usually a bolt-on added extra—put away by local authorities in a side room until they came out for their yearly exercise, if that. I remember thinking that the sector needed to be developed and properly resourced. In my area, the south coast of England, they were perhaps better resourced than they otherwise would have been because of the close proximity of the military and the problems that could arise from a nuclear accident. I suspect that, across the country, those resources were even thinner than those that I experienced in the south of England.

In recent weeks, we have seen the Government give a little more attention to emergency planning, which I welcome. However, I am left wondering whether it is too little too late and whether we need a culture change, similar to the one that the Americans have had, to protect our civil population.

I was recently in correspondence with a hospital in the south of England, which wishes to remain anonymous, in which we discussed the preparations that it had made for the possibility of a terrorist attack. It is probably true to say that any preparations were centrally driven, and I shall be interested to hear the Minister's comments on what direction has been given to health authorities to protect their people and to assist the civil population for which trusts are responsible in the event of an attack.

From what I was told, it seems that provision is fairly inadequate and, in particular, the protective suits with which personnel in the casualty department have been provided are second rate and liable to fall apart with minimal usage. Inadequate thought has been given centrally to what NHS trusts may need in the event of an attack. I fully appreciate that the Minister is not directly responsible for that, and I shall go on to explain why we may need an overarching method of pulling together the various strands to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling referred. I would appreciate some comment from the Minister on the preparedness of the NHS to deal with the issues that we have been discussing.

A chemical attack on the population of this country would be tragically and devastatingly obvious. An attack with biological agents would not be so obvious because there is an incubation period and it would take considerable time for the ill effects to become apparent. There are ways of detecting agents before they become clinically apparent, so it would be interesting to hear from the Minister what preparation he has made for early warning of the presence in the atmosphere of novel biological agents.

We shall rely in general on a pick-up by general practitioners and epidemiologists, so the problem will be one for public health. It would be useful to know and to be assured that everything is being done to pick up cases early. If we could do that, it would, as the chief medical officer said, be possible to vaccinate exposed populations and provide prophylactic antibiotics, which would reduce the toll.

It would be wrong of me to pre-empt the forthcoming report from the Select Committee on Science and Technology on the scientific response to terrorism, but it is probably true that the creation of a department for homeland defence is one of the topics that will be discussed. The United States, in its inimitable fashion, has pre-empted us and created such a department. It clearly feels that the threat to its population justifies that. It will be interesting to hear whether we shall proceed down that route. The problem is multi-departmental, and I have every sympathy for the Minister having to come here to discuss the issue, when he is probably ill placed to speak on behalf of the multifarious Departments that touch on civil defence.

There is a danger that Departments will pull in different directions without co-ordination, and in this situation, that is precisely what is not required.

We are told that our reserve forces have embarked on something called a civil contingencies reaction force that will augment civil powers in the event of an attack on this country by a terrorist organisation. We know little about that, so it would be useful if the Minister gave us a few words of wisdom on the subject. How will the force be constituted? What will be its size and its functions, and, crucially, what training will it receive? It would be useful to know, for example, whether it will take part in the exercise planned for London in a few days.

That exercise will be a worthwhile use of our reserve forces. We hear that members of the reserve forces are having difficulties with the concept of an attack on Iraq. Such an attack is not homeland defence, nor is it territorial in the usual sense of the word, and a homeland task would be more in tune with the usual tasks of the Territorial Army. It would be useful if the Minister explained the function that he anticipates for the civil contingencies reaction force. Will he reassure us that no one in the reserve forces will be asked to carry out tasks for which they are not adequately trained?

10.10 am

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): I thank the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) for introducing the debate, and speaking authoritatively and clearly on what he sees as the priorities.

I was reflecting on how much the issue had become the subject of public discussion in a way that we could not have anticipated two years ago. The right hon. Gentleman made that point very well. Five or 10 years ago, civil defence and emergency planning was seen mainly as a response to unusual meteorological events, such as floods, hurricanes and drought. The people involved in civil defence were regarded as minor players. They were regarded as Cinderellas, and not taken seriously. They were perceived as a dad's army adjunct that existed in shadowy form giving a few drugs to a few people that one did not need to know much about.

As the right hon. Gentleman rightly said, things have changed fundamentally. It is important that Parliament ensures that the country puts a structure in place as quickly as possible to respond to the sorts of attack that are possible today that were not possible 50 years ago.

This is the third recent debate on the subject of which I am aware. A debate on emergency planning was initiated in the House of Lords by my noble friend Lord Roper on 4 December. Lord Filkin provided a response on behalf of the Home Office. On 12 February, a debate was initiated in this House by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake), who had a particular interest and concern about transport security. That debate was answered by the Minister of State, Cabinet Office. During today's debate, a Home Office Minister is present. I am happy that he is here, but it reflects the fact that the Government are still undergoing a journey of development on accountability. Of course, the issue cuts across a range of departmental responsibilities. I accept that the Home Secretary has principal Government responsibility on the matter and the Government have made that clear, but there is still some uncertainty about who fits in where.

I do not want to repeat things said by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling; I want to add two or three matters of concern. I speak as a London Member of Parliament, and one in a team of people in my party who shadow the Home Office. I declare a third interest. My hat is in the ring for our party's selection for mayoral candidate. Later this week, I may have that additional responsibility. In that capacity, I will be ready and willing to participate in the debate about such issues.

Yesterday's written statement by the Home Secretary was welcome, but I was surprised that it was not an oral statement. The statement is significant, and because it was so important there were references to it, and the Home Secretary commented on it, in the debate about the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 (Continuance in force of sections 21 to 23) Order 2003, which is a linked but separate issue. There would have been considerable interest in an oral statement. I know that there will be other opportunities, but I ask the Minister of State to take back to the Home Secretary a request that such a statement be the basis of an early opportunity to question the Home Secretary and Ministers, and to have on the Government Front Bench other available Ministers as well.

Sir John Stanley: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it was particularly regrettable that there was no oral statement, not merely in view of the importance of the issue and the large number of right hon. and hon. Members who might have wished to put questions to the Home Secretary on it, but as the business of the House finished early last night and there was, therefore, no shortage of time yesterday for an oral statement?

Simon Hughes: That is certainly true. As somebody who participated in the first of the debates, I reflected that it would have been sensible and logical to take the three issues together. We had the anti-terrorism renewal order debate and the debate on the Intelligence and Security Committee's report on the Bali bombings. The logic would have been to take this debate with those. I regret that that was not done. It means that we have not had an opportunity to probe important issues, some of which have been raised today.

In addition to the points made by the right hon. Gentleman, I want first to mention the question of resources. I have not done the arithmetic, but I am reliably informed by colleagues who have, including my hon. Friends the Members for Bath (Mr. Foster) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey), that local authorities' budgets for the coming year do not show an increase in real terms for civil defence and emergency planning. If that is the case, it is extraordinary, given the extra demand for those matters and interest in them and the extra expectations that will be placed on them. We must be clear, and the public must be clear, how much money in the national budget is allocated to those matters, how much is in the regional budgets—London is an obvious example, because the Greater London authority has responsibility for these matters, among others—and what the local budget is? Our constituents would be reassured to know that money was allocated for these matters and would be properly deployed and spent. There would not be any criticism if money were raised and spent on that area of public protection.

[Simon Hughes]

In that context, I ask the Minister formally to give me an answer today to the proposal that I put to the Minister of State in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister who has responsibility for London planning and chairs the Cabinet Sub-Committee. I asked whether, not just in London but throughout the country, people could receive with the mailing that is about to go through their letterboxes, containing their local government precept, charges and information, the maximum information about what they should do if there is an emergency and a civil response is needed.

On one key issue I reflect the point made by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling about the fact that ours is a secretive society compared with, say, the United States. The public are asked to go to all sorts of different places to find different pieces of information. The more central the location of the information and the more clearly the public can be pointed towards it, the better. To his credit, the Minister of State said that he would reflect on that idea, which he thought was a good one. I had the impression that public dissemination of that kind might be made through the letterboxes in the next few weeks.

Dr. Murrison: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman says, particularly about the simplicity of including that information in mailshots that are going out anyway. However, does he not agree that it is important to do a risk assessment first, particularly as people may be alarmed by the material? We should perhaps target the advice on conurbations, where the risk is larger, and spare people in parts of the country where the risk is low from receiving what might be quite disturbing information.

Simon Hughes: I understand that. It is a difficult judgment. I think that the best advice can be given by those elected to represent people in the local authorities and areas in question—the leaders of the local authorities and Members of Parliament. Different types of information may be given. I am not arguing that the only place where people can look for information is in a brown envelope that comes with their council tax bill, but that seems a way of giving them authoritative, up-to-date information. There are other ways, of course. The Government have made it clear that they expect the media to be the prime source of information, and that is understandable.

However, taking as an example the smallpox case, there still seems to be an expectation that GPs will inform themselves by going up the line to the local health authority, local trust or public health laboratory service, rather than that such information will come down the line to them in advance. It is confusing for people to have to go to various website addresses for information about health issues, protective clothing or the person to whom they should turn for instructions. Such information should be in one place, regardless of whether the police, health service or reserve forces are responsible.

A national police service, which is led by the special branch of the Metropolitan police, deals with such matters. The Minister has heard me say before that it would be reassuring, rather than the opposite, to the public to know that even though, technically, the Metropolitan police special branch is leading—I understand that the police are the lead authority among the emergency services—an umbrella of cover is provided nationally in order to achieve maximum integration and minimum waste and duplication of resources. It would be useful if the specialism of the police were seen as available throughout the country. The Minister might be kind enough to discuss the arrangement between the different forces and the Met, which has taken the lead.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington asked about maximising the improvement of security at our ports and airports. The matter was discussed by Lord Carlile in his report. He pointed out that small airports and ports are much less well protected than the public would wish. It would be helpful if the Minister would tell us whether a response has been made to Lord Carlile's recommendations and whether there is a plan to recruit more people for the border force, thereby making controls at our major airports more effective. I have previously mentioned that desks are unstaffed other than at core hours, and that checks are not made, for example, on behalf of the Customs and Excise because no one is available.

It is still possible for a temporary member of staff who has not had proper security vetting to go air side, even at Heathrow. We must resolve that issue, because everyone who works in a vulnerable location—ports and airports must count as such, as well as places such as the London underground—should be subject to security vetting.

In an earlier debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) discussed the need to ensure that our information systems had the capacity to deal with the demand that will be placed on them in the case of a terrorist threat. In old-style military attacks, one would seek to take over the airport, control tower and radio station. It is no secret that someone who wanted to disable society now would try to interfere with radio and computer communications. We all know what happens periodically with mobile phones and similar technologies. Can the Minister reassure the public that arrangements are in hand, if not yet in place, to ensure that such systems are better protected so that, if suddenly there is mass use, the systems will not go down just when everyone most needs to use them?

Lastly, I wish to pick up on the topical issue of vaccinations and link with it that of the provision of protective clothing. I do not pretend to be an expert and I understand the concerns, but it seems to me that there should be a policy of having enough vaccine for everybody. I am not advocating that we should vaccinate everybody now. I know that contingency planning has taken place and that supplies have been pushed out through the national health service. However, the public would be reassured if they knew two things: first, there is, or soon will be, vaccine available for everybody, should it be needed, and secondly, there is, or soon will be, protective clothing available. To pick up on a point made by the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison), perhaps such clothing should be available in conurbations first, rather than generally. Those things would mean that there would be personal protection in the event of a terrible chemical, biological or nuclear attack.

There is a huge set of issues. The debate is welcome, because it will take those issues further. The knowledge that there will be a civil contingencies and civil defence Bill in the summer, which was firmed up by the statement yesterday, is also welcome. I hope that, using that as a backdrop, there will be an opportunity in the near future for the Home Secretary to come to the House to answer questions; that there can be other, informal occasions when parliamentarians can have a discussion and be briefed, and, most important, that the public can have clear and simple routes of access to the maximum amount of information, as soon as possible.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) on securing the debate. He brought to his very considerable speech his immense experience and stature within the area of defence and security. He made some of the issues that beset us starkly real. He started by reminding us of the public statements made by the Prime Minister and others about the very real possibility of this country being subject to some form of terrorist attack. He did not say so, but the possibility of that happening is considerably higher than the possibility of the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) becoming Mayor of London.

My right hon. Friend also reminded us of the importance of ensuring that all local authorities and health authorities have sufficient resources to fulfil not only their obligations under the present legislation, but the greater responsibilities that they will have as a result of the Bill that we will have later in the year. I venture to suggest, bearing in mind the risks to which my right hon. Friend referred, that regardless of whether authorities have the responsibilities, the resources should be there already. That would enable authorities to take discretionary action, even if they are not obliged to so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) spoke wisely on health issues. He referred to his sadness about the attendance, but, as the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey said, this is the second debate on the subject in a month. However, I share the view that more hon. Members should perhaps have taken an interest. It is interesting that in the three weeks since the previous debate a number of new issues have arisen, on which I want to touch.

As the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey pointed out, a different Minister is replying to today's debate. I am delighted about that, but it raises the issue of overall responsibility. My right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling quite rightly and properly said that he was not sure that we needed a whole Department, akin to the Department of Homeland Security in the United States. However, I am concerned that we do not have a single Minister who is ultimately responsible for the issues. The Minister of State, Cabinet Office, who replied to the previous debate, rightly said:

> "The Home Secretary has overall responsibility for the safety and security of the citizens of the United Kingdom. He is in charge of security and also supervises all current counter-terrorist and resilience work by Departments".—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 12 February 2003; Vol. 399, c. 305WH.]

That is an important job, but the Home Secretary is also responsible for the asylum chaos, our passport system and our police and law enforcement mechanisms. The amount of time that he can devote to this important matter must be extremely limited, which is why we retain the view that a Cabinet Minister should be responsible only for considering and co-ordinating home and security.

Yesterday, the Minister appeared as the Minister for chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear co-ordination, as he was described in a document published by the Home Secretary on civil contingency planning to deal with a terrorist attack. He said that he had been in the job since the turn of the year, which is fine. Having worked with him for around 18 months, I have huge respect for him and I am not criticising him, but it demonstrates yet again that another Minister with an important responsibility—

The Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety (Mr. John Denham): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that yesterday was not the first time that it was stated on the parliamentary record that I hold those responsibilities. I held them when, among other occasions, I gave evidence to the Select Committee on Defence last year. The hon. Gentleman and his right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) may have overlooked that, but other parliamentarians may not have done.

Mr. Paice: That is interesting and I am happy to accept the Minister's word, but the statement yesterday was certainly the first time that a number of us had heard of that.

The issue concerns co-ordination and whether it is possible for a disparate group of Ministers, each with different responsibilities, to co-ordinate. At least two of us in the Room have been in the same sort of position as the Minister. He will say that there are committees to do that, but those of us who have sat on Cabinet Committees and Sub-Committees know that it is easy to convince oneself that one is doing a grand job when hindsight often shows that matters of urgency and priority are never top of the agenda.

I shall not repeat all the issues that the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey reminded us about, but I hope that the Minister will address airport security in his reply.

Much of this morning's debate has concerned public information. My hon. Friend the Member for Westbury suggested that we should worry only about areas of dense population, which is a reasonable and valid proposition. My view is that the biggest cause of fear is lack of knowledge of the issues. We should be less patronising in the way in which we treat the public concerning threats and the actions that can be taken against those threats.

There has been much jocularity about the old "Protect and Survive" leaflet of the 1970s and 1980s, which, with hindsight, we might say was absurd, but at that time it provided an element of information to the public and we should not throw out the principle because, with hindsight 20 or 30 years later, we can rubbish that document. Perhaps nowhere is that more important than with vaccination, although that will arise in other matters that I want to raise.

[Mr. Paice]

As my right hon. Friend said during his opening speech, vaccination, particularly smallpox vaccination, is important. The statement published by the Home Secretary yesterday referred to the establishment of a United Kingdom reserve of a national stock of vaccines and antibiotics. Last night, the BBC news said that 20 million doses were available, but I am not aware of any public statement on that, so perhaps the Minister will confirm it. The Home Secretary said in the debate in the Chamber that Ministers will not seek vaccination against smallpox unless that is made generally available to the population. When he was then challenged at the Dispatch Box by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), the Home Secretary said:

> "I do not believe that there is a problem with people approaching their general practitioner for the smallpox vaccination."—[Official Report, 3 March 2003; Vol. 400, c. 596.]

Those two different statements, made by the Home Secretary in the space of a few minutes, are misleading and could give rise to considerable confusion. Of course, anyone is entitled to go and ask their GP for a vaccination, but whether the facilities are available for them to have it is another matter. I hope that the Minister can clarify that point. I argue strongly that anyone should be able to have a smallpox vaccination if they feel that that is necessary for their and their families' safety. We definitely do not want the sort of confusion that, I suggest, has now arisen.

Sir John Stanley: My hon. Friend referred to the lack of public information leaflets put out by the Government to help people to deal with civil defence and emergency issues. Is he aware that the Australian Government have already put out an interesting and comprehensive leaflet entitled "Preparing for the Unexpected"? If the Australian Government have concluded that it is necessary to put out such information in their very large country, surely we should be doing likewise, with great speed, in this tightly packed country where the risk of mass fatalities is that much greater.

Mr. Paice: My right hon. Friend introduces the next page of my speech perfectly, and saves me from making some of my points.

I turn to the websites referred to by the Home Secretary in yesterday's published statement. He mentioned ukresilience.info and the forthcoming Home Office site on terrorism. I do not think that anyone would describe the UK resilience site, which I spent some time studying yesterday evening, as user-friendly. It is very much a technocrats' website and does not provide large quantities of helpful public information from UK sources. For example, I searched for the word "smallpox", which I should have thought was reasonable on such a site, and four items came up. Three were simply extracts from newspapers and the fourth was on the medical effects of smallpox. None gave information about the terrorist implications, or about measures that people can take to minimise their personal risk from smallpox.

Yesterday, the Home Secretary said in the House that he would not produce guidelines along the lines of the "Protect and Survive" leaflet, but that the Home Office was developing a terrorist website to provide information. If one goes into the UK resilience site, as my right hon. Friend has, one finds links. Like him, I found the link to the Australian Government document "Preparing for the Unexpected". With the slight proviso that that is designed for an entirely different type of country, it is an extremely helpful, clearly written, explanatory document. It is not written in technical language, nor is it scaremongering. It provides the general public with a straightforward series of fairly simple advice.

There is some confusion here. On the one hand, the Government have said that they will not publish a leaflet in the form that has been seen before, but on the other, their own websites provide access to other countries' similar leaflets, which are helpful, but not designed for British circumstances. That seems highly contradictory. It is also worth making the point that one can access similar sites in the United States, Canada, France and New Zealand, all of which are far more helpful than the UK site.

Nowhere is that point more starkly illustrated than in an article that appeared in The Sunday Times. I am not a great one for quoting the press because we all know that accuracy cannot be vouched for, but that article raised particular issues so I shall end by quoting from it and challenging the Minister to say exactly what is going on. The article, which was published on 23 February, stated:

> "HOUSEHOLDERS are to be given guidance on how to survive in the face of a catastrophic terrorist attack. The guidance, which Ministers intend to reach all 24m homes in Britain, will include a shopping list of items that should be bought before a possible biological, chemical or nuclear strike".

The Cabinet Office said:

> "It is not clear yet how advice will be issued nationally. In the meantime, local authorities are entitled to adapt the Australian guidance."

It goes on to describe the Australian guidance entitled "Preparing for the Unexpected", to which we have referred.

There is confusion. Westminster Hall is, by convention, a less antagonistic Chamber than the House, but I want to draw to the Minister's attention the widespread confusion about what the Government are planning to do about informing the public. I say with sincerity that the public are entitled to have information similar to that being provided in other countries that face similar threats. It is patronising to suggest that the public will be panicked into an absurd reaction. That may be true of certain individuals, but that should not affect the wider issue. At the end of the day, the British people are a sober and realistic people who will take the information at face value, and they should be trusted.

I hope that the Minister will answer some of our questions—we have given him a lot of time so he has no excuse for not answering all of them. We should like him to answer those questions that his colleague did not answer at the end of the previous debate, and those that have arisen today. The debate has been useful and constructive, and I congratulate my right hon. Friend once more on securing it.

10.42 am

The Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety (Mr. John Denham): I start by congratulating the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) on securing this Adjournment debate. It has been a useful debate, and the right hon. Gentleman was able to bring to it his considerable experience, not only as a former Minister, but as a Minister who dealt with a relevant Department. I am grateful to him and to the other Members who spoke.

A wide range of issues has been raised. I shall attempt to deal with them as fully as I can, but in 17 minutes I may overlook some, in which case I shall endeavour to write to hon. Members and follow up issues outside this debate.

Civil defence is an important topic; the Government take it seriously and have recognised it. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made a written statement on civil contingency planning to address terrorist attack. The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes), among others, asked whether an oral statement would not have been better. I shall certainly draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. However, difficult judgments have to be made on a lot of issues. In the current climate, there tends to be the belief that there must be a reason for choosing the particular date on which an oral statement is given, and the event may be given a significance that is out of proportion to the event itself. The intention of the written statement was to update the House. I ask the Chamber to accept that it is difficult to judge whether an oral statement will be interpreted by some sections of the media as meaning that the Government know something. Those are the judgments that we are wrestling with all the time in trying to get our communications right.

Simon Hughes: I completely understand. As we now know that there will be legislation later in the parliamentary year, it might be helpful if there were a periodic opportunity to speak on the matter so that it would not look like a panic response. We could all prepare for that, and the public would expect it, as a matter of regular updating.

Mr. Denham: I note what the hon. Gentleman says, and I note that we are discussing the matter for the second time in three weeks. Perhaps we are getting used to the idea of such debates.

I shall deal first with the question of structures and accountability, and then go on to some of the more specific issues. It is worth mentioning that the Government moved to strengthen the arrangements for emergency planning and civil protection immediately after the 2001 general election before the events of 11 September. In August 2001, the Government published a comprehensive discussion document on the future of emergency planning arrangements. At that time we concluded that the Civil Defence Act 1948 no longer provided an adequate framework for modern emergency planning. Its provisions relate to the organisation and protection of the civil population at a local level in response to a hostile attack by a foreign power.

The immediate concern was that since the 1980s, emergency planning had effectively concerned itself with preparations for responding to a wide variety of peacetime hazards in accordance with the policy of integrated emergency management. Since the mid-1980s, assumptions about the nature of potential threats to this country have changed dramatically, and the attacks of 11 September 2001 certainly brought that home to us. Planning began before 11 September and we have sought a clear structure for civil contingency planning overall, as well as the specific responses that have to be made to the threat of terrorist attacks, including the possibility of CBRN attacks.

The Home Secretary has overall responsibility for the safety and security of the citizens of the UK. He is in charge of security with direct responsibility for the main elements of the work to counter the current threat from terrorism: the intelligence work of the security service, counter-terrorist policy and building resilience against the terrorist threat. He supervises all current counter-terrorist and resilience work by Departments in his capacity as a member of three relevant Cabinet Committees. One oversees the work to strengthen our defences against terrorism, the second works to build the UK's resilience and ability to manage the consequences of major emergencies and the third meets to oversee lead Department management of major emergencies once they have taken place.

I was appointed Minister for CBRN co-ordination, reporting to the Home Secretary, at the end of 2001. We are supported in this work by Sir David Omand, who was appointed the Government's security and intelligence co-ordinator and permanent secretary to the Cabinet Office last summer. That new post was created to enhance the capacity at the centre of government to co-ordinate security, intelligence and consequence management matters and to deal with risks and major emergencies, should they arise. He is supported, as is the Home Secretary, by the civil contingencies secretariat in the Cabinet Office.

In reply to the argument that one person should be in charge of the whole response, I would argue that it is essential that, in their usual work, the major Departments of State have ownership of, and responsibility for, those aspects of our response and resilience to terrorism that come under their responsibilities. It is tempting to feel that, for example, airport security should be taken away from the Department for Transport and given to someone else, but in practice it is essential that those who are responsible for our airlines, airports, railways and the underground actually build into their day-to-day responsibilities an understanding of what is needed in the running of those major services so that we can respond to emergencies. We expect them to be able to do so should there be, for example, as unfortunately there have been, major, catastrophic train crashes. We cannot separate events that might be the consequences of terrorist action from those that happen by simple accident or act of God.

We have sought to create a structure supported by a strong central secretariat, in which individual Departments and Ministers are fully aware of their responsibilities in the overall picture, but in which the Home Secretary and the senior ministerial committee that he chairs ensure that there is an overall strategy and that people are held to account for their contribution to it. That is the essence of the structure that we have evolved.

[Mr. Denham]

One sometimes has to anticipate debates of this kind, so, depending on the issue that is likely to be the subject of such debates, there is no contradiction in the fact that the Minister who appears may be different. If the debate were to concentrate on, say, airport security, a Minister with responsibility for transport might respond. If the debate were considering our general structure for contingency planning against a variety of civil and terrorist emergencies, the Minister of State, Cabinet Office might respond. In anticipation of the likely thrust of today's debate and given my responsibilities for CBRN, I am answering on behalf of the Government. It is an illustration of strength rather than weakness that a number of different Ministers can respond to hon. Members on this matter.

Mr. Paice: I want to make it absolutely clear to the Minister, and to put it on the record, that he is countering an argument that no one has put. No one—certainly not me or my party—is suggesting that all those responsibilities should be extracted from individual Departments. The point that I have made repeatedly is that co-ordination is such a major issue that it should be the responsibility of a single Minister.

Mr. Denham: Co-ordination lies within the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, supported in CBRN, the current issue of concern, by me. We are supported in that both by the specialist teams in the Home Office and, in terms of co-ordination across the Government, by the civil contingencies secretariat. However, I am glad that the hon. Gentleman accepts—at least I think he does—that it is not as odd for different Ministers sometimes to answer different debates as he suggested earlier.

I had hoped to touch on developments that are taking place in those structures, and particularly to make two points. I shall do so only briefly now. First, we recognise that, to support activities locally, we need a strengthened regional tier for emergency planning and resilience building. The development of that is under way as we speak. Secondly, I confirm that we intend to publish the proposals for a civil contingencies Bill in the summer during this parliamentary Session, so that it can be subjected to further scrutiny. It is important to stress that the development of that Bill has not delayed essential work on emergency planning structures at local and regional level, but a new legal framework is necessary.

Resources were mentioned a couple of times. Last year there was a 30 per cent. increase in the dedicated central Government resource for emergency planning, a rather narrow and limited area. That is an increase that we wish to maintain. However, that £19 million represents only a small part of the resources devoted to emergency planning. Overall, the spending review of 2002 has resulted in additional spending on prevention, including a 6.4 per cent. increase in real terms on national security and intelligence agencies. We are expanding our investment in health, police and other major agencies. The statement issued by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary yesterday indicated some but not all of the areas of additional procurement of equipment and training carried out since 11 September.

For obvious reasons, the question of smallpox was raised a number of times during the debate. While we are always criticised for not giving information to the public, when we do give out information, no one reads it or acts as if we had made it available. It is worth stressing that we published our interim plan for smallpox in December 2002. It had input from the national health service, the Public Health Laboratory Service and other specialist agencies. We set out the three components in the Department of Health's preparation for a response to a possible smallpox emergency—improved vaccine stocks, a plan of action and a cohort of immunised staff who can deal safely with any potential smallpox cases. All those components are being developed as part of the Government's preparedness to respond to a deliberate release of a biological agent.

It is worth stressing that we are the only nation other than the United States and Canada to have published a smallpox plan. We are also, however, working with the European global health security action group on preparedness for smallpox and we hosted an international modelling workshop in November that examined the models underpinning the action group's planning requirements. It is always interesting and entertaining to listen to people on the "Today" programme who will not speak in their own voice and who say they are senior Government advisers. I stand to be corrected, but I am not aware of anybody who could be described as a senior Government adviser having made representations to Ministers that were reflected on "Today" yesterday morning. If I am wrong about that, I shall inform the hon. Gentleman and the House.

It is important to stress that the strategy of containment and ring vaccination first, which is at the heart of the Government's smallpox strategy, is consistent with World Health Organisation advice. If there were more time, I would read out some supporting quotes, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that the strategy has been drawn up in line with WHO advice.

Sir John Stanley: Time is running out. Does the Minister really believe that, given the length of time that it will take to vaccinate people inside the ring and for the vaccine to be effective, ring vaccination is a medically viable answer to a significant smallpox attack on the United Kingdom?

Mr. Denham: When I and my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Health are advised by the chief medical officer and the World Health Organisation that our approach is the correct one, unless we have detailed scientific knowledge ourselves, I would rather not second-guess that.

The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) raised some related questions. In the debate yesterday my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary mentioned the figure of 20 million full vaccine doses. We are not—this needs to be stressed and it is also on the chief medical officer's advice—encouraging mass vaccination. Of course people should go to general practitioners if they want advice, but because of the risks associated with the vaccine, which can produce a severe reaction in one in 600 people, the CMO is not advising a mass vaccination campaign, nor are we proposing to launch such a campaign. However, the overall strategy has been set out in the interim plan for smallpox, which has been published.

I have two minutes in which to try to respond to a number of other issues, which I shall struggle to do.

The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey asked about the policing arrangements. Clearly the role played by the police in responding to an emergency situation through the gold, silver and bronze command is different from that of, say, the special branch or the specialist terrorism services led by the Metropolitan police, but the overarching body is a sub-committee of the Association of Chief Police Officers, which looks at all policing activities in relation to counter-terrorism.

I apologise to the hon. Gentleman for Westbury (Dr. Murrison), who raised some important points. Towards the end of the year the Territorial Army reserve forces should be in place and able to offer military assistance and civil power under the normal rule. I shall write to him about the other points that he raised.

Property Law (Mr. Tony Martin)

11 am

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk): I shall refer initially to some of the background to the Tony Martin case. As the Minister will be aware, it is a sad and tragic case. It is tragic that someone died in the break-in to Tony Martin's farmhouse, Bleak house. It is sad that a Norfolk farmer who is a man of honour, integrity and decency ended up going to prison, having had absolutely no previous convictions or examples of bad character in the past.

I want to consider the laws of burglary, in particular those governing self- defence. Before doing so, however, I want to refer to Tony Martin's application for parole. I note that the original Minister who was to deal with the matter cannot be here today because he is ill, but I am glad that the Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety can respond to the debate. I spoke to his office about an hour and a half ago and informed his staff of the broad outline of what I am about to say, so I hope that he has been briefed on that. I am grateful to him for stepping in at the last moment.

The Minister will be aware that Tony Martin was convicted originally of murdering Fred Barras and was sentenced to life imprisonment. However, the conviction for murder was quashed on appeal and a conviction for manslaughter was substituted. The sentence was commuted to five years in prison. The first available date for parole was about five weeks ago. Everyone was led to believe that Tony Martin would be given parole and that that would not be a problem. As we know, parole was refused. That was a staggering decision. Tony Martin will challenge the Parole Board's decision through to judicial review, so obviously the matter is sub judice.

Will the Minister comment on the award of parole? I am talking in general terms; I note that the Clerk is looking a little apprehensive. I will not say anything that is sub judice. It is most important for the Minister to consider the matter from a general perspective. The two key criteria that matter most are the behaviour of the prisoner and the likelihood of his reoffending. I have a meeting lined up with the chairman of the Norfolk probation service in about two weeks. It would seem from press reports—they have not been denied—that the probation officer in question took a subjective view. For example, he is quoted as saying that Tony Martin showed no remorse. He is also quoted as having said that Tony Martin lived in the 19th century and believed that an Englishman's home was his castle. There is nothing dramatic in that. As for remorse—there has been much discussion about that in the local media—surely that is a private matter. I should not have thought that it was for a probation officer to take a subjective view. It is up to him to be dispassionate and professional and to make a judgment on the facts.

I draw attention to the contrasting case of Brendan Fearon, which is in the public domain. He was one of the burglars who broke into Tony Martin's home. He had a string of convictions as long as my arm and was a serial offender. He was convicted of burglary and was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. After 18 months, he was granted parole. Many people took the view, and said, that it was wrong for him to be granted parole in such circumstances, because if anyone was likely to reoffend it would almost certainly be Brendan Fearon. A few weeks ago he did reoffend and he is now back in prison serving a sentence for supplying heroin, yet he is an example of a person whom the probation service said should be granted parole. It is staggering that Brendan Fearon was granted parole but my constituent, Tony Martin, was not.

Will the Minister examine the role of the Prison Service? It submits reports to the Home Secretary but it also puts together a package of papers for the Minister to examine.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am listening extremely carefully to the hon. Gentleman. The subject of the debate is the operation of the law relating to property and how the case of Mr. Tony Martin affects that. The hon. Gentleman seems to be talking about the case of Mr. Tony Martin rather than the law relating to property. I do not think that he has yet stepped out of order, but he is not strictly addressing the terms of the debate, as I understand it.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for that slight rap over the knuckles. I shall come on to the law relating to burglary in a moment, but I am sure that you will agre[illegible] if one is making a strong case for reforming th[illegible]w and trying to put something in context, it is important to use individual cases because they bring home to people how deficient the law might be.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate. As he knows, Mr. Martin's home community of Emneth is in my constituency although Mr. Martin is my hon. Friend's constituent. As hon. Members will know, my hon. Friend was sadly absent from the House between 1997 and 2001, which was when the incident occurred, and during that period I took on responsibility for Mr. Martin and his community.

One of the most distressing aspects of the whole affair is a general aspect that affects not only Emneth, judging from my postbag, and no doubt that of my hon. Friend, and that is the loss of people's confidence in the criminal justice system, especially in relation to the invasion of privacy by burglars. That is enormously important, and if the law regarding people's security and safety in their homes is brought into disrepute by what people felt four years ago to be unfair treatment of an individual, it is right for the law to be examined. That is the background of my hon. Friend's case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That was rather a long, but very helpful, intervention. It certainly described the scope of the debate, as I understand it.

Mr. Bellingham: I am extremely grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) who summed up succinctly the feelings of many of our constituents. She was right to point out that Tony Martin, whose house is the last house in my constituency, is a constituent of North-West Norfolk, but the community of which he is part, Emneth, is in my right hon. Friend's constituency.

My right hon. Friend's point brings me neatly to the law of burglary. I shall address a point about the Parole Board in a moment, but you are right, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because we are nine minutes into the debate and it is time that we examined burglary and the law relating to it in more detail. I see that the Clerk is cheering up a bit, which is obviously good.

Rural police forces up and down the country are overstretched. Burglars know that because they are targeting, more and more, homes in the more rural and sparsely populated parts of my constituency and the constituencies of my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson).

People in rural areas feel particularly vulnerable, which is not helped by the recent confusing comments of Lord Chief Justice Woolf and the Lord Chancellor. They appear to be completely out of touch. Burglary is not a victimless crime. It often involves the threat or the fact of physical attack, and many of its victims are permanently traumatised. When Lord Chief Justice Woolf and the Lord Chancellor suggest that first-time burglars should not be given custodial sentences they send out quite the wrong signal.

People in rural areas feel especially vulnerable, and many of them think that they should be able to use reasonable force to protect themselves. However, recent cases have resulted in total confusion. The Tony Martin case is well documented and everyone knows the facts. He shot a burglar who broke into his house, was charged and convicted. Another man was recently convicted for repeatedly stabbing a burglar who had broken into the flat where he believed that his children were sleeping. However, when another householder stabbed to death one intruder and seriously wounded another, the Crown Prosecution Service found that the force used was reasonable and did not prosecute. Clearly the CPS cannot decide where the boundary between reasonable and unreasonable force lies and what the law is. How can it be right to prosecute people when the law is confused and contradictory?

If lawyers, safe in their offices, cannot work out what is right, how can a householder be expected to weigh up the pros and cons in the middle of a violent struggle in the dark? Is it reasonable to expect a householder, during a few fearful seconds at the top of the stairs, when he is being menaced and perhaps threatened with a broken bottle or a knife, to guess what the law would say when lawyers do not know?

I do not want new over-prescriptive laws, and I certainly do not want a firearms free-for-all. We do not want here the situation found in parts of the United States where if one so much as enters someone's garden one is likely to be shot at. In a case in Florida, a Japanese tourist knocked on someone's door and was shot through the letterbox. That is the gun culture gone mad and we do not want that. However, I think—the Minister might comment on this—that we need a much more sympathetic approach by the police and the CPS towards householders who defend themselves. All too often, those householders, who have perhaps had to react in a split second, are made to feel the No. 1 criminal. There should be a presumption in favour of their innocence, rather than the other way round, which appears to be the case at present.

I am not suggesting that the Government should immediately change the law, but we should have a report from the Law Commission, which should be tasked with examining whether we need a new law where the relevant test is not the reasonable man test but a new, subjective test of what the householder believes to be appropriate at the time. At the moment, under the reasonable man test, many months after an incident, the CPS and lawyers will be sitting in their comfy chairs deciding what the reasonable man would do in those circumstances. How can they put themselves into the shoes of the householder who had to take a decision in a split second? If we bring in a new, subjective test, that would allow for the fact that every case is different and every set of circumstances quite unique. Householders would not then be prosecuted unless they were launching what I would describe as revenge attacks on burglars. They would not be prosecuted for any action that they took in the heat of the circumstances, on the spur of the moment. They might be prosecuted if, for example, they apprehended the burglar, held them at bay, and then launched a revenge attack on them. That would obviously be very different.

I urge the Minister to consider my suggestion. I do not say that the law should be changed immediately, but there is a strong tide of opinion in Norfolk and in many other rural areas that the law is completely confused. The Government should accept that and try to do something about it. My suggestion that the Law Commission should examine the issue and produce a report makes the most sense.

I also want to make a point about burglars and other intruders who break into properties and end up getting injured or, in this case, shot. I strongly believe that those burglars—those criminals—who have often committed wicked crimes should not have any civil rights with regard to any incident that takes place in that property. There is a great deal of support in my constituency and that of my right hon. Friend for the suggestion that when burglars break into a property, and it is manifestly obvious to them that they are committing a crime, they should leave their civil rights outside that building or home. I am thinking especially of the case of Brendon Fearon who is trying to sue Tony Martin for, we are told, £150,000, on the basis that he suffered injury and other problems when he broke into Tony Martin's house.

It would make much more sense if a rule were introduced whereby all civil rights are extinguished the moment that a crime is committed. It offends many people when it becomes apparent that burglars and other criminals can profit from a crime. The Minister must respond to the tide of public opinion and revulsion at some of the incidents that have taken place throughout the country. The Government must focus on these two points. I do not advocate American-style laws under which people can shoot whom they want. However, it is high time that householders know exactly where they stand. The Government must seize my point about people who commit crimes being able to profit from them.

The Parole Board apparently ignored its own guidelines when it made its decision in the Tony Martin case. Those guidelines demand that it considers any psychiatric reports in any review. I understand that it did not study the report by forensic psychiatrist Dr Philip Joseph, who made it clear that he had examined Tony Martin and concluded that he was not prone to losing his self-control and was no more volatile than the average person. He recommended that Tony Martin should receive parole, but it appears that that crucial psychiatrist's report was not included in the key papers that the Prison Service presented to the Parole Board. The Minister must consider that.

I am unclear whether the Parole Board is an independent body over which Ministers have no control. Will the Minister say whether that is the case, and will he examine any possible discrepancies in the Parole Board's decision-making process? Will he ask questions and discover why a key report was not presented? Will he ask the Prison Service for an explanation, and will he speak to the relevant prison governor? Will the Minister obtain a copy of the probation officer's report? If I write to him and ask for a copy of the probation officer's report that went to the Parole Board, will he supply it? Could I write to the chairman of the Norfolk probation service and ask for a copy, or will those reports always be confidential? In a case where there has been substantial publicity about what was in that probation officer's report—information that has not been denied—would it make sense for such a report to be published? Will the Minister explain to the House what he can and cannot do in such a case?

I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me that leeway. I hope that the Minister will be able to answer my questions on the way that Tony Martin's application for parole was handled. Would he also consider setting up a Law Commission inquiry into how the burglary law works and what householders can and cannot do? If he could do that, many of us would be extremely grateful.

The Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety (Mr. John Denham): I congratulate the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) on securing the debate. As he appreciates, I have stepped in at the last moment to respond to it and I hope to address several of the issues that he raised. He introduced the debate in a measured way. I am sure that he would join me in regretting the fact that some of the coverage of the case has focused on individual people with some role in the decision-making process, drawing attention to where they live and their identity in a way that is not fair to people working in the service of the public.

With regard to the Parole Board's decision, we cannot comment on the circumstances of a particular case. I shall, however, set out the process for considering whether a prisoner serving a sentence of four years and over should be granted early release on parole licence. It is important to say that that is the approach that we expect the Parole Board, as an independent body, to follow.

Prisoners serving a sentence of four years or more are entitled to be considered for early release on parole at the halfway point of their sentence. It is for the Parole Board to determine whether to award early release on parole. When considering whether or not to release, the board is obliged to take into account the directions set down by the Secretary of State, pursuant to Section 32(6) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

[Mr. John Denham]

Those directions clearly state that the Parole Board shall consider primarily the risk to the public of a further offence being committed at a time when the prisoner would otherwise be in prison and whether any such risk is acceptable. This risk is then balanced against the benefit, both to the public and to the offender, of early release back into the community under a degree of supervision. However, I must stress that when carrying out that balancing exercise, the board's overriding concern must be the protection of the public. That is all the more so when the offender concerned has committed either a violent or sexual offence.

The Parole Board will also want to satisfy itself that the prisoner concerned is likely to comply with the conditions of their licence. It will want to be satisfied that there is a sound release plan, which will assist the offender's rehabilitation and which has adequate safeguards that will enable the probation service safely to manage risk while the prisoner is in the community. In short, a significant part of the consideration that the Parole Board is required to undertake when considering an application for release on parole focuses on the risk to the public of further offending during the parole period. In general, if someone presented no risk of reoffending, it would follow that the Parole Board would be bound to recommend that person's release.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the availability of reports to the Parole Board. I shall look into that matter and write to him about it. From the briefing that I have, I have no reason to believe that all available reports and material were not considered by the Parole Board. The current position is that Mr. Martin will be released automatically at the two-thirds point of his sentence, and supervised on licence until the three-quarter point.

On the question of the law on self-defence, it is well-established in law—I am not talking about an individual case—that a person may use "reasonable force" in self-defence or in the defence of his or her family or property. The key elements of what amounts to reasonable force in self-defence may be summarised as necessity and proportionality. The force that it is reasonable to use in any given situation will depend on the nature of the threat that a person is facing—for example, the level of force that he can use to defend his life is greater than that to defend his property.

What constitutes reasonable force will depend upon the circumstances of each case and is a matter solely for the courts to decide. That does not mean that if a person inflicts injury on a criminal in the course of defending himself or his property he will necessarily face criminal charges. However, if a complaint is made that excessive force has been used, the police are duty bound to investigate. If charges are brought, the court takes account of what was reasonable in the circumstances for someone in the defendant's shoes. For example, some allowances are made for panic in the heat of the moment or the fact that the defendant is small and frail and the criminal is large and threatening.

Some sort of codification of what level of force is permissible is likely to be of only academic interest to people who suddenly find themselves under attack. Such a code is not likely to be the sort of thing one carries round in one's mind in case it is needed. I am not sure whether it would help to resolve the situation. When a case is brought to court, it is best left to the jury to decide, in the light of the circumstances, whether the action taken in self-defence was necessary and proportionate. The law allows a jury to take into account the fact that people defending themselves may not be able to judge to a nicety what level of force to use. Generally, juries are able to come to sensible conclusions that are on the side of the law-abiding public and the victim.

Although it is quite reasonable to ask for a proper approach by the police and the prosecuting authorities, many of the judgments in cases that are brought to court must be put in the hands of juries, which must play the role that they have traditionally played. We need to keep a careful balance between upholding an individual's right to self-defence and maintaining the general rule that people should not take the law into their own hands. It follows that changes to the existing law should not be made on the hoof as a response to a particular case. At this stage, we are not convinced that a change to the law on self-defence is required.

Mrs. Shephard: I congratulate the Minister on his grasp of the matter. When a case has the kind of reception that this case had, it brings the law and people's respect for it into some doubt. The reaction to a case is something that Ministers should take into account when they are reviewing possible changes in the law.

Mr. Denham: Both the points that the right hon. Lady makes are correct. High-profile cases raise public concerns about the way in which the system operates and Ministers are duty bound to reflect on the issues that are raised, but they are also duty bound not to commit themselves to rewriting an entire piece of legislation on the back of an individual case, if, on reflection, the principles seem to be sound.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): This is not in the same category, but it relates to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) and my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard). The impression among the public is that the balance has shifted towards the criminal, rather than the victim. I was told recently by the head of the Norfolk Archaeological Trust that a person had broken into an archaeological site, climbed over a fence, fallen into a ditch and injured themselves and was now seeking legal advice about suing the trust because it had not put up a notice saying that there was a ditch. We can smile about that kind of thing, but it contributes to many people's perception of the balance. I know that the Minister cannot necessarily take the place of a judge, but he must have a view on the matter.

Mr. Denham: There is a slight difference between the issue of the law on the reasonable use of self-defence, which has been in place for some time, and the interpretation of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984, which involves considering what was in the mind of the Government who introduced it. I suspect that the 1984 Act was much more to do with children going into their neighbour's garden to retrieve a ball and falling into a dangerous pond, than it was to do with climbing over fences belonging to the Norfolk Archaeological Trust.

I can add little further today, other than to say that there was an interesting exchange—not in the House, but on "Any Questions" last Friday night—between my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), which appeared to point to a consensus that some revision of the 1984 Act might be in order. I understand that that was due to be discussed in the Committee that is considering the Criminal Justice Bill this morning. I cannot commit the Government on this matter, but there does seem to be something in the ether surrounding the issue, so perhaps we should watch this space.

EU Enlargement

2 pm

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly): Just over a year ago, I was able to initiate a similar debate on European Union enlargement in Westminster Hall. A year later, it is remarkable how much things have changed. Most important is the fact that we had the Copenhagen summit last December. The summit was historic in many ways, not least because it was agreed at the summit that 10 applicant countries should be able to join the European Union in 2004. Those countries—as all hon. Members know—are the three Baltic states of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, Poland, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Slovenia, Hungary, Malta and Cyprus. The summit also agreed that Romania and Bulgaria should be able to join the EU in 2007; and, significantly, the European hand of friendship was extended to Turkey's possible future membership.

It is amazing how much things have changed in so many of the countries involved in the enlargement process, not only in the past 12 months but in the past decade. If we pause for thought, we will remember that 10 years ago six of those 10 countries did not exist as nation states. Now, they are in the process of transforming their societies and economies, developing new political structures and once again engaging with the international community. The progress in all those states is epitomised by the example of Poland.

In 1989, the situation in Poland was dire in the extreme. Inflation was 600 per cent., consumer goods were virtually non-existent, travel was almost unheard of and the private sector was minuscule. Today, twice as many Poles go to university than went in 1989. Poles travel extensively and, although unemployment is still unacceptably high, 3 million businesses now create new jobs for Polish people every day, and inflation is only 1 per cent. There is an optimism and upbeat character throughout the country that shows how far it has progressed and is likely to progress in future.

The enlargement process is not over simply because we had a successful summit in December. Copenhagen was only the end of the beginning. Referendums have yet to be held in all the accession countries—the first will be in Malta on 8 March and the last in Latvia on 20 September. Those referendums are critical, and the debate in those countries will be intense.

We should also remember that the process of change must continue in the countries of central Europe. Political democracy must be strengthened and reinforced, market economies must progress and administrative capacity must be developed. For example, when the states receive structural funds from the EU, they will have to ensure that those funds are spent in the best possible way and that programmes have been introduced to maximise their value. That task should not be underestimated.

One issue relating to the accession treaty is still outstanding—it must be ratified by the European Parliament and by each of the current member states of the EU. In that respect, I must express my grave concern about the recent comments of President Chirac. He said that the many countries of central Europe that support the position of the United States on Iraq are childish, badly brought up and irresponsible. Such comments are totally unacceptable and absolutely outrageous. France, like every other member state, must ratify the treaty, and it may decide to hold a referendum. To issue veiled threats against the applicant states—the accession countries—is the worst possible way for France to develop a relationship with them. I believe that President Chirac's comments will prove to be counter-productive.

Cyprus was debated at length at Copenhagen. There is no doubt that the Greek-speaking southern part of Cyprus will join the European Union, but I am sure that we all want the whole island to join. I was very pleased to learn in the past few days that a third revised version of the plan for unification is under consideration. Extra time has been given to President Papadopoulos, who is the new President of Cyprus. It is said that he is more opposed to unification of the island than his predecessor, but I did not find that to be the case in my discussions with him when the European Scrutiny Committee was in Cyprus. He might surprise many people by being more in favour of unity than they think.

The new deadline for reaching agreement is 10 March, and a draft agreement is to be put to a referendum on 30 March. I hope that the process will be successful. If it is, we must pay tribute to the British involvement in it, not least that of Sir David Hannay, who has done an excellent job in ensuring that progress has taken place.

It was also agreed at Copenhagen that Romania and Bulgaria should not be forgotten, and 2007 was mentioned as the date for their accession, but I question whether those two countries should automatically be linked together, as the two are very different, as is their progress towards EU membership. For example, as of December, Bulgaria had closed in negotiations 23 of the 30 chapters, but Romania had closed only 13 of 30.

Recently, Commissioner Verheugen was in Romania. He made it absolutely clear that a lot of work had to be done, and done speedily, in that country. He was very blunt, as he often is, in saying that corruption had to be tackled and genuine attempts had to be made to create an independent judiciary. However, there is much work to be done in Bulgaria, too. I was in Bulgaria just a couple of weeks ago, and I heard from business people as well as politicians that there was still a great deal of corruption in the police force and that the judiciary was anything but impartial and independent.

Croatia has recently submitted an application to the EU—there is a debate to be had on that—and I understand that Macedonia has just submitted one as well. Personally, I feel that it would be helpful if the Government of Croatia were more co-operative in relation to the war crimes tribunal in The Hague. That would certainly enhance the country's application. I would be interested to know the Minister's position on the enlargement process as far as those countries and other Balkan states are concerned.

Finally, I shall refer to Turkey—I say "finally", but although I refer to it last, it is by no means least. An agreement at Copenhagen was of tremendous importance to Turkey. For the first time in some 40 years of sometimes heated debate, the European Council proposed a potential start date for accession talks in December 2004. That is of enormous significance, but there is a debate about Turkey's membership in principle and whether it should ever be admitted to the European Union.

Turkey is a Muslim country of 70 million people. It is situated predominantly in Asia Minor but it is also in NATO. Some people have said that Turkey should not be admitted to the European Union, most notably Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, although he accepts that progress has been made and that progress is planned for the future. His argument comes down to the fact that, in his view, Turkey is not a European country.

I fundamentally disagree with that point of view. For me Europe is an idea. It is about values, not about dotted lines on maps, religious beliefs, tribal loyalties or ethnic pedigrees. Countries that sign up to core values such as democracy and freedom of speech and of association should be eligible to join the EU whether their populations are Slavs or Muslims. That to me is irrelevant.

Obviously, the laws of economics mean that no economic association, whether the EU or any other body, can keep on growing without limits, but that limit has not been reached in respect of Turkey. Since 1999, Turkey has responded positively to the challenges that face it. Its Parliament has passed measures to abolish the death penalty. Turkey has extended key rights to the Kurdish people and it has begun to reform its judiciary. Importantly, we have recently seen the election of a new democratic Government who have Islamic beliefs firmly rooted in the Islamic community, but who are also committed to progressive socio-economic reforms.

That is not to say that not much more needs to be done in Turkey—a heck of a lot more needs to be done. The Turkish economy still needs to be liberalised. Dissidents, ethnic minorities and ordinary prisoners need to be treated far better than they are at present. There needs to be genuine freedom of worship and far more rights should be accorded to the Kurdish people. Above all else, let us not forget that the military must have far less influence than it currently exercises in the Turkish state, albeit behind the scenes.

None the less, I stress my belief that things are changing significantly. By giving Turkey a provisional start date for negotiations, the Copenhagen summit has given us an historic chance to bring together two traditions and two civilisations. We should welcome that fact and understand its true implications.

The case for EU enlargement rests on two basic facts. The first is that the best interests of the United Kingdom and the European Union as a whole are served well by the process of enlargement. Let us not forget that some 14,000 British firms currently trade with the countries of central and eastern Europe, and their number is increasing all the time. Let us not forget that accession is relatively more important to countries such as Germany, which are much closer to the accession states.

However, let us not minimise the advantages of joining the European Union to those countries that we hope will enter in 2004 and beyond. For them, Europe offers hope, freedom and a chance of real prosperity. It offers them hope because the European Union with its liberal democracies is something to which they aspired for many years during the dark days of the communists. It offers them a real chance of developing a market economy in a socially responsible way. The European Union, alongside NATO, reinforces their prospects of genuine peace and stability well into the future. That is why enlargement is a win-win process that offers benefits to everyone. I hope that the House will achieve real consensus on the importance of enlargement and that there will be cross-party support for the treaty of accession when it comes before Parliament.

My final point is this: it is all very well politicians and Governments talking about the importance of enlargement—the case for it is overwhelming—but the important challenge is to convince the people of Europe that enlargement is critical. The other day, I was reading an article in E!Sharp magazine dated October 2002. It gave a comprehensive analysis of various European barometer polls. It stated the following chilling words:

> "Not only do the vast majority of EU citizens have no idea which countries are candidates to join the Union, but many of them do not even want to know".

All of us in the House and beyond who believe in Europe and the values of the European Union and see enlargement as intrinsically worth while have a moral responsibility to take the message out beyond the House and to convince people of the worth of the European enlargement project. I hope that in some small way, at least, this debate will reinforce our determination to make enlargement work. It gives a chance to demonstrate that we must take all the people with us in this great project.

2.17 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I am delighted to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) and congratulate him on obtaining this debate. He says that it has become an annual feature of the House of Commons and I look forward to his applying for a debate next year, when we shall be only a couple of months from the completed enlargement process.

There will be no dissent in the Chamber this afternoon. All hon. Members, on both sides of the House, support enlargement for the reasons made clear by my hon. Friend. There was a time when the Opposition were against enlargement—they wanted a referendum on the Nice treaty and to block the enlargement process.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has adverted immediately from his statement that we are all in favour of enlargement to the idea that the Conservatives were against it. We have never been against it, but we believed that the way in which Nice was handled ultimately had precious little to do with enlargement. However, Nice has happened, and we want to get on with things as they are.

Keith Vaz: I am delighted by the Conservatives' retrospective change of policy that has been announced in this debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly can take comfort from that. I am glad that we all now speak with one voice.

It is right that Britain should take pride in its role in the process, particularly because the speeches and initiatives of our Prime Minister during the past few years gave the enlargement process in Europe impetus and enthusiasm. My hon. Friend the Minister for Europe should be congratulated. From the moment that he became the Minister for Europe, he made it a feature to visit as many applicant countries as possible to keep those positive links going. He came here today from chairing a major Foreign Office seminar on enlargement.

That is why Britain has a right to be proud of what we have achieved in the enlargement process, and it is why, when we talk about creating a new Europe, we do not mean dividing up the countries between the so-called old Europe and the so-called new Europe. A new Europe will be created when the enlargement process is completed. That new Europe will consist of a group of countries that are determined to achieve the reunification of Europe and to create the largest single market anywhere in the world, covering 500 million people and bringing peace and prosperity to the continent. That process has taken place only because of the enormous amount of work done by so many.

I pay tribute to Günter Verheugen, the Commissioner on enlargement, who I know has worked extremely hard. It is not easy to go through the acquis communautaire, but we should commend the speed with which the countries and their chief negotiators have tackled the subject. I am glad that only two of the original applicants are not joining in the first wave. I know that there was discussion about how big the wave should be, but the European Council was right to decide that as many countries as possible should join.

I will raise only three or four points in the short time available, because I know that a number of my colleagues want to take part in the debate. I see at least two former members of the European Parliament to whom Westminster has granted asylum. I know that they will want to speak, so I shall be brief.

First, I wish to flag up the issue of reform. Of course we welcome the new countries that are joining the European Union, but it is essential that the reform process that the Prime Minister and Chancellor Schröder began with their now famous letter of 25 February 2002 be completed. Once all the new countries are in Europe, unless the way in which the European Council operates is fundamentally reformed, there will be gridlock—the decision-making process will come to a halt. One of the practical suggestions in the practical letter sent by the two leaders to the Prime Minister of Spain was that, for example, the round-table discussions that take place when each country sets out its stated position, and the entire day is taken up in deliberations, must end.

We must ensure that the paperwork does not bury the bright officials from the United Kingdom who speak on our behalf and on behalf of other countries, but is put to one side, so that we can get on with making practical decisions. Therefore, we must look at the reform agenda for the way in which the European Council operates. I should be interested to hear from the Minister how many of the points in the letter of 25 February 2002 can be ticked off. I know that he is as keen as all Members of Parliament to make sure that the reform process is continued.

My second point is that, once the enlargement process is completed, we must not stop doing the good things that we are doing. Let the Minister continue his bilateral visits, and let there be more visits between parliamentarians at Westminster and those in the new European Union countries. The taxpayer pays for us to make three visits to European Union institutions, and that has recently been expanded to include the enlargement countries. Every Member of Parliament should decide to visit one of the member-designate countries to build up the relationship so solidly built at ministerial level by the Minister for Europe, the Foreign Secretary and others.

We must also enhance business opportunities in the eastern European member-designate countries. We have a lot of companies out there. Let it not be only Tesco that has a supermarket in downtown Bratislava. Let us make sure that other British companies go to those countries and, by investing in them, contribute to the development of their economies.

My third point relates to the euro. A number of EU enlargement countries will watch with interest to see what happens by June. Some of those countries might be in a position to join the euro before us. While I do not wish to turn this into a debate on the euro, I hope that the Minister will try to persuade the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister to release a timetable so that new members-designate will have an understanding of what we intend to do once the assessments are completed by 7 June. If we are not going to have a referendum, we should know about that, and we should know if we are to have one. I am sure that Warsaw, Riga, Bratislava and Prague are all watching with interest to see what we do. It would be tragic if we were to join the euro after all those countries had joined.

My fourth point relates to a practical move that we could support in order to show that the members-designate are really part of the EU. I propose that we should support the moving of an EU institution or agency headquarters to one of the member-designate states after 1 May. I do not mind which it is, as long as one is moved. I am not suggesting that the European Parliament should move, but something should. We should show practical support for the new member-designate countries to ensure that they feel that they are part of Europe.

After 1 May, the centre of Europe will not be Brussels. It will probably be Prague, although I will not get out my measuring tape to find out how big the countries are. Perhaps the Minister and the bright young things from the Europe team will tell me if I am wrong. The fact is that the centre of Europe will shift, and if we accept the cogent arguments on Turkey advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly, it will move even further away from Brussels. It is important that we consider my proposal, because through it we would be able to demonstrate our support.

My hon. Friend ended with Turkey and I, too, shall end with a brief note on that country. It is right that we continue to give Turkey hope, but we should not raise its expectations to such an extent that we cannot deliver on the promises that we make to it. To be frank, it is not for George Bush to champion Turkey's membership of the EU; it is a matter for our country—we have done it in the past—and for other EU countries. We must step up our bilateral links with Turkey to ensure that when we talk genuinely about getting it into the EU, along with Romania and Bulgaria, we can back that up with examples of work that we have done.

The debate is important. I hope that it will become an annual debate. That will provide us with an opportunity next year to be on the doorstep of history preparing for that huge enlargement that will transform Europe for ever.

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston): The Copenhagen summit was an historic achievement. Apart from allowing the accession of 10 applicant states into the EU, it put forward an excellent financial package for those countries. Some £25 billion will be given over the period 2004 to 2006 but, while that will help those applicant countries, that sum is only 0.1 per cent. of Europe's GDP. As my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) said earlier, more than a decade ago six of the 10 applicant states did not exist. Since breaking away from communist rule, those countries have integrated themselves into world and European markets, something that many of us could not have imagined 15 years ago when they were still part of the Soviet empire.

The previous century witnessed wars across Europe; not only the two world wars, but 50 years of cold war and conflict over Cyprus. It seems that the prospect of Cyprus entering the European Union has united the country; it is a fantastic opportunity. If we can secure agreement on the Kofi Annan plan before the accession takes place, a united Cyprus will exist within the EU and the path will be clearer for Turkey to join later.

For European countries, the first 50 years of the last century were about survival. Governments had to deal with unemployment, ill health, poor housing and insecurity. The second 50 years, for western Europe at least, were about consumerism, from the sale of music records in the 1950s to the CDs and computers that we enjoy today.

For about 40 of those years, applicant countries experienced direct communist rule from Moscow. The changes in those countries over the past 10 to 15 years have been amazing. NATO will guarantee those countries security and peace for the foreseeable future and the European Union will provide them with economic prosperity and security. Relationships with neighbouring countries that were hostile in the past should now be secure.

Membership of the European Union will bring many advantages. As my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly said, we are now in a win-win position. The GDP of new members will increase by approximately 19 per cent. in the medium term. As I said earlier, six of the member states did not even exist in the past and none of the countries sharing a border with communist Poland now exists in the same form. The change has been entirely peaceful with no borders affected and no populations expelled in the process.

In the past year, the European Union spent €40 million helping Slovenia to prepare for membership, and €440 million on reconstructing Kosovo. Those figures cannot begin to convey the tragedy of what Mr. Milosevic did to Yugoslavia. If the enlargement of the European Union can prevent such a tragedy from ever happening again, it will be a testament to the European future. Co-operation on trafficking in people and drugs will take place on a scale never before seen, which is welcomed by all member states.

Some people in this country are worried about migration into the UK from these applicant countries, but let us examine the examples of Spain and Portugal. When Spain joined the EU in 1986, 109,000 Spanish workers were based in France. By 1994, the figure had fallen to 35,000. The sort of economic migration that happens through desperation will be inhibited by the development of these applicant countries, which will feel more secure and provide their people with more opportunities.

If we can bring Europe together under the EU, we shall be able to work much more closely with the United States and present a common force for good to the world. We do not want an inward-looking EU of just 25 members, or even an EU that is aligned to the United States of America and just looks after its own economic problems. There are pressing problems in today's world. We need to develop Africa, a continent that is going backwards and has suffered from famine and underdevelopment for hundreds of years. We can begin to deal seriously with the HIV epidemic in southern Africa that will bring death and destruction in many communities. We can begin to look at stabilising the middle east, as the United States and Europe together have the political will and economic might to ensure that that is done in a way that we have never seen before. Most importantly, especially given the problems that we face in Iraq, we can strengthen the United Nations.

The Convention on the Future of Europe will determine the architecture for a Europe of 25. If that Europe can get an architecture of government and method of multinational decision and law making that is far superior to anything that any continent in the world has seen, we can look towards reforming the United Nations. We can work out how it can adopt EU best practice in order to work with organisations such as the World Trade Organisation, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to create world order that provides stability for places such as Africa and Asia and make the world a much better place.

An EU of 25 will give the United Kingdom far more influence. Many applicant countries are Anglo-centric and look to the UK, and the USA, for support and co-operation; militarily in the past and economically, I believe, in the future. The Franco-German axis will decline, and some of Mr. Chirac's recent comments seem like the scream of a dying baby. There will be new dynamics in the decision-making processes as a result of the change in the composition of the Council of Ministers and in the European Parliament. The family of Europe will be reunited.

We look forward to a Europe of peace, prosperity and influence. I welcome the changes that are taking place.

2.37 pm

Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife): I, too, offer my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) on securing the debate. I will not take too much time, but I am grateful to make a contribution to an important debate.

I recognise the importance of the decisions that were taken in Copenhagen on 12 and 13 December and the significant challenges, and benefits, that they bring. My hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly identified each country by name, including Poland, and I want to make some comments on my interests in Poland. They go far beyond the fact that my wife comes from a Polish family or that I heard many stories from my late father-in-law about the challenges that Poland faced over the years and the benefits seen in a much-rejuvenated Poland, which my hon. Friend also noted.

In recent informal discussions with the Polish ambassador Stanislaw Komorowski, who has now become a good friend, he told me that he did not see the process of Poland joining the EU as one in which only Poland and the Polish people received the benefits. He saw it as an opportunity for Poland to give something back to the EU, which is an important message. It made me think about the other countries that will join the EU, which, with their individual styles and opportunities, will make their contributions to a much stronger and more stable Europe.

I can mention one obvious opportunity that will arise from Poland's membership. We are all aware of the fact that Poland has large agricultural potential. The development of that potential would release great benefits to the European Union. Everyone accepts, and has commented at one stage or another, that it is hardly acceptable that just over 50 per cent. of the total European budget is spent inefficiently through the common agricultural policy. With Poland becoming a member of the EU, the contribution of its agricultural capability should be seen as an opportunity, not a threat. That is one example of a benefit of membership.

I should like to refer to stability, which other Members have mentioned, and to history. The European challenge of recent times is vastly different from that posed by the Europe that we knew; everyone recognises that. Not too long ago, the shape of the European Union was entirely different. My hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly referred to the number of countries that emerged at the end of the cold war. The break up of the USSR and the situation that arose after Germany became a unified country again all presented different challenges and threats to Europe's shape. The 10 countries in the process of accession will give a strong and good message to other countries in Europe.

When East and West Germany were merged, the hopes of the East Germans were raised considerably during the merger, but were difficult to meet. There is a danger that if a merger is not made quickly, aspiration will quickly turn to disillusionment and to the feeling of being unsettled, which can cause further problems to a Europe that is already experiencing instability. The opportunity for stability offered by enlargement should not be understated.

The fact that we have a larger Europe today gives us greater opportunity to see the benefits of working together; rather than the alternative, which is a referral to the power base of military control. I agree that enlargement gives us the opportunity to tackle challenges differently.

I welcome today's discussion. Much has been said, and the problems facing Africa have been referred to. Opportunities will arise from a strong message being sent from the 10 accession countries, including Bulgaria, Romania, Cyprus and Turkey, the challenges of which have yet to be addressed. With a good success rate for those 10 countries, other challenges can be taken on board.

A dear friend, Bruce Millan, who was a well-respected Commissioner in Europe, once said to me, "If the only reason that you are in Europe, John, is to put £5 in and take £5 out, you are wasting your time. It is much more sophisticated than that." I hope that we get that message out to the public, and debates such as this one and publicity from them are essential. During a surgery that I held last Friday in my constituency, I met 34 constituents in an hour and a half. Not one of them mentioned Turkey, or the fact that Cyprus and Poland were about to become members of the EU. That is significant. The subject is not high on the public agenda, so we must promote the importance of a stable Europe to each and every one of us; not just in the UK, but throughout the world.

I look forward to the annual event that my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly has inaugurated in the hope that, next year, the situation will be much more progressive than it is at present and that we can meet many of the challenges that lie ahead. I also look forward very much to my hon. Friend the Minister's response at the end of the debate.

2.45 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Central Fife (Mr. MacDougall). He highlighted the fact that the applicant countries see the process as being not simply about taking something from Europe or getting their share of Europe, but about how they can contribute to the process as well. Before I go any further, I congratulate the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David), who has made something of a specialty out of EU enlargement. He has raised it in this Chamber before, and I commend him for doing so again, particularly at this important time.

As has been mentioned, the debate follows on from the seminar that the Minister hosted at the Foreign Office this morning. That welcome initiative reinforces his credentials as one who is keen for the enlargement debate not simply to be dealt with by Ministers and officials, but to be engaged in by Parliament and, indeed, the whole country. As the hon. Member for Central Fife remarked, people do not come to surgeries to complain about EU enlargement. I fear that people in this country know very little about it, so we all have a duty to ensure that that is corrected and that people face some of the big changes that will occur as a result of enlargement in just over a year's time.

The Liberal Democrats, like the other parties represented here, have supported enlargement throughout the process. We believe that the principles that have applied to successive enlargements over the past 50 years also apply to this one. In the past, we have debated quite regularly the underpinning that the EU gives to the security of Europe. For those countries that are about to join and which have, like us, clear and long memories of what war in Europe was all about and the dangers associated with the cold war settlement afterwards, this is a huge breakthrough—a major development for them and us. Often, we run the risk of forgetting just how important keeping the peace in Europe is and the role that the EU as a collection of nation states plays in that endeavour.

For many of the countries about to join the EU, the importance of joining is what it says about the state of their democracy and the opportunity that they have further to enhance their democracies and to instil the values that go with it in the modern form of their countries. Perhaps the most often cited and important aspect of enlargement in most people's eyes, however, is the economic benefits that will flow from it. There are many different estimates of the impact that enlargement will have, but recent ones raise the possibility of 300,000 additional jobs throughout the EU and a substantial boost of some £2 billion to overall GDP. At the seminar that the Minister hosted this morning, the director-general of the CBI, Digby Jones, talked about the enlargement giving Europe more clout. That is always welcome in the world, particularly in the era of the WTO and developments in trade that are so important to all our communities.

Since we had a chance to debate this topic here last year, much has changed. As the hon. Member for Caerphilly pointed out, huge progress was made at the Copenhagen summit just before the end of the year. The European Parliament will soon consider the accession treaties, which each member state will then consider. Referendums in each of the applicant countries are due to be held by September. There was considerable concern about what had to be achieved when we debated the issue 12 months ago, and we must not underestimate what has been covered since then. However, it would be equally remiss of us to ignore some of the key issues that remain to be resolved in the next year or so.

Internally, enlargement presents a great challenge to existing member states. Some 10 days ago, I was in Brussels holding discussions with various officials and Commission departments and directorates. It is clear that the issue is focusing minds like nothing else. There are huge issues to be resolved in key areas such as the CAP and regional policy before 2004—the 10 new states should come on board in May, the European Parliament elections are due in June, and the new Commission will be announced later that year.

The officials whom I met in Brussels talked a very confident game about sorting out the details of the reform of the CAP in time for the June Agriculture Council. I would be interested to know the Minister's opinion, because if those details are sorted out, we will have to make substantial progress in a very short space of time on key issues such as decoupling, modulation and degressivity, all of which remain unresolved issues of concern in the United Kingdom.

The same is true of regional policy. The third cohesion report is due later in the year, as are the recommendations on the development of the policy. I understand that recommendations and contributions to that process are due by the summer break, and I hope that the Minister and his colleagues in other Departments will ensure that they and each interested body throughout the UK participate fully in that debate. The emphasis will shift with enlargement in a year's time, but it is clear that regional policy has an important relevance to this country, especially to peripheral areas. Will the Minister state the Government's policy stance as the negotiations head towards their conclusion?

The focus may be inward for existing members, but there is plenty for the applicant countries to be getting on with. Commissioner Verheugen recently pointed out that there is still a great deal of work to be done to build administrative capacity and to ensure that all the key parts of the Government machinery are in place to deal with issues such as corruption and the integration of minorities in some applicant countries. Much progress has been made on those issues in the course of the enlargement process. All that work must now come together.

Several contributors to today's debate highlighted issues relating to particular applicant countries. It is right that we spend time considering Cyprus, where affairs are very delicately balanced. We should pay tribute to the work of Kofi Annan, Secretary-General of the United Nations, who has invested a considerable amount of his own time and prestige to the creation and development of the proposals currently before the two communities in Cyprus. His initiative is important and we now await the response from the two parts of the island. As has been mentioned, 10 March is an important new deadline for those developments. We must hope that the prize of enlargement is strong enough, and is on sufficiently good terms, to resolve many difficulties that beset that beautiful place.

However, we cannot ignore the fact that there are issues in countries other than Cyprus that, although less fraught, could also cause problems. The Minister has a great fondness for Poland, which I know is shared by many in the Chamber. We cannot ignore the difficulties facing the Polish Government with the departure of the Polish Peasant party from government. Poland's Prime Minister remains confident that that will not cause any problems for the accession process. I hope that he is right. We wish that country every success.

In other key players, such as the Czech Republic and, in particular, Hungary, there is some nervousness and evidence in opinion polls that support for enlargement is not quite what it once was. I do not believe that the outcome in those countries is seriously in doubt but we, as well as their Governments, must send strong signals from outside to say that we look forward to welcoming them into a larger family of nations in Europe and that we hope that that can be achieved on time.

My final point on individual countries has already been mentioned this afternoon. It is not on applicant countries, but on France. This is not a debate on Iraq, but just as I would deplore efforts by the United States to twist arms and bully people into supporting a particular line, I find it reprehensible that France should attempt to skew the debate and blackmail particular countries on their prospects of joining the EU on account of their position on developments in Iraq. Each of those countries has earned its position in Europe: each has met the tests and criteria and is making strenuous efforts to come to terms with the new Europe of which they will be part. Bullying by one of the oldest members is surely inappropriate, and we must resist attempts to do that.

The enlargement process has often travelled a bumpy road, but we should reflect on the fact that in the past few years—and the past 12 months in particular—the European Union has made fantastic process. We still need to get our own house in order and we must support the applicants. Then, together, we can look forward to seeing a revolutionised European Union in just over a year's time.

2.58 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): I, too, warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) on securing and introducing this debate. He is a passionate advocate of enlargement and enjoys the respect of all hon. Members for that commitment and for his profound knowledge of the subject. Of course, his concerns are shared not only by the House but by the 70 million citizens of the accession countries.

We have had a good debate and I congratulate the hon. Members for Preston (Mr. Hendrick) and for Central Fife (Mr. MacDougall) and the Liberal Democrat Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore), on their thoughtful contributions. It was a particular joy to hear from the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz). I remember seeing him selling the attractions of the EU by travelling the country in a bus, which greatly added to the country's political scene, even though, if I remember correctly, his attempts to sell the euro to the British people during that campaign resulted in the greatest quantum leap in lack of support for the euro among the British people seen in the past five years. Nevertheless, it is always a great pleasure to hear from him.

Enlargement is of huge importance, as everyone has said. We hope that it will extend stability and prosperity to many millions of our fellow Europeans. We welcome the outcome at Copenhagen and congratulate the Danish presidency on orchestrating that summit. The process of enlargement has been too long and complicated, and Turkey's membership, which we support, has not been universally encouraged, but Copenhagen was an historic achievement We hope that next year we shall see the division of Europe that has lasted since Yalta healed. Speaking personally, I believe not only that that is politically and economically desirable, but that it is a moral imperative.

The accession countries have made great strides on their own since the fall of the Berlin wall, but enlargement opens further prospects. Participation will offer the countries full access to a single market and structural funds. Although I am not always an admirer of regional funding from the EU, my discussions with many eastern European politicians, civil servants and business men leave me in no doubt that structural funding offers hope for progress in developing eastern Europe's infrastructure, which needs to be updated in some respects. For example, the hon. Member for Caerphilly will know that Poland's roads are notoriously poor. How much more productive and efficient would Poland's economy be if businesses had access to improved roads?

Enlargement does not only hold out the promise of great economic prosperity for the accession countries; it must be admitted that one of the EU's great successes has been its ability to stabilise young democracies and root them in the ways of a free society. We only need consider the way in which, over time, Greece, Spain and Portugal have succeeded in that respect, and I hope that that will happen for the accession countries as well. Success after enlargement is not assured. All European countries must be in a position to generate wealth, and that will not happen while the EU remains a zone strangled with mounting red tape, afraid of the economic flexibility that creates jobs.

The atypical workers directive is typical of the sort of EU legislation that can only hurt employment creation in the long-term. The EU's high-cost employment practices are the last thing that prospective EU members need. Those countries need to use their currently lower-cost labour forces to build prosperity, and we must let them do so. Regrettably, it is universally recognised throughout the EU that the process that the Prime Minister set in train in Lisbon is stuttering. We must ensure that the EU is fit to meet the challenges posed by enlargement. Otherwise, the accession countries may find that EU membership is more of an economic prison than a liberating market, and heaven forbid that they should ever think that.

The CAP must be fundamentally reformed—something that the Government have lamentably been unable to drive forward. Nothing has made the negotiations on enlargement more bitter than the need to shoehorn the accession states into the failing CAP. Likewise, it has been said to me abroad that the former communist countries do not want to see control from Moscow replaced by control from Brussels. Countries that have only recently regained their independence do not want to use it to enter some sort of supranational state. However, as we saw in the draft constitution, the supranational structures that are being prepared in the Convention on the Future of Europe clearly point to that. I am aware that the final version might look rather different at the intergovernmental conference, but the overall tendency is fundamentally integrationist. That is not the sort of EU in which the new states will feel comfortable.

Indeed, one may question the wisdom of transforming the EU just as the new states arrive. No one should question the need for fundamental reform in the EU—that is widely recognised—but the new states should be full participants in the process. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale. I, too, found France's bullying, implied threats that it might veto the accession countries' EU membership unless they toed the French line absolutely disgraceful. Does the Minister agree with Chris Patten that the EU > "is not the Warsaw pact. It is a club for equals and everyone has to be listened to"?

President Chirac's remarks make it harder for the accession states to participate in the debate on Europe's future as equals. That is an important point.

The president of the Convention on the Future of Europe has said that he wants the Convention treaty to provide the EU's framework for the next 50 years. If the new countries are to live in the house that Giscard and the Convention have built, they have as much right to determine its design as anyone else. For that reason, it is urgent that the IGC agrees that the new treaty should not be decided on until accession countries are full members of the EU. It would certainly be totally unacceptable if the IGC were to take place this December, when full accession was still some months off; that would be inequitable. I hope that the Minister will reflect on that point and respond to it in his winding-up speech.

We have extraordinarily close links with Cyprus. I salute President Clerides and his efforts over many years, and I welcome Tassos Papadopoulos's presidency. I have had the pleasure of meeting him and discussing the reunification of the island with him. That much hoped-for reunification is in danger, even though one of the great hopes of accession was that it would prove a vehicle and stimulus for the island's reunification. We all want the united island to enter the EU.

I hope that the Minister will tell us more about what the Government are doing to assist reunification, particularly at this crucial time. At the very least, the Government have not kept Parliament properly informed about their offer to hand over almost half of the sovereign base areas' territory to a reunited Cyprus. Whatever the Government's motives, the handover of British sovereign territory is serious, and the Government have failed to tell the House all that they should.

Why did the announcement of the offer of British territory come through the UN, when it could have been made in Parliament the next day? Why, in the written answer that the Minister gave me on 27 January, was no hint given that the offer might be made, even though the open nature of the question gave ample opportunity to do so? Was the offer under consideration when the answer was given? Why, when my noble Friend Lord Howell asked on 14 January whether the UN peace plan would affect arrangements for the bases, did the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, Baroness Symons, deny that it would? Was she aware of the offer, and if not, how much time was given to considering the offer before it was made?

What assessment has been made by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Ministry of Defence of the effect that the offer will have on their operational capability, particularly at this crucial time, knowing the strategic importance of Cyprus in the eastern Mediterranean? It was apparent that there was inadequate consultation between the two Departments about Gibraltar, and the Minister for Europe must tell us what consultation the Foreign Office has had with the Ministry of Defence on this matter. Parliament deserves answers, and I hope that the Minister can provide some enlightenment.

My party wants enlargement to succeed. We want an EU that is fit for enlargement and the challenges of the 21st century. It must be flexible enough to accommodate its diversities and must be a union for its peoples, and not its leaders. People must feel a sense of ownership of the EU and its institutions and architecture. The Convention was meant to bring the EU closer to its peoples, but it seems to be doing the contrary, and the Government now seem to be taken aback about their position. All countries should have a referendum on the constitution, and that includes the accession states. That would help to ensure that those states can participate in the debate as equals.

If we can successfully reform Europe's economies, transform the common agricultural policy into something enduring, and—this is crucial—build Europe from the bottom up, not the top down, enlargement will do great things for our continent. I want an enlarged European Union to be a success. To achieve that, we must deal with the problems of today, not the challenges of yesterday.

3.9 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): This has been a very good debate. It is appropriate that it follows an excellent seminar and conference on enlargement at the Foreign Office this morning. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) on securing the debate and hon. Members on the quality of their speeches.

I shall start with the last speech, by the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring), who I believe was in favour of enlargement but did not seem to be terribly much in favour of the European Union. Therein lies the eternal contradiction in Conservative thinking on this great issue.

The remark of President Chirac, whose position is held by many in France, including some of his Ministers, that has most upset people in east Europe is that there should be a referendum on the next stage of European construction. Countries in east Europe are rightly concerned that if the existing nations of the European Union were to hold referendums on the matter—referendums which are not called for under their constitutions—all the anti-Europeans could combine to produce a no vote and enlargement would not take place. I merely caution the hon. Gentleman before he starts running with the referendum line that is put forward by people in this country who are not normally associated with a pro-European position, that he might do a serious disservice to the process of enlargement and the successful working of an enlarged European Union, which are the tasks of the Convention and the intergovernmental conference.

The hon. Gentleman seems to be unaware that a commitment was given at the Copenhagen Council that the incoming member states will be full participants in the intergovernmental conference. They are not voting members of the Convention, but they have observer status there and we look forward to working with them as voting members in the intergovernmental conference.

To return to the main subject of the debate, we had a very powerful speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly, who made the case for enlargement and stressed that it is a win-win process. We really must break free of the mentality that it is in some way a zero sum game, in which Britain and other member countries will lose.

That point was also very powerfully made by my hon. Friend the Member for Central Fife (Mr. MacDougall), who, like me, has a Polish family connection. It has been remarkable to see the Polish community in Great Britain turn with enthusiasm to the leadership offered by the Prime Minister. They realise that the enlargement of the European Union for which he has fought so valiantly is good for their native country. Last Friday, the Polish ambassador, who is one of the most dynamic and effective ambassadors in London, and I had the pleasure of opening Sheffield's Europe week at the Dom Kombatanta ex-servicemen's club for Polish veterans. It was a very lively and positive occasion.

We had a contribution from my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), whom I had the honour to serve as a Parliamentary Private Secretary in two of the more interesting, ebullient and, at times, turbulent years in the office of the Minister for Europe during this or any previous Administration. Yes, he boldly went into the countryside with buses, certificates, flare and fun and challenged the British people to think seriously about Europe. With his inside knowledge, he was able to describe the immense complexities of day-to-day business. I long for the time when speeches are not read out by rote and when our very bright officials who work for the Foreign Office and, though British nationals, as European civil servants for the European Commission and Council are not buried under paper.

Keith Vaz: The hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) mentioned the campaign bus. Of course, the bus went to Rotherham. Was he upset that it did not go to Bury St. Edmunds?

Mr. Spring: That is not in my constituency.

Mr. MacShane: The first roadshow took place in my constituency, Rotherham, and I think that I can safely say that it was downhill all the way after that.

Some important points were made about the need for parliamentarians to build networks and links. I have been holding talks with the British Council and have asked about arranging seminars that involve parliamentarians of all parties—this is not a party-political issue—building links with their opposite numbers in the incoming countries. It was also suggested that an EU agency or institution might be moved to east Europe or one of the incoming member states. I am sure that they will be the first in the queue when the new agencies are allocated.

If, as we hope, Malta and Cyprus come into the EU after their referendums—and how much we long for a united Cyprus to do that—two Commonwealth countries will be added to the membership. Their accession will re-orient some of the focus of the EU towards the Mediterranean. In recent years, there has—rightly—been an obsession with east and central Europe, but the EU also has a great role to play in the Mediterranean.

As I have plenty of time in which to speak, I would like to commend a book that I have just received called "Orient Express", Published by Oxford Brookes university. It was edited by Fiona Sampson, who writes:

> "as Europe shifts on her axis again, the critical mass of the E.U. Enlargement Countries is what engenders this shift. And resists the forces of globalisation by its insistence on the particular, on the coloured-in detail of what is characteristic."

The book is a collection of novels, short stories, poems and essays and shows the immense cultural contribution that will be made by the enlargement countries and to which we can look forward. The advantage for us is that, on the whole, if people from those countries have a second language, it is likely to be English, which will provide a further set of bridges between our great European country and the new, but at the same time very old, European countries and cultures that are about to join us.

As always, my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hendrick) made a very positive speech. I hope that the Foreign Office will shortly announce further work to promote the value of enlargement and the need for Britain not only to be the champion of enlargement, but to build enduring economic and political links—we are also talking about local government—with the incoming countries. I hope that hon. Members from all parties will want to play a part in that policy.

The hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) had some rather harsh words to say about the President of the French Republic. I invite him to come to the annual general meeting of the Franco-British Council, which will take place in two hours at the Foreign Office. Some four or five months ago, I accepted an invitation to give the keynote speech under the heading "France and Britain: towards a new era of co-operation in international and foreign policy", which just goes to show that my speech this afternoon is merely a curtain-raiser to what is, in some ways, a more interesting challenge lying ahead.

Judging from the position adopted by the Liberal Democrats and certainly their leader, I rather thought that the hon. Gentleman was lining up with President Chirac in not supporting the view of Her Majesty's Government that firm action must be taken against the dictator, terrorist and tyrant of Baghdad.

Mr. Spring: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Moore: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. MacShane: I will take the intervention from the representative of the biggest Opposition party.

Mr. Spring: I want to take up a point that I thought was legitimately made by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), who talked about moving some of the European Union's institutions to a base further from its western side. Could the Minister suggest to our French partners this afternoon that European taxpayers could save themselves a vast amount of money by closing down Strasbourg and moving it further east?

Mr. MacShane: The notion that I have the power to close down any city is flattering but, alas, it is beyond my capability to do so. The plain answer is no. Strasbourg is the seat of European reconciliation. It was agreed in the treaty signed by the hon. Gentleman's former boss, the former right hon. Member for Huntingdon, when he was Prime Minister that 12 plenary sessions would take place in Strasbourg. Therefore, once again, the Government are stuck with treaties signed by the Conservative party in a fit of pro-Strasbourg passion.

The hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale is right: both centres need to be reformed, and both will be under huge pressure to reform. I warn him only that it cannot be assumed that all the incoming members will automatically be on the side of reform, especially of the CAP. When the cheques arrive from Brussels, that immediately becomes a seductive inducement to favour the CAP. That is why I have always said that it is no use this country and this House endlessly condemning the CAP—we are all in agreement on that. Instead, we must find ways of building alliances with our sister parties, our national farmers' unions must find ways of discussing the matter with other countries' farmers' organisations, and the Churches, Oxfam and other non-governmental organisations must find ways of talking in French and Spanish with their opposite numbers to build a coalition for effective reform.

The same is true of regional funds. Clearly, the incoming members will reduce average GDP per capita of the EU as a whole. Many of the regions of the UK that have become eligible for forms of regional funds will lose that eligibility. We must now have a serious discussion about funding and support for the regional development that we as a country want, and how we factor those ideas into the wider European question.

We should welcome enlargement. I was impressed by the speech of Digby Jones, the director-general of the Confederation of British Industry, at this morning's seminar when he talked movingly about his visit to east and central Europe. He said that, although those with whom he spoke were pro-trade and pro-business, they also saw the European Union in terms of peace and democracy. We should not lose sight of that idealism and those values. The EU is founded on the principle of establishing peace in our continent. At a time when there is much talk of war, it is no bad thing to remind ourselves of the dictatorship and terror that Europe has seen in our lifetime, and the wars that it saw in our parents' lifetime.

Mr. Hendrick: Was my hon. Friend, like me, impressed by what Digby Jones said about the harmonisation of technical standards and regulations across Europe and the way in which that, together with the work that has gone on at the European institutions, had made the European single market successful?

Mr. MacShane: Indeed, and reference was made this morning to an article in, I think, today's Financial Times by two American Republican spokespersons, who said that the argument is not for or against regulation—the primitive caricature that we heard in one closing speech today—but about the type of regulation that is introduced. There are times when regulation is necessary. For example, to guarantee safety in aviation is the only way to liberalise air markets.

We do not want to go back to each country in Europe erecting its own norms and standards and refusing to admit commerce and trade in goods, services and economic exchange unless they correspond to purely nationally defined norms. It costs Europe far less financially, politically and socially to support its neighbours' transitions to stable democracies and open economies than to rebuild them after conflict. Compare how much money we had to spend after the Milosevic savagery in the former Yugoslavia with the relatively painless and much less costly entry of Slovenia into the European Union.

I was asked about Croatia. Both Croatia and Macedonia have recently made applications to be considered as applicant countries. They will be treated in the same way as other applicant countries, but I believe that in the case of Croatia, the road to Europe lies through The Hague. In my judgment, strong compliance with the demand that those in Croatia who are alleged to have committed war crimes be sent to The Hague would undoubtedly speed up Croatia's being taken seriously as an applicant for formal EU accession.

Membership of the EU will bring immediate economic benefits to the new member states. It will create a single market of 450 million people and there will be new markets for UK business. UK exports to central Europe increased by 19 per cent. between 1999 and 2000, and by 25 per cent. with the Czech Republic and Hungary in the same period. There are 15,000 British companies exporting to or investing in the region.

However, the preparations for enlargement are already obliging all those in the existing and the incoming member states to raise our standards so that we can tackle jointly the problems that cross borders, including pollution, drug smuggling and people trafficking. Candidates are making major improvements to air and water quality to meet EU standards. Beaches around Cyprus, where nearly 1.5 million UK tourists go each year, are being brought up to EU standards. Thanks to co-operation between UK and Czech officials, a major drugs-related money-laundering operation was closed down a couple of years ago. We need to keep working to maintain those levels of co-operation

I conclude by turning to the important matter of Cyprus. I will seek to address the points raised by the hon. Member for West Suffolk, who sneaked the issue of sovereign base areas into the debate. I am happy to write to him in detail. I would have been happy to make a statement in the House had I been asked to. I am content that the decisions taken late in the day—when I replied to the question to which he referred, I knew nothing of the proposal—were made in good faith to show British willingness to contribute to arriving at an agreement that will be supported by both the Turkish and the Greek-Cypriot communities on the island.

Our policy is that we want a united Cyprus to join the European Union. We think that the Annan proposals, for which the jargon term is "Annan 3", deserve support. We hope that Mr. Denktash and President Papadopoulos will support them and that their colleagues and friends in Athens and Ankara will also make it clear that Cyprus is going to enter the European Union under any conditions—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. O'Hara): Order. I was thinking that the reference made by the Minister to British policy towards Cyprus is only relevant to the debate in that it contributes to a solution to the Cyprus problem, which means that a united Cyprus can enter the enlarged Europe. Will the Minister bear that in mind?

Mr. MacShane: You are quite right, Mr. Deputy Speaker. No one has greater knowledge of the Hellenic aspects of the Cypriot question than you. It is important to stress—as Commissioner Verheugen did this morning—that we want a united Cyprus to enter the European Union, but if for any reason Mr. Denktash or others fail to agree to the Annan proposals, Cyprus will still enter the European Union. That is an important point that is worth putting clearly on the record. It is one aspect of European Union enlargement that I hope is contributing to a more secure east Mediterranean.

The Government will work to support enlargement. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly on securing this important debate.

Asylum seekers (Leeds)

3.30 pm

Mr. Fabian Hamilton (Leeds, North-East): I am grateful for the chance to debate this issue of great humanitarian importance and current controversy. The debate centres on section 55 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002, which reads:

"(1) The Secretary of State may not provide or arrange for the provision of support to a person under a provision mentioned in subsection (2) if-

(a) the person makes a claim for asylum which is recorded by the Secretary of State, and

(b) the Secretary of State is not satisfied that the claim was made as soon as reasonably practicable after the person's arrival in the United Kingdom."

I want to concentrate on the phrase

"as soon as reasonably practicable"

this afternoon. Before going any further I want to stress that the debate is not intended to be a swipe at or indeed a criticism of the Government. My aim is to be helpful by pointing out that that phrase has had unintended consequences on genuine refuges fleeing persecution in their native countries.

I represent a highly multicultural constituency, as my hon. Friend the Minister will know. In the eight advice surgeries that I hold each month around north-east Leeds, I see many asylum and immigration cases. From time to time I come across cases where the asylum system has been abused by those who fail to have visas extended or, as the Home Secretary has said, have tried to use the asylum system to gain financial support when they have run out of other options. I support the principle that Parliament should discourage those who seek to exploit this country's hitherto generous support for asylum seekers for their own dishonest purposes. I know that that was the intention of the Act.

However, the reality has been somewhat different. I believe that that is because the phrase has sometimes been unreasonably interpreted by officials in immigration centres throughout the country, and especially in Leeds where my sample cases are based and where I am a parliamentary representative.

The immigration centre to which I refer is in Waterside, Kirkstall road, west Leeds, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). In that centre, as in many others throughout the country, the interpretation of section 55 of the 2002 Act, since it came into force on 8 January this year, has forced destitute new asylum seekers on to the streets of Leeds. Were it not for the generosity and humanity of church members who are involved in the refugee education, training and advice service in Leeds, many more people fleeing persecution in their own countries would be homeless and freezing on the streets of Leeds. As of yesterday, 73 such persons were destitute without support from the National Asylum Support Service.

I understand that there has been a temporary relaxation since Mr. Justice Collins gave his judgment on 19 February and that many of those who were destitute are now in official centres. However, there is deep concern about what would happen if the Home Secretary won his appeal and those people had to be ejected from their accommodation. The judgment was on the cases of six asylum seekers who had been refused support under the 2002 Act and who made a claim under the European convention on human rights. The judgment angered the Home Secretary who, not unreasonably, felt that it was the job of Parliament to make the laws of the land and to debate those laws and that it was not the job of the courts to undermine that legislation. The Home Secretary appealed and we await the outcome of that appeal, which was heard yesterday.

Section 55 was introduced as a Government amendment to the Bill in the House of Lords and was not mentioned in the preceding White Paper. Introducing the Government amendment, Lord Filkin said:

"The new clause ends the presumption of support for those who apply for asylum in country unless they can give a truthful and credible account of their circumstances and how they arrived here and can therefore demonstrate that they are claiming asylum at the earliest possible opportunity."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 October 2002; Vol. 639, c. 978.]

On 5 November, the Home Secretary said:

"The question is how reasonable we are regarding the people who come here but do not claim asylum at the port of entry. We need to be reasonable and to take into account the trauma that people experience. We need therefore to allow a reasonable period before we presume that people have come into the country for another reason and have been sustaining themselves and that when they could no longer do so they decided that the asylum system would sustain them, being far more generous than the equivalent something-for-something, welfare-to-work system."—[Official Report, 5 November 2002; Vol. 392, c. 199.]

Following Royal Assent on 7 November 2002, my hon. Friend the Minister made a written statement to the High Court about section 55, in which she said that it would come into force on 8 January 2003. She said:

"It will not be acceptable for an asylum seeker wanting NASS support to postpone making an asylum claim unless there is a very good reason for doing so. Even if there is a good reason for not claiming asylum immediately on arrival at the port, the person must then claim asylum as soon as possible thereafter."

She went on to say that the Secretary of State must be satisfied

"that the person claiming support has made the asylum claim as soon as reasonably practicable after arrival in the United Kingdom."

I now want to demonstrate that a number of individuals who, for one reason or another arrived in the city of Leeds, made their asylum claim as soon as was reasonably practical after their arrival in the UK and yet were denied any support under the 2002 Act.

As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, often the only way for someone suffering extreme persecution to flee their country is to use what we would call people traffickers; men and women who make a living out of supplying forged documents and enabling those desperate to leave their countries to go to places where they will be safe and can find refuge. Historically, Britain has offered refuge to so many people who have suffered persecution, yet the problem is reaching an unmanageable proportion and the Prime Minister has pledged that the numbers of applicants will be halved by the end of the year.

I will not give the real names of the individuals whose cases I recount. Marie is a 33-year-old French-speaking woman from Cameroon, which is officially listed as a safe country. She was held in prison for 12 years as an opposition activist, along with her husband, who has now disappeared. While in prison she was tortured; she was finally released in autumn 2002. She believes that her husband is probably now dead but has no way of finding out what happened to him.

Shortly after her release, she received a police summons ordering her to appear at the local police station. Not unnaturally, she was very frightened and her mother advised her to leave the country as soon as she could. She sold her family home and paid the money to a trafficker—often called an agent by refugees—to get her to French-speaking Quebec in Canada. Although she is not Muslim, she was told by the Libyan agent to dress as a Muslim woman and wear a burqa, and she was brought to London via Algeria. She was told that she had arrived in Montreal and was not allowed to keep her false passport. She was virtually imprisoned in London for two weeks by the agent's wife, after which she was brought to Leeds on a train.

While they were walking through the station concourse in Leeds, the agent told her that he had left his wallet on the train and ran back to fetch it. He said he would be a few minutes but, surprise, surprise, he never returned, leaving the woman stranded in Leeds city station without even knowing what country she was in. Marie cannot read or write; she speaks no English. After two hours she found some French-speaking people who told her she was in the north of England. She was taken to the refugee council in Leeds and then to Waterside, where she registered her application for asylum. Support was refused; either because officials did not believe her story or because she had not registered "as soon as was reasonably practicable". Currently, church members in Leeds are looking her after.

I would argue that Marie could not have been expected to claim asylum any earlier. She had genuinely believed she was in Canada until her arrival in Leeds. She had been told that she would not reach Quebec if she left the house in London, which she thought was in Montreal. I do not believe that her delay was unreasonable.

Rezgar is an Iraqi Kurd who has a serious speech impediment and is illiterate. He finds it hard to communicate, even in his own language, because many Kurds think that he is mentally ill when they hear him speak. He was deposited in Leeds from the lorry that brought him illegally to the United Kingdom, without being told where he was.

Rezgar spent three days sleeping rough on the streets of the city before finding a road sweeper who was a Kurdish speaker and took him to the police station, from where he was able to report to Waterside. It took him more than three hours to give the most basic information, after which he was told that he was applying too late to receive NASS support. I am glad to say that that decision was reversed three weeks later and Rezgar now receives that support but, in the meantime, he had to rely on the charity of local people. Was his delay really unreasonable?

My third case is that of Camille, who came to Leeds from the Democratic Republic of Congo—formerly Zaire—to find her mother, who had last been heard of in Leeds. Again, she came illegally on forged documents, because she was being persecuted for her political opposition to the regime in the Democratic Republic of Congo. That regime is known for its cruelty and persecution of the opposition. She was accompanied through immigration at Heathrow by her so-called agent, and then taken on the underground to central London, where she was put on a coach to Leeds.

Camille is educated, articulate and intelligent. I met her three weeks ago and heard her story at first hand. I speak French; she speaks no English. On arrival in Leeds, she asked for directions to Waterside. It took two hours for her to walk there, and once she had registered for asylum she was told that she had registered too late to be given any support. She was told how to find St. George's crypt, a church project for the homeless and destitute in central Leeds. She walked there, only to find that there were no beds available that night. She was given some food and a sleeping bag, and told to sleep on a park bench. It was a Friday night.

After three nights outdoors and being fed by the St. George's crypt project during the day, Camille managed to contact the refugee education, training and advice service, whose volunteers took her in and looked after her. The story has a happy ending, because her new friends managed to locate her mother in Coventry, where she now lives, having been given refugee status herself. However, I would argue that Camille's delay in registering was not unreasonable.

The response of the church network of volunteers to the growing number of asylum seekers on the streets of Leeds is, "We will do better than our Government." If people with genuine stories such as those are made destitute by section 55 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002, it is frustrating that a measure designed, quite reasonably in my view, to deter those who attempt to exploit our system, is forcing refugees with the most harrowing histories to become beggars on our streets, whether in Leeds or any other major city in the United Kingdom.

My reason for this debate is to ask the Minister to re-examine the guidance given to NASS officials. The guidance already says that each case must be considered on its merits, although none of the cases of which I have spoken appears to have been so considered. It also says that a person's circumstances must be taken into account.

Christopher Mace, the deputy director general of the immigration and nationality directorate of the Home Office, said in his statement, submitted by the Home Secretary to the High Court last month:

> "If those arriving at ports know that they must apply for asylum at the port then it will deter facilitators [so-called 'agents'] from bringing asylum seekers to the UK and thereby significantly reduce the incidence of this serious offence."

He said that the most frequent reason for failing to claim asylum at a port is obedience to the facilitator's instructions. However, as we have seen from the three cases that I mentioned, such a measure has made no difference to the people traffickers. As for the refugees themselves, how can they know what the rules are, if many cannot read, write or speak English?

[Mr. Fabian Hamilton]

My contention is that the Act, designed, rightly, to deter dishonest asylum seekers, is being unreasonably interpreted so that it ensures the complete destitution of many genuine asylum seekers. Even if a case subsequently fails, surely the UK can be more humane in the way in which it treats such people? The most important issue is to ensure the speedy processing of claims, rather than starving successful and failed asylum seekers alike or aiming to prevent them from coming here in the first place.

Finally, I hope that the Minister will be able to issue new guidance to officials, requesting that an interpretation of the phrase is not made unreasonably.

"as soon as reasonably practicable"

3.44 pm

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Hamilton) for introducing this sensitive subject and inviting me to say a few words in support. I also thank the Minister for her close attention to this complex and difficult issue. I hope that my remarks and those of my hon. Friend will help her to move forward rather than be obstructive.

Waterside is in my constituency, as are Leeds' main reception centre and a significant number of NASS agency houses for asylum seekers. I deal with individual cases every weekend, but the circumstances are much more difficult to manage if those who arrive by any means—many do not enter via our ports—are cut off from the customary systems with no options, no income, no home, no resources and no real friends, and forced out on the streets in the city centre at precisely the time that the Government and Leeds city council have done so well in tackling and reducing street homelessness.

During the Christmas recess, my hon. Friend and I spent a night out with the police, examining rough sleepers in the city centre. We found young people with homes to go to—many, tragically, drug addicts—out on the streets to acquire drugs or just for company. However, one city centre church voluntary project, which has provided a crypt facility with night hospitality for nearly 70 years, was recently refurbished and relaunched to tackle the problem of those remaining on the streets. The aim is to connect people back to the support systems to enable them to restart their lives.

The services of the St. George's crypt voluntary project are now overwhelmed by homeless asylum seekers who are sleeping rough and completely locked out from access to other support systems. Such people, if they are deemed not to have applied immediately, cannot be referred to social services or receive the income assistance of social security. The project now feels undermined in its objectives. It needs to be able to tell these people where they can go and who will be expected to support them, but it cannot.

Good-willed individuals, desperate to help the excluded asylum seekers, are put into an incredibly difficult position, receiving no assistance in the task of deciding whom to help by taking them into their homes, or, subsequently, how to help people on to the support systems. Adhering hard and fast to the rules causes problems; there seems to be no way out for anyone in this position.

I appreciate that we need a fair and firmly applied rule system with rules that are clearly understood by all parties, but I wholly support my hon. Friend and gently ask the Minister whether we can re-examine the unintended consequences that are so clearly undermining other social objectives and social inclusion in our cities.

3.48 pm

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Hamilton) on securing the debate and on the way in which he expressed his concerns this afternoon. Before I respond, I pay tribute to his diverse constituency work, and I want to assure him that I understand his problems; I am a constituency Member, too. My hon. Friend raised legitimate concerns that he is wholly free to express.

I should also like to thank the Yorkshire and Humberside consortium, which works in a strong partnership with us in trying to provide services and co-ordinate the work that we do together with the immigration and nationality directorate. This strong consortium does a great deal of good work.

As my hon. Friend said, the interpretation of section 55 is currently under consideration by the Court of Appeal, so it would not be appropriate for me to comment in detail on the way that we have operated the policy since it came into force on 8 January. Notwithstanding that, I hope that I can respond to some of the important points that he raised today.

I remind the Chamber that when Mr. Justice Collins handed down his judgment in the High Court on 19 February, he did not find that section 55 was unlawful or incompatible with the Human Rights Act 1998 or with any of our obligations under international law. His findings were that the circumstances of each case should be investigated in greater depth than he understood had been the case so far and that there should be more detailed questioning to give the claimant the opportunity to explain himself convincingly if he could. On the challenges to section 55 under the ECHR, he found that inquiries should be made to try to establish whether any support was likely to exist. Otherwise, there will normally be the risk that to leave someone destitute would violate articles 3 and 8.1 of the convention. Of course, all findings are subject to the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

I should like to explain briefly some of the background to the Government's decision to introduce section 55 during the passage of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002. It is one of several measures in that Act designed to overhaul fundamentally the immigration and asylum system. The aim was to tighten the process by getting claims considered and decisions made at a much earlier stage, and to ensure that support goes to those who need it. The real point of section 55 is to try to change people's behaviour so that asylum seekers make a claim immediately on arrival in the UK and, partly through that, to try to crack the power and control that some of the traffickers—to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East referred—have over people.

There is a clear difference between economic migrants and those fleeing persecution, and I am grateful that my hon. Friend acknowledged that it is not acceptable for people to claim asylum after being in the United Kingdom for some weeks or months simply as a way of staying here at the taxpayers' expense or of delaying removal. It is reasonable for us to expect people who flee persecution to claim asylum as soon as they get to the UK as a safe country, so section 55 prevents the Home Secretary from providing support to asylum seekers who have not made their claim when they arrive at a port in the UK or, if that is not possible for any good reason, as soon as possible afterwards. The provision is not retrospective, so those who applied for asylum before 8 January are not affected, but it applies to those who arrived in the United Kingdom before 8 January but did not make a claim by then.

My hon. Friend referred to my written statement of 28 November, which attempted to clarify the way in which section 55 would be implemented. I will not say that it is not a tough policy; it is a tough policy, and is meant to be. However, it has been applied fairly and there are important safeguards. Families with children are exempt, as are those who can show that they suffered treatment contrary to the European convention on human rights. Those with special needs continue to be supported by local authorities under the National Assistance Act 1948.

Before I turn to the specific points raised by my hon. Friend, it might help to explain briefly the way in which section 55 decisions on the timeliness of asylum claims have been made by caseworkers since 8 January. That is at the crux of his concern. Each case has been considered on its own merits, and decisions have been based on a thorough assessment of the individual circumstances and the credibility of the case as presented by the applicant during the screening interview. I accept that that involves caseworkers making a judgment on credibility, but there is no way around that. As my hon. Friend acknowledged, some people make up stories while others tell the truth, but we have to make a judgment about that credibility to take a decision. However, all section 55 decisions to refuse support are referred to the central NASS team in Croydon to ensure fairness and consistency in the decision-taking process. All decisions taken by caseworkers are reviewed at a senior level before they are confirmed. I stress that it is open to individuals to ask for their case to be reconsidered if there is further evidence, a change of circumstances or information that they believe has not been taken into account.

I do not know the identity of the people involved in the cases to which my hon. Friend referred, so I have not been able to review the immigration and nationality directorate's records to examine the caseworker's reasoning. I cannot comment easily on the individual decisions taken, even if it were appropriate to do so in this forum.

My hon. Friend made a compelling case for the French-speaking woman from Cameroon, but it is not easy to accept at face value how someone capable of finding an agent to get her to French-speaking Quebec in Canada, who then got to the United Kingdom, spent a fortnight in a house in London, and travelled by train to Leeds can end up having no idea that she was in Leeds, not in Montreal. I am not making a judgment, but it is unsurprising that, in the circumstances that my hon. Friend described and in the absence of any corroboration, the conclusion was that her story did not add up. That is why support was refused.

Mr. Hamilton: Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the main ways in which traffickers do their business is to take the identity documents away from the person who has paid them to bring them to the country in the first place? The individual is unable to produce the evidence that he might have to present to an immigration officer.

Beverley Hughes: I accept that that is the norm, but identity is not crucial to the case. The caseworker would have tried to obtain information about the details of the journey—its course and what had happened—to corroborate the story. I am saying simply that it does not surprise me that the caseworker found that the story did not add up in the absence of any corroborative information to try to verify that journey and the point at which the person entered the country.

I entirely understand my hon. Friend's point about the second case of the Iraqi Kurd. Although the process seems to have taken three weeks, a positive point to make is that the decision was reversed once additional evidence had been presented. I am comforted by the fact that the system that we put in place, which would be amenable to a change of decision, has operated successfully. However, I take his point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) made a very important point about the impact of failed asylum seekers and others in our communities, and how that cuts across some of our other important objectives for community relations and cohesions. It is difficult to resolve. Section 4 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 provides for accommodation-only support, especially for people whose application failed but who cannot return because there is no route through to, say, northern Iraq. People are often offered accommodation, but they do not take it because it is not exactly where they want it. However, I am happy to reconsider his point if there is anything that we can do to help the voluntary organisations dealing with this problem.

Finally, my hon. Friend asked me to re-examine the guidance given to NASS. We must wait for the judgment in order to do that but, subject to that judgment, we may well have to do it.

Education Funding (Leicestershire)

4 pm

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): This is an extremely timely debate, given the beginning of the financial year and the education funding settlement that will kick in within some three and a half weeks for Leicestershire and elsewhere. I welcome in particular my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick), because they, too, can testify to the enormous groundswell of opinion against the Government's funding for Leicestershire.

"Education, education, education"; that was the old mantra. On 13 February, the Minister for School Standards, who is here today, said:

> "I remind the House that the Government have put their money where their mouth is with the most sustained increases in funding for a century . . . There will be £1,000 extra for the average school pupil by 2005–06".—[Official Report, 13 February 2003; Vol. 399, c. 1074–5.]

I do not know who the average school pupil is, but he or she is not in Leicestershire.

The voters—parents, teachers and governors—believed the Government's mantras. Naive as I may be, I, too, at least believed up to a point that more money was going into education. After all, we have paid an enormous amount of tax, so we would at least expect that education funding would increase and that our children in Leicestershire would receive a better education. However, the Government obviously believe that if they say something often enough, people will believe it.

A report on the BBC website on 28 February stated:

> "A spokesman for the Department for Education and Skills said local education authorities had been guaranteed a minimum increase of 3.2 per cent. per pupil."

I have also heard it said that no schools will be worse off. However, that is not true in Leicestershire. People may have believed what was said, but in fact they are worse off. They are getting less than 3.2 per cent. per pupil and they are very cross.

Leicestershire has the lowest funding settlement in the country. It is not 3.2 per cent., as we were promised, but 2.5 per cent. I have gone into this in some detail, because the Minister should know about it. This has to do with the way in which the base was calculated. It was calculated on the extra money for post-16 education, which the area is not getting in the coming financial year. That will end up, throughout the county, in a 1 per cent. cut in real terms to education funding in schools.

The background is worth considering briefly. Leicestershire used to be the second worst funded education authority for primary education and the fourth worst funded for secondary education. The saga of the standard spending assessment and the F40 group, of which I and, I think, my hon. Friends were members, is also worth remembering. I went to various meetings with Ministers, mostly before the present Minister got into the House. We finally heard that the SSA for education was to be changed, and a good job, too. We were to have instead the education formula spending share; the FSS. Leicestershire has 80,000 pupils, and the number in education is growing, because it is a vibrant and prosperous area. It also gets good results. I believe that we are right at the top for key stage 3.

There has been a long campaign in Leicestershire in this respect, both before the SSA was scrapped and since the formula started to be introduced. I have had innumerable letters from parents, governors and teachers throughout the county. In January, there was a meeting, which I did not attend, with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty). The meeting was attended by two head teachers, including the head teacher of Lutterworth grammar school in my constituency, the leader of the county council, Mr. Harry Barber, and, I think, Mr. Ivan Ould, who is responsible for education at the county council. I am told that they had a "courteous hearing". The concern is not new. There has been a long campaign and still, after some 10 years, one gets a courteous hearing.

I have been raising this subject since 1992, when there was a Conservative Government. The situation was bad enough then, but it has got markedly worse since 1997.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I congratulate my hon. Friend on pressing for this debate. Is he aware that, since 1997, when Labour came to power, schools in Leicestershire have lost 9 per cent. of their funding? Does he not think that that is disgraceful?

Mr. Robathan: Indeed. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. The average funding per pupil throughout the county has fallen by 9 per cent. against the average.

Since the announcement of the recent settlement, I have received letters from all over my constituency. I shall not list all the schools and places from which people have come—that is a Liberal Democrat trick—but I shall refer to some of them later. I want to give the Minister and the Chamber a flavour of the settlement. The figures for the education FSS are derived by taking a basic amount per pupil with top-ups for deprivation, area costs and sparsity. That seems relatively sensible, but in Leicestershire, the increase is the lowest in the country. The proposed settlement gives an increase in total education FSS of 6.6 per cent. compared with the national average of 6.5 per cent. That sounds jolly good, but that is because we had a large increase in pupil numbers, mainly three-year-olds. In terms of the FSS per pupil, we have the minimum increase. The floor is supposed to be 3.2 per cent., but it becomes 2.5 per cent. in Leicestershire. The Education Authority is passporting the whole of the 2.5 per cent. increase. That does not meet spending pressures or represent real-terms protection as promised.

The response to the F40 parent and teacher campaign has been ignored. The disparity between the best and worst standard authorities is widening, not narrowing, and we believe, as does the education authority, that the basic entitlement per pupil should be higher to maintain and improve attainment across the board.

In Leicestershire, we educate 4,100 city children who—day in, day out—cross the border into Leicestershire because they receive a better education there but do not bring the money with them. If they did, there would be an extra £500-plus per pupil as they cross the border. The figure for Leicestershire is £2,932 per pupil; the figure for Leicester city, which is just across the Braunstone lane from my constituency, is £3,476 per pupil, a difference of £543. If every pupil in Leicestershire were funded as pupils in the city are funded, there would be almost £52 million extra for education in Leicestershire.

What possible justification can there be for that? I understand that area cost adjustments take account of the cost of housing. The cost of housing is certainly not lower in Leicestershire than across the border in Northamptonshire or Warwickshire. The cost of employing a teacher is exactly the same, the cost of buying a computer is exactly the same and the cost of maintaining a school is exactly the same, so how does the disparity arise?

I want to turn to Winstanley high school where I am going to a meeting on Friday that has been called by the governors. The governors from 30-odd schools in Blaby district have been asked to attend, which is a daunting prospect for me. In Winstanley high school, 20 per cent. of the pupils come from the city and the head teacher told me—I want to be fair to the Government where fairness is due—that they have received targeting funding and capital funding. That is great, but they do not receive core funding; the proper budget. What does that mean for schools such as Winstanley high school?

In every school, teacher pay is rising by 2.9 per cent. under a national agreement. The Minister and I both welcome that, because teachers are not overpaid, even with the 2.9 per cent. increase. Pensions are rising and I also welcome that. However, national insurance is rising from 1 April, as every school knows because schools, as well as teachers, must pay the increase. That tax, with superannuation and increased pay, means that there will be on-costs related to pay. Swinford primary school, which is in the south of my constituency, calculated that after the increase in pay, the on-costs, which used to be 14 per cent. of teachers' pay, will rise to 23 per cent. That is a hell of a lot of money for a small primary school to find, and it is concerned that it may have reduce the number of classes from four to three. However, there cannot be more than 30 pupils in a class, as that would be against the law.

At the same time, there are plans for out-of-class assistance so that teachers can spend more time out of class. Again, that is laudable. It should allow teachers to spend more time on preparation, but where is the money coming from? I am afraid that schools in Leicestershire will not be able to employ the much-heralded support staff. From Braunstone town, Swinford, Lutterworth Sherrier primary school, Brockington high school and Countesthorpe Greenfield primary school, governors and parents are writing to me, and there is real bewilderment. I assure the Minister that many of them will have voted Labour, but they are upset and are becoming angry.

This is the worst settlement for the whole country. It is bad enough this year with school funding on the floor; they would have received even less if there had not been a floor. What will happen next year? That is cause for concern. Are there any grounds for hope?

During the summer there was the fiasco over the Criminal Records Bureau. Leicestershire county council asked at the beginning of the autumn term for £25,000 to meet costs. It has yet to receive a response from the Minister's Department. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) said, since May 1997—I say this just in case the Conservatives are accused, as we usually are, of doing everything wrong—Leicestershire schools have become 9 per cent. worse off than the national average for funding. The Minister looks dismissive of that figure; perhaps he can tell me how it is wrong.

We want the Government to listen, and I am glad to see the Minister here. We want them to listen to the reality of Leicestershire schools, which need money this coming financial year. They say that the situation has become impossible. We need assurances that things will not get worse next year and in future. I assure the Minister that Leicestershire MPs are angry, be they Labour or Conservative. Parents, teachers and governors are angry. I was told about one governor this morning who thought that there would be no more problems or financial wranglings. He had had enough of trying to balance the budget and he knew that lots of money was coming, so all would be well. When he heard about the funding settlement, he said that it was the one thing that made him want walk away from the job, a job that he does, as do all governors, voluntarily.

Finally, I shall quote from a letter from the headmaster of South Wigston high school. The school is in the constituency of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough, but is on the border and acts as a polling station for my constituency. The school takes a large number of children from Glen Parva and Blaby. This man, who is an excellent headmaster—I have met him several times—says in a letter to the Secretary of State for Education and Skills:

> "My school is oversubscribed, taking 30% of our pupils from out of catchment . . . The school roll . . . shows us as being one of the most deprived Leicestershire schools . . . I am not looking forward to planning a 2003–04 budget. Classes are already full to bursting, so cutting staffing is out of the question. The most likely situation will be to stop all of the proactive developmental work we do here in teaching and learning linked to social inclusion and use such funds to prop up the budget.
> This is no way to run a school. As a Headteacher I need to know that I can plan into the future, and not have the rug pulled from beneath my feet. I had thought that this government had really grasped the need to invest in our children's future and provide schools with the finance to develop properly. It seems completely unfair, both as a parent and a Headteacher, to look only a few miles up the road and see schools where" pupils are doing a great deal better from the settlement.

4.14 pm

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) on securing the debate. I thank him and the Minister for allowing me to make a brief contribution to this Adjournment debate. I am glad to see the Minister for School Standards here because I believe him to be a bright and intelligent man who is capable of dealing with complicated ideas. However, he is as much a prisoner of the Treasury as he is a free spirit in his Department. I forgive him, up to a point, with regard to the difficulties that he faces in dealing with a debate such as this. Every Member of Parliament has no doubt been knocking on his door and on that of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, asking for his share of the pork barrel for his constituency. That is a given in debates such as this.

[Mr. Edward Garnier]

When the Minister for Local Government and the Regions, the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), announced the figures for our respective local education authorities in a statement some two or three weeks ago, I was shocked to find that Leicestershire LEA was at the bottom of the pile. I thought that there must have been something wrong with the printing of the tables when I found Leicestershire so far down the list.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blaby cited the example of Mr. Gary Toward, the headmaster of South Wigston high school, which is on the boundary of my constituency and his. The point that my hon. Friend made is exemplified by the fact that that school has to accept a proportion of its pupils from the city of Leicester. Because the city of Leicester is a unitary authority, it has its own education spending budget from central Government. The problems facing South Wigston high school are the same as those facing schools in the borough of Oadby and Wigston in my constituency, right next door to the city of Leicester, and schools in the rural part of my constituency, which stretches right down to the boundary of Northamptonshire. Central Government require them to do more and more and to follow more and more instructions but they are given less and less money to do that with. If the Minister is going to ignore the F40 campaign—of which my hon. Friend, several Labour Members and I were active members—and the pork-barrel pleas from Members of Parliament, I urge him to come and see for himself the effect of his Government's policies on the schools in our constituencies.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby, I have had letters from primary school heads, high school heads, senior school heads, governors, teachers and parents. They are, in effect, holding up their hands in shock and concern at the way in which their schools have to go on. It is now impossible for a chairman of governors or a head to plan ahead for the future development of a school because of the financial regime that has got hold of the system in our constituencies. We need more and better-funded schools in Leicestershire. We must be able to assure our constituents that our schools can plan a bright future for our bright children. I look to the Minister not to wave a magic wand, but to show that he has some kind of intellectual understanding of the terrible problems that his Government have dumped on Leicestershire's people.

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): I am pleased to have the chance to discuss these important issues with the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) and the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier). I congratulate the hon. Member for Blaby on securing the debate, and I congratulate them both on the passion with which they argued for higher funding levels in Leicestershire. I share their passion to see greater funding across the country, and I look forward to the day when all political parties have in their manifestos a commitment to raise the share of national income devoted to education. That would benefit from a cross-party approach.

In a debate on funding, it is important to start by congratulating the teachers and pupils in Leicestershire on the outstanding work that is going on in their schools. I am pleased that there are more than 200 more teachers in Leicestershire schools than there were five years ago. Some of the primary school statistics are striking. The percentage of young people reading, writing and counting well has risen from 66 per cent. to 78 per cent. during the past five years. I think that hon. Members on both sides are pleased at that. There is significant improvement in maths and science at key stage 3 and the percentage of pupils getting five good GCSEs has risen from 45 per cent. to 52 per cent. during the past four years. That is a real testimony to the professionalism and dedication of the teachers and pupils.

On resuming—

Mr. Miliband: It is also important to point out the increases in funding that have taken place in Leicestershire in the last five or six years, before I address the points raised by the hon. Member for Blaby.

The hon. Gentleman referred to core funding. He will be pleased to know that the education standard spending assessment for Leicester has increased by over 36 per cent. over the past five years. He also raised the matter of non-core funding, which is an important part of the picture. The standards fund has increased from £3.5 million in 1997 to more than £21 million this year. The school standards direct grant was £3.7 million in 2001, and is £8.2 million this year. Because that grant is not delivered through the formula spending system, it gives extra benefit to Leicester compared with that system. A typical 250-pupil primary school can expect £10,000 more next year, and a typical 1,000-pupil secondary school can expect £50,000 more. Obviously, there have also been major increases in capital spending, which are not under debate today but are important in relation to the schooling infrastructure.

I want to address the points made by the hon. Member for Blaby. I do not know if I shall justify the praise of the hon. and learned Member for Harborough; he may change his mind after listening to me for 10 minutes. The development of a new funding system for local government is a complex enterprise and depends on close working with those in local government. We are very grateful for the work of the education funding group, which was brought together with representatives from the F40 authorities. There was a serious discussion of a whole range of issues.

Having come to the process as a new Minister half way through, I do not think that it is fair to say that anyone was ignored. Everyone really did have their say. When it came to the final reckoning, some F40 authorities did well, others less so; some unitary authorities did well, and others did not. There was a serious amount of discussion.

We tried to base our development of the new system on simple principles. First, there should be a basic entitlement for all pupils; £2,000 in a primary school, £2,600 in a secondary. Secondly, there had to be recognition of additional educational needs. Thirdly, there had to be recognition of additional costs. I shall run through those briefly and address the points that the hon. Member for Blaby made. Our aim is to ensure that similar pupils in different parts of the country have a similar amount of money attached to them. In the end, the reason that Leicestershire is 150th out of 150 local educational authorities for its funding derives from the statistics on pupil need and area cost.

I am pleased that we have been able to raise the amount of money that has gone into Leicestershire schools during the past five years. I am confident that with more money Leicestershire schools could do more. That is why the overall increases in spending are important.

Let me run through the important points raised by the hon. Gentleman. He talked about the area cost adjustment and housing. Although two of the options in the consultation did use housing as a basis for the final settlement of area costs, that was not the final basis used. The final basis of the area cost adjustment was the level of wages to recognise the different costs of recruitment and retention in different parts of the country. We have a national pay scale, but in different parts of the country the costs of recruitment and retention can be higher, and are driven by turnover, above all. About 50 out of 150 local education authorities benefited from the old area cost adjustment system. That meant that there were a significant number of cliff edges in the system, and a degree of rough justice. I am pleased that under the new system we have a much more focused and carefully calibrated approach to the area cost adjustment, so that 99 authorities benefit from it.

Sad to say, that is of little comfort to MPs from Leicestershire of all parties, because Leicestershire LEA is not one of them. In refining the area cost adjustment, we had to target the allowance at those authorities with the highest wage rates. Those do not include Leicestershire. The hon. Member for Blaby also raised the question of additional educational needs. We want to ensure that similar pupils in different parts of the country have a similar amount of money attached to them. The national average percentage of pupils from deprived backgrounds is about 20 per cent. That is the primary driver of the additional educational needs funding. In Leicestershire, that figure stands at about 13 per cent., which is why the recognition of additional educational needs in Leicestershire is lower than elsewhere.

Mr. Garnier: On the question of additional education needs and deprived backgrounds, border schools on the boundary of the city of Leicester are drawing in children from deprived areas—we are delighted to have them—who are sucking away educational resources from the children of our constituencies. The picture is much more complicated than the Minister paints, on a national scale.

Mr. Miliband: I accept that the picture is far from straightforward. Deprivation accounts for about 80 per cent. of additional educational needs, and about 20 per cent. is reserved for the additional costs associated with speaking English as a second language and related issues. There are cross-border questions. We considered carefully whether we should account for mobility in the final formula. We decided not to do so, because the evidence was that it would not change the final distribution of resources much. We have 150 LEAs, which means that there are cross-border issues. I hope that pupils from Leicester are not seen simply as a burden. As the hon. Gentleman says, they are part of the school community in Leicestershire.

I want to say a little more about how the additional educational needs component was developed, because part of it is important and benefits Leicestershire. Under the old system the definition of poverty was based on income support. Two of the options in the consultation paper last autumn repeated that basis, but two others included families in low-wage work and families who were not unemployed but benefited from the working families tax credit. That helps Leicestershire, because the number of families in receipt of working families tax credit is just below the national average, although the number of families receiving income support is far below. Leicestershire will benefit not only from a sounder system but from our recognition of families who are not unemployed but in low-wage work.

In relation to ethnicity, Leicestershire benefits less than many other authorities, because it has between 4 and 5 per cent. of pupils with English as an additional language. That compares to a national average of about 9 per cent.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned sparsity in passing. It would be a pity not to recognise that the Government have taken an important step forward with the proposal that a sparsity element be inserted in the new formula to reflect the cost of home-to-school transport in rural areas and to help rural primary schools. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman welcomes that part of the new formula. We considered in detail whether to introduce a sparsity element for secondary schools, but we found no evidence of a connection between secondary school size and sparsity. Small schools are as likely to be found in densely populated metropolitan areas—perhaps unexpectedly—as in shires such as Leicestershire.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the gap between the highest and the lowest-funded authority. I can understand that. He also quoted some figures about the relationship between the lowest-funded authority and the average, which I did not recognise. The figure that I have is that the gap between the lowest-funded authority and the median has hardly changed. There has been a difference of about 10 per cent. in the two periods. If the hon. Gentleman wants to write to me about the figure that he quoted, I can certainly look into it. He or the hon. and learned Member for Harborough also referred to a letter that they had written to the Department that had not been answered. I shall follow that up.

Mr. Robathan: The letter concerned the Criminal Records Bureau.

Mr. Miliband: I certainly undertake to find out what has happened to the reply to that letter.

[Mr. Miliband]

The hon. Gentleman did not say much about the floors and ceilings in the new system, but it is important to recognise the 3.2 per cent. floor this time and, significantly, the impact of that in future years. Because Leicestershire is quite close to the floor, it will do better in years two and three of the spending review. We want to make sure that there is as much certainty as possible in the medium term, so that schools and local authorities can plan. We have not yet been able to announce the floors for future years—we want to see how the system works—but because Leicestershire is quite close to the floor this year, the transition will be relatively short. I think that it can look forward to significantly improved funding by years two and three of the spending review—financial years 2004–05 and 2005–06.

Finally, no one should deny—certainly no Government Member does—that difficult decisions remain about how to spend money in our education system. Those difficult decisions are made by governors and heads. I reassure the hon. Gentleman that we are committed to continuing to increase the quantum of funding that goes into education. That will benefit Leicestershire to the extent of its needs. I want to see funds growing across the country, and the best route to that is to continue to raise the overall spend on education and to distribute it as fairly as possible. That is what we have sought to do in the new funding system.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes to Five o'clock.

AIDS

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Kemp.]

9.30 am

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith): I take this opportunity to raise one of the most important issues facing the world community—the crisis caused by the spread of HIV/AIDS, which is wreaking destruction in much of the world and which threatens to do so in much more of it. This is not the first time that the crisis has been raised in the House of Commons and I am sure that it will not be the last.

I pay tribute to the many hon. Members present, whose interest in the issue goes back over many years. It is particularly appropriate to raise it again now given the greater public awareness and concern that I have noticed in the past few weeks. That development was no doubt stimulated by some of the excellent media coverage. Hon. Members may have read the reports in The Guardian, and The Sun has also run an excellent campaign on the issue. Furthermore, there has been considerable coverage on the BBC and I am sure that other media sources have recently covered the issue.

It is also appropriate to raise the subject again now because the world's attention is understandably focused on events in the middle east. We must ensure that the same attention continues to be paid to crises such as that caused by the spread of HIV/AIDS. The AIDS crisis could have even more wide-ranging consequences for the world community, not least because of the insecurity that could threaten the entire world. Only a few weeks ago, Colin Powell rightly described the AIDS crisis as being as serious a threat to global security as international terrorism.

The basic facts about the crisis are well known and I do not intend to repeat them at length. However, I want to highlight some of the latest figures on the extent of the crisis. The most recent figures from UNAIDS—the joint United Nations programme on HIV/AIDS—appeared a few months ago. In 2002, the epidemic was estimated to have claimed more than 3 million lives and an estimated 5 million people became infected with HIV, 800,000 of whom were children under the age of 15. That is estimated to bring the total number of people in the world living with the virus to 42 million. Life expectancy in some countries has now fallen by 20 years and UN estimates for world population growth have been revised downwards because 300 million people are expected to die from AIDS in the next half century.

The situation is much worse in some countries and the estimates in southern Africa are particularly severe. About 29 million people now live with HIV/AIDS and infection rates in some countries run at more than 30 per cent. of the adult population. Botswana, for example, is expected to lose one fifth of its population by 2050. Those are staggering figures.

The crisis is not only developing in southern Africa and the epidemic is undergoing fast rates of growth in Russia and the Caribbean. In Asia, in countries such as India and China, the figures are already high and estimates suggest that there are 6 million HIV/AIDS sufferers. The figures suggest that the sub-Saharan rate of infection could be replicated in Asia in the next few decades. The International Development Committee recently reported to that effect.

As hon. Members know, the consequences of the spread of HIV and AIDS are found not only in health programmes, health policies and the health of the individuals affected; the crisis has major implications for development programmes in general because of its impact on economies and social systems. It is estimated that by the end of the decade the per capita gross domestic product in the countries hardest hit by the disease may drop by as much as 8 per cent. AIDS has the knock-on effect of increasing the number of people living in poverty. For example, if a family's main breadwinner becomes infected, that clearly affects the entire family.

There is a real fear—or rather an expectation—that the objectives of halving extreme poverty as part of the millennium development goals may be jeopardised. Key Government workers in developing countries are being lost to the disease and AIDS is reducing the ratio of healthy workers to dependants. In agriculture, AIDS is severely affecting the ability of countries to invest in, or sustain, capital-intensive methods of production. That is exacerbating the food shortages that are being experienced in many southern African states. Farming skills are being lost. Craft skills are no longer being passed from parents to children. A new generation must struggle to find a livelihood. Irrigation schemes are not being maintained. Farms are being abandoned and families are returning to subsistence farming. All that is contributing to the present famine in southern Africa.

The effects go beyond agriculture into the social sphere. The spread of HIV/AIDS, as well as overburdening the health and social security systems, is having a serious impact on education services. Teachers and students die and older children must leave school to look after siblings. The millennium development goal of ensuring universal primary education is also at risk in the worst affected countries.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): Has the hon. Gentleman reflected on the number of AIDS orphans in the world? That will cause a huge social problem in developing countries.

Mr. Lazarowicz: Indeed it will. Another of the awful statistics is that in Africa alone there are more AIDS orphans than there are children in the United Kingdom.

What action is needed from the world community—and from this country—to tackle the crisis? They know what needs to be done. The question is whether the world community will exercise the common will to tackle the crisis. There are three priority areas. First, education is vital. A greater awareness of how to prevent the transmission of the virus is crucial to the successful combating of the disease in the developing world. I welcome the emphasis that the Department for International Development has placed on support for education programmes in the worst affected countries. It is commendable that it directs its efforts in particular at the 15-to-24 age group.

Money is also a vital question. Above all, there is a need for commitment to a major programme of multilateral funding. All hon. Members in the Chamber must welcome the setting up of the global fund to fight HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria. That is the most important initiative in this context since the crisis developed. The global fund has certainly enabled greater attention to be focused on fighting those diseases. The Government's support of the fund, which comes in addition to their significant spending on bilateral HIV/AIDS programmes, is very much to be welcomed. Although the UK's commitment is welcome, however, and the £138 million that the Government have committed to the fund for the next five years is a positive step, it still needs more money. A severe funding gap is opening up and serious questions are being raised about its future. After all, although $10 billion was called for, only $2.2 billion has been pledged to the fund by countries and only part of that has been delivered and allocated to programmes aimed at tackling HIV/AIDS. More money is needed from the world community, but also from this country as part of that community.

The third problem is access to necessary drugs. Every hon. Member who has been following the issue will be aware of the continuing failure to reach agreement on measures to allow developing countries access to the cheap drugs that they need to tackle HIV/AIDS and a range of other diseases. I am sure that we would all agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer about what needs to be done. He said:

> "It's time that all recognise the responsibilities to help avoid unnecessary deaths and that means we've got to get an agreement for the trade round."

He said that the problem

> "is a terrible indictment on a world that has the technology, the drugs and the resources to be able to solve these problems—and when you think of the hurt that any infant death causes you've got to understand that so much more could be done".

The Chancellor was absolutely right when he said that and I am sure that he speaks for most people in the country.

I mention in passing that even though we hear talk about the growing transatlantic divide, one matter on which there is a lot of agreement, especially where it concerns some of the big pharmaceutical companies in Europe and the USA, is the view that there is a reluctance to reach a fair settlement on the issue in question. I do not have time to go into the debate about the failure to reach an agreement on access to cheap drugs in detail. All I shall say is that only two weeks ago there was yet another failure to reach agreement in the World Trade Organisation. Every day that that agreement fails to be made is a day less in the lives of millions of people in developing countries who cannot afford the drugs that they need for their condition.

Once again, although I praise what the Government have done to take a lead on the issue and want to express my backing for what they have done so far, I should like them to do more. The Government certainly cannot take on the burden for the entire industrialised world. However, even allowing for that point and the welcome sums that they have pledged, the sums are relatively small. Without going into the rights and wrongs of events elsewhere in the world, I observe that the sums that we are pledging to the global fund are a drop in the ocean compared with those that we have put aside for contingencies for possible events elsewhere.

I am aware that other hon. Members wish to speak, so I shall end my contribution by posing a number of questions to the Minister about the Government's future policy on the international HIV/AIDS crisis. I hope that he can give some positive responses to those questions, so that we can underline today the country's continuing commitment to playing a leading role in the international community's efforts to tackle the crisis. First, there are fears that money is drying up and that the long-term future of the global fund is not secured. The international community should not wait for results from the fund before making contributions. I should therefore like to hear from the Minister what the Government's plans for financial commitments to the fund for the next five years are and, if possible, what their long-term attitude is.

Secondly, the World Health Organisation and UNAIDS have a target of treating 3 million people who have HIV/AIDS by 2005. Does the UK see itself as part of the partnership aiming for that target? How do the Government envisage achieving it?

The third question is on the way in which the health systems in developing countries can deliver the service and the drugs to those who are affected. Bearing in mind that drugs on their own are not enough—there has to be access to the relevant services as well—what are the UK Government's plans for supporting health systems in developing countries and, more importantly, will there be a trend in the financial support from the Government to encourage support for the health systems in the countries that are affected by HIV/AIDS? My fourth question relates to the third. How will the UK's bilateral programmes link to global fund programmes?

Fifthly, what monitoring mechanisms are in place to ensure that the DFID money goes to supporting the health systems? Do monitoring systems exist in all the countries to which we give financial support? My sixth question concerns another important matter. How can the global fund ensure that the country co-ordinating mechanism enables the civil societies in the countries affected to participate not just in making proposals regarding funding, but in their implementation over the years?

Finally, what long-term commitments can we give to the countries worst affected by the crisis? We all know that for a health ministry in a developing country to plan a proper anti-retrovirals programme, it must have commitment from international donors, not just for short periods of, say, three or five years, but for up to 10 years. What commitment are we going to make on long-term contributions to the global fund and to our own bilateral programme? Without long-term commitment, we will not be able to tackle the HIV/AIDS crisis and by failing to tackle it we shall allow it to become more serious throughout the world.

We need a long-term commitment and more funding, and we need them on a continuing basis over many years. I hope that the Minister can give some commitments today.

9.48 am

Tony Baldry (Banbury): The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) has done us all a service in introducing this debate so well and so succinctly. It is good to see the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) here. I appreciate that the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary from the Department for International Development are doubtless overseas on Government business, but I am glad to be able to thank the Minister, on behalf of the International Development Committee, for the incredible help that ambassadors and high commissioners give us in our work around the world. They are unfailing in their courtesy, support and good humour, notwithstanding the various demands that we place upon them. Foreign Office Ministers do not often take part in these debates.

I hope that I shall not repeat anything that has been said. The US Government have announced a $15 billion dollar programme over the next five years to combat HIV/AIDS. It is a go-it-alone fund, which will work on its own terms and only through US aid agencies. It will ignore existing structures, relationships and action plans already in place in those countries, especially Africa, already affected most by the HIV/AIDS pandemic. As the Financial Times recently observed,

> "As a recent convert to the war on Aids, the US administration has latched on to a simplistic vision of what to do, based on the example of a single country—Uganda. It knows little of the measures in place in different parts of the world and has not recognised that each country needs to shape the best local response. It is here that the Global Fund plays an important role."

I would go further. The issue is not just the global health fund, but the European countries' response to the United States' proposals. Although the US effort is a bold part, it is only a part of the total financing needs. Its limits are implicit in the fact that it is directed only at HIV/AIDS. It does not deal with malaria or tuberculosis and the American fund will be operational in only 14 countries.

The global fund will require new donor support of about $7 billion this year and next—roughly $3.5 billion a year—to meet the needs of the high-quality proposals that it is considering. A reasonable financing framework is thus clear and I believe that Europe collectively should match the US initiative with our own $3 billion a year contribution, while Japan and other donors should contribute at least $1 billion a year in addition. That would make a total of at least $7 billion a year during 2003 and 2004. Half of that should be devoted to the global fund and the other half should be spent on programmes that would indirectly bolster, rather than undermine, the fund.

As the same article in the Financial Times noted,

> "Silence from Europe at this moment would be deadly for the Global Fund. If the US is the only country to put up large new sums for the war against Aids, then it will be a US programme. On the other hand, with a bold European response to Mr. Bush's daring initiative, the transatlantic alliance—under great strain over Iraq—would prove to the world that it continues its historic commitments to freedom and human betterment. Impoverished and dying people around the world await a clarion call from the US and Europe together."

International partnership to combat an international problem is imperative, but what has been the UK Government's response? I appreciate that this is not the Minister's brief and I hope that he will prevail on the Under-Secretary of State for International Development to respond to any questions raised in the debate that he feels are worthy of a more detailed response.

I do not doubt the commitment of the Treasury and the Department for International Development to fight HIV/AIDS, but a recent interview given by the Chancellor is telling. He has, rightly, said that there needs to be far faster progress on trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights—TRIPS—at the current World Trade Organisation negotiations at Doha, which means Governments, such as the US Government, doing much more to make drug companies, such as GlaxoSmithKline, allow their drugs to be patented. Disappointment about the fact that a recent vaccine for AIDS has failed is well understood, but the Chancellor also alluded to the Government's new idea of an international financing facility.

Dr. Tonge: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would hate to give the impression that the vaccine initiative had totally failed. Only one vaccine was being developed for the western strain of the virus and many other trials are taking place in the world.

Tony Baldry: I was simply pointing out that there must be disappointment about the fact that the present vaccine trial has failed.

The problem with the international financing facility is that it does not have the support of the United States. It does not necessarily have the support of UK non-governmental organisations, because it does not make clear where the UK will stand on overseas development investment after 2015, nor what will happen to the UK's commitment to reaching a target of 0.7 per cent. of gross national income for overseas development investment.

In sub-Saharan Africa, 30 million people are victims of HIV/AIDS and as many as one in four people in countries like Zambia have AIDS, so Africa will not necessarily meet the United Nation's 2015 goals even with the international financing facility. Africa is the only continent going backwards as we speak and although the world is ravaged by the HIV/AIDS pandemic, Africa is at its epicentre. The World Food Programme estimates that 14 million people face serious food shortages in southern Africa this year, with the same number in Ethiopia and the horn of Africa, partly because hunger begets AIDS as AIDS begets hunger.

What is needed is not an international financing facility for HIV/AIDS but a straightforward commitment to the facilities and mechanisms that already exist. We do not need to invent or create new financing mechanisms; we need to support those mechanisms that already exist, such as the global health fund. I recognise that that fund has its problems. I suspect, however, that those problems are not caused by the structures that it offers, but are a result of the financial commitments that it receives from us and from our partners in the European Union.

[Tony Baldry]

I hope that I can prevail upon the patience of the House by sharing a letter that I recently wrote to The Independent, in which I stated:

> "Sir: Prior to the International Aids Conference . . . the devastating report from UNAids demonstrated the urgent need for renewed policies on HIV/Aids in both the developed and developing worlds to combat the pandemic in poorer countries.
> On the part of richer countries to prevent HIV/Aids, it is clear that the Global Health Fund simply isn't working. Whilst such trust funds act as a good mechanism to raise the profile of a specific issue it is less good when the issue's profile is high but only a lowly third of money pledged is actually reaching the Fund. Money surely would be better invested direct to African countries' administrations and local NGOs. On treatment also there is a need for further commitment from countries like the US, Canada and Japan at the forthcoming Doha trade round to ensure that poorer countries are given the capability to copy patented HIV/Aids drugs produced in other better equipped countries.
> Nonetheless, on the part of some poorer countries themselves, if more aid is to go to their governments, then still more needs to be done to recognise the extent of the pandemic. No doubt the recent South African court case was a massive move forward but ambiguities still exist in their approach and until these are removed treatment and prevention will stagnate.
> The reward would not only be preventing the HIV/Aids crisis escalating ever more; recent estimates also suggest that the economic boom for everyone would be US$186bn each year. I suspect this would benefit African countries more than the recent G8 summit."

I hope that the Government will give the global health fund every possible support. More importantly, however, I hope that they will encourage our European Union partners to match what the Americans are putting into the fund to ensure that it has the requisite funds necessary to do over the next two to three years what it was set up to achieve.

9.59 am

Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): As the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) said, this is a timely debate, particularly as President Bush has announced a huge expansion in AIDS financing—£10 billion is a lot of money and in normal circumstances, it would be welcomed enthusiastically. Apart from anything else, as the hon. Gentleman said, it will put great pressure on other countries, including ourselves, to increase our contribution to work on AIDS, particularly the global health fund. However, the way in which Bush is doing it raises great doubts.

I want to raise two issues. First, as the hon. Gentleman said, why has the President virtually ignored the global health fund and allocated only $1 billion of the new money to that fund? That represents only $200 million a year from 2004; he has decided to disburse $9 billion unilaterally. I also want to talk about links between the treatment of AIDS and reproductive health services. By doing so, I shall demonstrate how Bush's decision to keep money out of the global health fund and his attitude to reproductive health are linked.

Initially, the United States embraced the global health fund and although it was criticised for not giving enough, its contribution was far in excess of any other donor. Why is it turning its back on the global health fund as a disburser, setting up its own administrative procedure and limiting its funding to 12 sub-Saharan countries and two Caribbean countries? That is happening when the global fund does not have money for a third disbursement of grants in October, which leaves most sub-Saharan countries, including several badly affected countries, such as Malawi, out in the cold. That also has major implications for the global health fund's choices about the distribution of its funding. It also implies disaffection with the fund. That is even odder when one knows that Tommy Thompson, who is Bush's Secretary of Health and Human Services, was elected to the chair of the global health fund only a couple of days after Bush's announcement on the $10 billion. Of course, Thompson would have known that he was to be elected before that date because his only opponent had withdrawn.

Part of Thompson's job is to be chief fundraiser for the global health fund. His task is surely more difficult if his Government do not put their major resources into the fund. It is even odder that Thompson did not travel to the board meeting in Geneva to take up his position as chair. I quote from the apology that he sent to the meeting:

> "I am sorry that I am unable to be with you in Geneva today but President Bush has asked me to be with him when he addresses his Advisory Council on HIV/AIDS in Washington".

That sends a clear message: America first, the world second.

It is extraordinary that Thompson was not allowed to organise his diary so that he could attend the board meeting when he was supposed to take over as chair of the global health fund. It is stranger still because Thompson's lengthy message to the board expressing his joy at taking over the chairmanship made no mention of Bush's huge increase in funding for international AIDS work , which was announced only a few days before in the state of the union message.

The situation is odder still because the chief executive of the global health fund, Dr. Feachem, made no reference to the $10 billion from Bush in his report to the board. He also came here to talk to the all-party group on AIDS but did not mention Bush's $10 billion until I asked him about it. It is surreal; there is an earthquake going on in AIDS funding yet the chair and the chief executive of the global health fund pretend that the ground under their feet is steady.

A further oddity about Bush's announcement is the fact that his figures for numbers of people to be treated with anti-retroviral drugs are achievable only if there is access to cheap generic drugs produced outside the United States. However, the US has been blocking such access in the Doha talks. Additionally, the new initiative is to be administered by USAID—the United States Agency for International Development—which, in its present statute, requires products supplied as foreign aid to be made in the United States. There are also doubts about the American bureaucracy because promises are made but it takes a long time for money to be channelled in a way that meets with the approval of Congress. I hope that the Minister will explain what is going on—I wish him good luck.

During International Development questions last week, the Secretary of State for International Development, who is on the board of the global health fund, expressed some disaffection with the fund's operation. I hope that the difficulties can be sorted out because the global health fund is a first-rate idea. The issue is far too important for those difficulties to be allowed to persist.

Mr. Lazarowicz: Does my hon. Friend agree that the proposal made a few minutes ago by the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), who chairs the Select Committee on International Development, that Europe should match the commitment of the United States to the global fund is one way of emphasising to the United States the world's commitment to the fund? Would he therefore agree to endorse the European Union making a similar contribution to the fund as the USA?

Tony Worthington: I hope that we and the EU make a much greater contribution to the global health fund than the USA: that is the point of what I am saying. The USA's contribution is $200 million per year for five years from 2004.

I also want to raise concerns about the relationship between AIDS work and reproductive health services. I am sure that Bush's decision to distribute funds bilaterally rather than through the global health fund is related to his appalling actions with regard to reproductive health. If he allocated money to the global health fund, it would be more difficult for him to keep the peace with the religious obsessives who back him.

Bush is in debt to, and under the control of, a small group of southern fundamentalist Christians who are obsessed with abortion and contraception. The way for a country to reduce the number of abortions—particularly unsafe ones—is to follow the example of Belgium and Holland. They have liberal abortion laws, thorough education about relationships and total access to family planning services. Belgium and Holland have the lowest abortion rates in the world, but Bush's followers support policies that push up the number of abortions—in particular, unsafe ones—and contribute to the appalling rates of maternal mortality in many countries.

The fundamentalists who programme Bush want to ban abortion and access to reproductive health services. Following their orders, Bush withdrew all funding from the United Nations Population Fund on the pretext that it was supporting the Chinese Government's one child per family project and coercive abortion. That was contradicted by his own investigating team and a group of hon. Members from this House. The UNFPA is working in 20 counties in China: it is weaning the Chinese away from compulsion and lowering abortion rates, but the zealots had their way with President Bush.

At meeting after meeting, the Bush Government are now trying to destroy the pace-setting Cairo conference, which found a worldwide consensus policy in this contentious area. It includes the explicit statement that abortion is never an acceptable method of family planning. The bedrock of the Cairo conference is that women throughout the world should have access to reproductive health services and that is under attack from the Bush Government.

The Americans are urging on the poorest people in the world policies that would create a riot if they were tried in the USA. Can anyone imagine the consequences in America and Britain if their Governments said that they were going to withdraw access to family planning? The American Government's policies go against the American constitution's statements on freedom of information. The consequence of their policy is that they have withdrawn their supply of condoms from many parts of the world. When the first President Bush was in power, America supplied 800 million condoms to the developing world: it now supplies only 300 million condoms per year, which means that the average Botswanan would have access to one condom supplied by the international community per year.

By cutting the number of condoms, they are condemning to death thousands of people who could be protected if that very cheap method of prevention were available. I do not usually quote the words of the Mozambique bishops, but this is their advice to their flock:

> "If you are HIV positive and you have unprotected sex and you infect someone you have in the eyes of God, committed murder. Or if you are HIV negative and you have unprotected sex with someone who is infected and they infect you, you have in the eyes of God, committed suicide. So my children, wearing a condom is not a sin . . . but not wearing one is."

That is the voice of sanity. In the words of the Mozambique bishops, Bush's policies stimulate murder and suicide. Now, during Bush's $10 billion AIDS initiative, his AIDS policy is running slap bang into a collision with his reproductive health policy. Will his AIDS policy allow condoms to be used as the only means of preventing that disease, but not for family planning? That would be absurd, but it is likely to happen.

American policy on AIDS would prohibit the sending of money to integrated health clinics offering AIDS treatment and family planning with information about abortion or abortion counselling. However, under the same policy money could be sent to a clinic treating only AIDS. In a country like Tanzania, which can spend only $3 or $4 a year per person on health care and where health clinics are sparse, American policy will require that the AIDS service is in a different place and run by a different agency from the health clinic. That is official.

This is not United States imperialism—it is worse than that. Under imperialism, an empire imposes its own way of life on another country. Bush would not dare impose such a policy in America because he would be ridiculed out of Washington. However, he is trying to impose just such a policy on the poorest people in the world and through it he is causing their deaths. That is one of the reasons why he has steered the money away from the global health fund and why he will distribute it bilaterally.

The tragedy of all this is that reproductive health services and AIDS policy should be much more closely linked than they are. That was said in the Cairo+5 document, as follows:

> "Governments should ensure that provision for STIs"— sexually-transmitted infections—

> "and AIDS are an integral component of reproductive and sexual health programmes at the primary health care level."

[Tony Worthington]

That is also the policy of the International Planned Parenthood Federation and, in the words of its director general, Steven Sinding:

> "The same systems that enable people to space and limit births and protect themselves from STDs"—

> "are essential to halting the spread of HIV."

The family planning association movements practically invented sexual and reproductive behaviour change and they went a long way towards establishing community-based services throughout the world. Both of those are essential in the fight against AIDS. However, the AIDS community and the family planning community behave as if they had nothing to do with each other. AIDS activists place emphasis on treatment and family planners often act as if they had no role in HIV/AIDS prevention. The donors have a major role to play in bringing the two groups together.

Bush's actions drive people in exactly the opposite direction. In the developed world, HIV transmission was regarded initially as being largely restricted to the gay and illicit drug-using communities, rather than through heterosexual transmission. Treatment was also captured by the large pharmaceutical companies, who saw that more money could be made from keeping wealthy people alive than from preventing people from dying. There was a lack of resources for vaccines or effective barrier methods controlled by women. There are still people who are obsessed with giving people in the poor world access to expensive retrovirals and they are failing to provide the resources for prevention through changing sexual behaviour or barrier methods, such as condoms.

It makes common sense to combine reproductive health services and HIV services, especially in terms of gaining access to young people. That is where the trained staff are and where the infrastructure often exists. Bush's emerging policy of providing condoms in HIV clinics but not to family planning services is counter-productive, both for family planning and for the treatment of the AIDS pandemic; we should wake up to what he is doing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a most compelling debate, but I remind hon. Members that it is common practice in 90-minute Adjournment debates to commence the first of the three winding-up speeches no later than 30 minutes before conclusion, which will be at 10.30 am. Hon. Members should take that into account when contributing and making or giving way to interventions.

10.15 am

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on securing this debate on an extremely important subject. The brevity of my remarks does not reflect the importance that my party colleagues and I place on the issue.

> "HIV AIDS is a modern apocalypse which dwarfs everything that has gone before."

Those are the words of Stephen Lewis, the UN special envoy for HIV/AIDS in Africa. "Dwarfs everything" are the relevant words. As I am a relative newcomer to such debates, I shall briefly try your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House by considering some of the figures, because they beggar belief. The number of people living with HIV/AIDS totals 42 million—5 million people were newly infected in 2002 and about 800,000 of those were children. Those figures are from the World Health Organisation. AIDS deaths in 2002 totalled 3.1 million and 610,000 of those were children. I find it difficult to comprehend those figures.

The vast majority—95 per cent.—of HIV/AIDS sufferers are in the poorest countries. In some African countries, 20 per cent. of adults are HIV-positive. In sub-Saharan Africa, where nearly 30 million people are HIV-positive, there were 3.5 million new infections in 2002. Those are astonishing and horrifying figures. The AIDS epidemic is increasingly entwined with wider humanitarian crises, such as the food crisis in southern Africa and the social disruption caused by the need to migrate to find work as people become more involved in the cash economy. Also, conflicts in Africa have caused an increase in HIV/AIDS. The ability of those countries to deal with HIV/AIDS is reduced by crises in the political and economic systems.

As the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) noted, HIV/AIDS is open to attack through health education and the increased use of barrier methods. I was interested to see evidence of a decline in HIV/AIDS among inner-city women in Ethiopia as a direct result of such factors. There has also been a decline in HIV/AIDS in parts of Uganda among young pregnant women. Those are encouraging signs. I shall not refer to the availability of cheaper pharmaceuticals, which clearly is important. A decline in HIV/AIDS needs human intervention, which must be funded. That is my one and only point, and it is that on which I shall question the Minister.

The UK is making contributions to fighting HIV/AIDS. According to my figures, we furnished $215 million to the global fund to fight AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria from 2001 to 2003. The fund was set up by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, whose target is $10 billion per annum. I accept that we are also making other aid contributions, as well as making significant contributions to conflict resolution and development in countries suffering severely from HIV and AIDS. Politics is a matter of priorities, so I shall briefly refer to two of our priorities, without trying your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Based on the Government's figures, we are prepared to spend £1.75 billion on the forthcoming war. That sum has already been committed and I understand that at commencement, the figure may be £2 billion. As far as I can see we are spending £2 billion on war and $250 million on HIV/AIDS.

I do not want to play down the Government's commitment to fighting HIV/AIDS, particularly when one compares their attitude to that taken by some other rich states. We are often told that the demands for health services are infinite, as near as damn it. I am not asking for a comment from the Minister on the potential global demand for services related to HIV/AIDS, but I ask him to consider whether we are spending enough.

Let us not allow people throughout the world, especially those in the poorest countries in Africa, to die because of our indifference, or because our priorities lie elsewhere.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde): I will try and follow the good example of other hon. Members and be brief so that we can give the Front-Bench spokesmen maximum time.

I cannot accept the slightly spurious comparison that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) made between the money set aside for possible international conflict and that set aside for HIV/AIDS. One can take any section of Government spending at any time and compare it to another section to make a particular point. The arguments stand or fall on their own merits.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on securing this important debate. As a relative newcomer to such debates, it has been a great pleasure to listen to the expertise of colleagues from the International Development Committee. I shall not rehearse the numbers and figures that we have heard over and over again today, numbing though they are.

It is a cliché to say that countries throughout Africa and Asia are simply being ravaged and paying a terrible price due to HIV/AIDS. It is not just individuals—hundreds of thousands, tens of millions of individuals—but entire families and communities that are devastated by the illness, including people who do not even have the infection. The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) mentioned orphans; perhaps she might expand on that point in her speech. The challenge is not just to cure individuals of a disease, but to mend broken townships and cities and entire regions and countries.

Before I turn briefly to African and Asian issues, I want to talk about HIV/AIDS in the west. My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) touched on that subject. When the disease broke and awareness of it had its first impact, there was a sudden and welcome demise in unsafe practices, which had the predictable result of slowing the growth and spread of the disease. We have to remind ourselves that that happened about 20 years ago and an entire generation has grown up in the post-AIDS era. The doomsday adverts that we remember from the late 1980s increasingly have no bearing on the sexual practices of the current generation.

Complacency is the great threat in the west. Some sexual practices and venues are being reintroduced that closed down 20 years ago, which will increase the spread of the disease in the west at the very time that we are trying to do something about it in the southern world. We must not take our eye off the home front, as we concentrate—rightly in this debate—on the southern world. We all pay tribute to the health organisations, statutory bodies and others, but they need to refresh the message in this country that AIDS is still around, incurable and a killer. People suffering from HIV/AIDS will die as surely in Greenock as they will in Mozambique. Perhaps it will take longer in the west, because of access to palliative medicines, but it is still a killer and we should not take our eye off that ball.

On the global scale of the challenge, in Zambia, HIV prevalence is about 27 per cent. of 15 to 49-year-olds. In certain parts of Africa, one is always on the lookout for new ways in which the disease is spreading. I understand that one particularly virulent means is the interaction between long-distance lorry drivers and prostitutes. That is spreading the disease rapidly and non-governmental organisations are working on education programmes to try to do something about that.

The position is gloomy for much of the world and the messages that we are portraying today are dire. However, there are positive signs, including some evidence of increasing awareness of AIDS, which is the first step. We must pay tribute to the organisations spreading an educational message. The focus of today's debate is to emphasise that much more needs to be done. My hon. Friends and Opposition Members have highlighted means of doing that and I shall not go through those again. More money is the cornerstone. There must also be support for the global fund, greater access to drugs and a new approach to patenting important life-saving pharmaceuticals.

I shall briefly mention the international financing facility, although I shall not go into it in depth. The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) mentioned it in what were, unfortunately, slightly disparaging tones. I have great hopes for that facility. It is not an international financing facility to combat HIV and AIDS—there is much more to it than that—but the scale of the figures mentioned in the document of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is considerable. The figures go up to the £100 billion mark. That is a step change. My right hon. Friend is worried, and rightly, that we are nowhere near meeting the millennium targets. If we carry on at the same rate, we shall miss them. The hon. Gentleman implied that if something is not broken, we should not fix it, but I think that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is right to be worried and to be considering other ways of achieving the step change needed.

I shall finish, if I may, on a personal point, which picks up on the second part of the well made speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie. Since my election to this House in 2001, I have deliberately steered clear of all issues relating to the Church. That is for personal reasons, relating to my previous career as a priest. I spend much time turning down offers of television interviews inviting me to give forth on issues varying from who should be the new Archbishop of Canterbury to war and peace matters. However, this issue is too important to allow such niceties to stand in the way. I yield to no one in my admiration for the work that the Catholic Church does throughout the world. Men and women from comfortable western families have given up a life of luxury to go to the most inhospitable, unfriendly, barren environments on the planet. They have given their lives and put themselves on the line to do work on which we stand here, in our comfortable Westminster surroundings, and opine. Their work in orphanages, schools, education and running programmes is magnificent. I know many such people personally and I make no criticism whatever of their commitment or that of the Church to helping the needy, the impoverished and those ravished by sickness and disease.

But—here is the "but" and my hon. Friend was absolutely right about it—it is incontrovertible that the use of condoms slows the spread of this killer disease. The whole argument about contraception has been swept aside by the need to prevent a further genocide—genocide caused by an illness. We know how we can stop that and we have to stop it. The Catholic Church, quite simply, must change its view on the use of condoms. It must change its view on the explicit nature of sex education. Sex education such as that I had at school, which involved looking at sea urchins, is simply not fit for the purpose in the 21st century. The Catholic Church must have a complete, Copernican revolution in its attitude to sex education and its attitude towards gay men, in particular. This issue is too important. Lives are at risk. People are dying. The Church is a church of compassion. It must show that compassion and change its course.

10.29 am

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on introducing the debate. I do not think that we can debate this topic often enough. If ever there were a weapon of mass destruction, AIDS is it. It may well kill far more people over the next 20 years than the bubonic plague ever did. People all over the world face an absolutely horrific scenario. Perhaps that is not so much the case in the west—yet—but if we become too complacent, it may affect us just as badly. Mother nature has provided her own weapon of mass destruction.

We have had some excellent speeches. We have been told about figures: the number of victims and the billions of pounds that are being spent on the issue—it is figures, figures, figures all the time. The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) talked about the USA's efforts to combat the disease, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith talked of the problems of financing the global fund and the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) stressed the importance of the figures.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (David Cairns). I assume that he is a Catholic and was a Catholic priest. I admire him for the way in which he spoke. We need more people to say what he said.

As always, the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) gave a powerful speech. I spent 25 years in reproductive and sexual health in my professional life before I became a Member of Parliament, and I would have been proud to deliver that speech. I agreed with every word, dot and comma. I commend the speech to the House; it should be printed and put up on the wall of every hon. Member's office. I will not go on, because I do not want to embarrass the hon. Gentleman, but it was a seriously good speech.

Several points have not been emphasised quite enough. To start with, there is the availability of drugs. Developing countries need anti-retroviral drugs—particularly, to prevent mother to child transmission—but the problem is not an easy matter of simply providing drugs, however cheap they are. That will not conquer the epidemic or do the trick. The drugs are far too complicated to take and need to be backed by things that are simple for us in the west, such as good nutrition, if they are to work. How many people in developing countries can we honestly say are fed properly nowadays? I am sad that the global fund and the American contribution, about which the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie talked, are concentrated primarily on drugs.

I am sad that not enough emphasis is being placed on health systems. Some countries have not got the necessary roads and, even if there were a clinic, people would not be able to get to it. We have to deliver clinics and nurses. We do not need doctors, but we do need health workers who are educated in the delivery of AIDS drugs if those drugs are to be any good at all. If we do not have such workers, the drugs will be taken improperly, resistance to the disease will develop and we will have to start all over again. I feel passionately about that, and I am sick of hearing people castigate the drug companies when we are not placing enough emphasis on health systems.

Some recently published research is quite damaging in that it gives the wrong message. It is claimed that people in the third world use dirty needles and that health systems are inadequate and dirty and do not follow good practices. Those factors will certainly contribute a small amount to the spread of AIDS, but no one should make the mistake of thinking that they are the reason for its spread. It is not so, even if those things may be a small contributing factor.

We have not heard much about vaccines—although something was said by the hon. Member for Banbury. Vaccines are the ultimate weapon against any infectious disease, and the global fund, the Americans, the Gates Foundation, which has contributed a lot, and the International AIDS Vaccine Initiative have done sterling work. Trials of AIDS vaccines are going on all over the world, but there are not enough of them. We must ensure that funds enrich research into AIDS vaccines because that will lead to the end of the epidemic, as it did for smallpox and as it soon will do for polio.

The other thing that has not been mentioned is the effect of debt on developing countries. In passing, we should remember that African countries spend $14 billion a year on servicing their debt. The global fund has estimated that those countries need about $10 billion to do something that will have an impact on the AIDS epidemic. AIDS destroys economically active people in the population and will destroy the ability of any country to service its debt because fewer people will be working. As I mentioned during an intervention on the opening speech, AIDS orphans are becoming a huge problem, and developing countries will have to spend a lot of money on those children who have never known a family or a mother and a father. They live rough on the streets, not receiving an education and at risk from all sorts of factors. We expect countries in Africa to service their debt to the tune of $14 billion a year when less than that amount would greatly help the fight against AIDS. That is crazy. Giving with one hand and taking away with another is nonsense.

Finally, I shall compare the amounts of money that the world likes to spend on various things. I said that the AIDS virus is the most powerful weapon of mass destruction in the world. We have already heard from the hon. Member for Caernarfon that the USA is thinking of spending about $200 billion on war with Iraq, against which its contribution to the fight against AIDS pales into insignificance. Far less than 1 per cent.

of that amount goes into expenditure to tackle AIDS, and that includes the ear-marked $15 billion that the Americans are spending independently on the AIDS crisis. It is a disgrace that that is going on in our world.

I am pleased that a Foreign Office Minister is here to answer today's debate. If we truly have a wonderful special relationship with the United States, and if our Prime Minister is prepared to follow blindly whatever the President of the USA says, what return are we getting? Let us see some action on the other fronts that the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie mentioned, and let us see action on all those international treaties from which the USA is pulling out.

We learned from the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie that the USA's expenditure on AIDS is entirely cynical. It is making jolly sure that reproductive health and abortion services are not being funded. As a professional in that area, let me say that there is no way that an AIDS epidemic can be prevented unless reproductive health and abortion are also tackled. All those subjects are as one. Another reason why the USA is behaving in that way—this also explains its actions in the World Trade Organisation—is that it is funding the drugs industry.

I am getting black looks from Mr. Deputy Speaker so I shall finish by mentioning just one more thing. We were told that the distribution of condoms from the USA amounts in Botswana to one condom per annum per man. Who in the Chamber could cope with that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key).

Dr. Tonge: The hon. Member for Salisbury?

10.39 am

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I could cope quite simply; I had a vasectomy years ago.

Of all the debates that you and I have sat through over many years, Mr. Deputy Speaker, this must have been one of the most interesting. It will present the Minister with a challenge when he makes his wind-up speech.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) for giving us another opportunity to debate this important issue, which has been debated with great success over many years. I was elected back in 1983—the dark ages of AIDS. The foundation of the all-party group on AIDS was a milestone at a time when ignorance was rife in a era of Government health programmes involving tombstones on television to impress on the public the consequences of an AIDS epidemic.

One of the first things that we had to learn was that it is no good being judgmental about AIDS and adopting a high moral tone. It is no good blaming everything on lifestyle choices, as some hon. Members did in the 1980s. One hon. Member said to me: "A plague on them; they made a choice; let them die." That was in line with wide public perceptions at the time, and it is fortunate that things have moved on.

It remains a mistake in 2003 to be judgmental about AIDS, particularly in developing countries. Being judgmental when considering such an important matter is a temptation that we should resist. We simply cannot apply European and American cultural stereotypes to entirely different social and cultural situations elsewhere in our world. I would like to sit some of President Bush's advisers under a mango tree in Gambia on a Saturday morning—I have done that—to talk to the village imam and elders about AIDS, contraception, family planning and so on. That usually results in uncontrollable mirth on the part of listeners and, I regret, very little comprehension.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith was right to discuss the consequences of the situation for the entire world, and Colin Powell was right when he said that it is as serious a threat as international terrorism. The Bush Administration's record on frustrating the work of the United Nations Population Fund is not good. I want to say to the President, as one Christian to another, that there is no evidence that the fund promoted coercive abortion in China or anywhere else. Does the President understand the consequences of his policy? The UN has estimated that cutting the USA's $34 million contribution to the fund will lead to 800,000 more unsafe abortions and the death of 4,700 mothers and 77,000 children under the age of 5. That is not a happy outcome from a change in presidential policy.

Another unfortunate consequence, particularly in countries in Africa, is that orphans are created, and there is terrible suffering and enormous medical need. Yet what do we do? We recruit their nurses for the national health service of the United Kingdom. Last year, 2,114 nurses were recruited from South Africa, 473 from Zimbabwe, 432 from Nigeria, 183 from Zambia, 195 from the Gambia, 155 from Kenya, 100 from Botswana and 75 from Malawi, in addition to the 994 recruited from India. That is not a good idea. It may be to the advantage of the nurses, and we cannot blame them for wanting to enhance their careers, but should that be the public policy of the United Kingdom Government?

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) referred to the UK's commitment after 2015. I wholly endorse what he said about giving the global health fund the support that it needs to persuade the European Union to match US funds. There is an EU problem in that there is increasing evidence that the American Administration seeks to influence European parliamentarians to oppose development work and, therefore, development money for southern Africa if it involves reproductive health care issues. We must take that on board very seriously.

My hon. Friend also mentioned vaccines, which are hugely important. I hope that Government agencies, such as the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research, will encourage work on vaccines in partnership with our universities and their pharmaceutical partners.

The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) discussed the importance of Cairo and gave the Mozambiquan bishop's magnificent quote, which I shall use often. However, as a Christian who has a huge respect for the Roman Catholic Church, I would go further and say that the best thing that could happen to it would be that it accepted married priests and women bishops very soon. They might inject a little of the sense that the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (David Cairns) introduced into our debate. The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) discussed the huge impact on children as something that particularly affected him, and I salute him for making his comments.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde is a Member for whom we changed the law of this land. I spoke passionately in the debate on that occasion. It was a very good debate, which I suspect the hon. Gentleman read. If he did not, he can always check my website and find it there, because I am proud of what I said and proud that I voted to change the law so that he could come along this morning to tell us how the Catholic Church should be reformed and, furthermore, to do so while wearing a purple shirt. I congratulate him on that particular flourish.

The Minister must answer some serious questions. If he cannot do so now, he will in due course find someone who can. What total amount of money has our country given to the global fund? I am keen to know what our Government are doing to encourage other international donors to give more money, and our influence should be used to that effect. From where does the money for the global fund come? Is it from additional funds—perhaps from an unusually generous Chancellor of the Exchequer—or is it from the budget of the Department for International Development?

The Vice-President of Malawi, Justin Malewezi, who runs that country's campaign against AIDS, has raised a problem. He said that there is an upper ceiling for proposals and that any proposals "over $300 million would be thrown in the bin".

Can the Minister confirm whether that is the case? Is there an upper limit on proposals for expenditure from the fund?

The commission on intellectual property rights, which is funded by DFID, is an initiative of the United Kingdom Government that I warmly welcome. Will the Minister confirm whether its report reflects official Government policy? It is important to know that, because it makes some very significant suggestions. I would be grateful if the Minister would address that issue.

In conclusion, we must not forget that we, too, are a part of the debate about the international impact of the crisis. I wish to draw the attention of the House to early-day motion 691, which is entitled "Contraceptive awareness week 2003". It points out that there is still great cause for concern in our country, in which 41,200 people are living with HIV, 31 per cent. of whom are undiagnosed. The number of people living with diagnosed HIV is rising each year. We should be careful before throwing stones in our own glass house.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I should genuinely like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) for securing this important debate. It is a long time since I have heard such well argued and passionate comments from so many Members. They demonstrated genuine understanding. It is also a first for me to hear in a debate about the personal contraceptive practices of Front-Bench Members, although I am sure that that practice will continue.

This is an important debate. Tragically, the scourge of AIDS is reversing the development gains of the past few decades, at a time when 46 per cent. of Africans live in extreme poverty. The Government are therefore committed to encouraging the entire international community to play a full part in tackling the HIV/AIDS epidemic, which is having a huge impact in many poor countries on health, social development, education, food security and, as my hon. Friend argued, economic growth. The epidemic hits agricultural activity extremely hard and contributes to the tragic famine that is unfolding in sub-Saharan Africa.

In the brief time available, I want to focus on the Government's important work on tackling the epidemic in developing countries. The Government's response to the epidemic covers many vital issues. It includes supporting state-of-the-art interventions in prevention, care, impact mitigation, access to treatment, which is crucial, research and—many hon. Members have referred to this—mobilising the additional finance required to tackle HIV/AIDS.

Last year, the Department for International Development invested more than £200 million in HIV/AIDS-related bilateral work, which is an increase from £40 million in 1997. In anybody's book, the increase is both substantial and welcome. That money is being used to fund several specific tasks. First, it will support national plans to reduce the epidemic's impact. Secondly, it will ensure that national responses are multisectoral and are sustainably embedded in national budgets. Thirdly, it will enable countries to build capacity to deliver high-quality preventive treatment and care for people living with HIV/AIDS and for orphans. Fourthly, it will address underlying causes of vulnerability, particularly human rights, stigma, discrimination and gender inequalities.

To support that programme, the value of DFID's overall programme in Africa is set to increase from £640 million to £1 billion by 2006, which is a genuine indication of the Government's commitment. We want a major element of that money to be used for preventive purposes. For example, we are supporting innovative multi-media work in South Africa, where the HIV message is relayed through television soap operas and on the radio, which is often the most effective way to get the message across.

In Russia and China, we are working to reduce the incidence of HIV infection in injecting drug users. In Mozambique, we are trying to improve users' lives through life skills programmes aimed at HIV prevention. In Kenya, we are working with community-based organisations to care for AIDS orphans. As well as that important bilateral support, we are providing important contributions to support HIV/AIDS programmes run by multilateral agencies, which include the United Nations. Our work on prevention is extremely important.

Although we face a huge task, we should be optimistic: there is initial evidence, particularly from Africa and Asia, that HIV can be beaten. Examples include Cambodia, Uganda and Thailand, where condom use has significantly increased, and Senegal, which has been a model of good practice in HIV/AIDS prevention for some time. Progress can be made, but there is an urgent need for other countries, in which political leadership is essential, to learn from those successful countries. This week, Nelson Mandela said that one of his regrets from his time as President of South Africa is that he did not give sufficient priority to the issue. Everybody needs to respond to that message from someone who is enormously respected, particularly throughout the developing world.

Many hon. Members have called on the Government to do more. We are not complacent, and we are making a significant contribution, particularly through our actions through the global fund to fight AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria. We have pledged $200 million over five years, and $80 million of that has already been disbursed.

I pay tribute to the work undertaken by the Chancellor in conjunction with the Department for International Development, especially in creating the new international finance facility. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith, that the comments made by the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) were somewhat disparaging, and unjustified if one considers the case being advanced. We are not resiling from our commitment to increase our aid financing effectively and eventually to move towards contributing 0.7 per cent. of gross national product. However, that does not contradict the focus of the programme in trying to establish a partnership with businesses and civil society to increase those funds significantly, and that should be welcomed.

I agree with the comments made by the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), who spoke for the Liberal Democrats, that we should not neglect or decry the work being done to find a vaccine for AIDS. In the longer run, that is the most effective contribution that we can make. Although the first candidate AIDS vaccine in widespread trials was unsuccessful, HIV is a complex virus; many other candidate vaccines are in the pipeline, and we must support them. DFID has already committed £14 million to international AIDS vaccine initiatives and £16 million to the Medical Research Council's initiative.

In the short time remaining, I shall respond to points made by hon. Members. First, on the status of the UK's contribution to the global fund raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith, we support the call for increased funding from the rest of Europe. We will take up the case and argue it strongly; the UK is one of the largest Government donors to that fund, and we want it to continue.

My hon. Friend also raised the World Health Organisation and UNAIDS' target of 3 million people in developing countries on anti-retroviral therapy by 2005, asking whether the UK was part of that partnership. We are not partners, but we support the goals of the international HIV treatment coalition in respect of increasing access to treatment of HIV/AIDS. We are funding work in support of the goals and will continue to look at the strengthening of health care systems within developing countries.

My hon. Friend asked about monitoring mechanisms to ensure that DFID money goes to support health systems. There are annual reviews in countries to assess the programmes and to ensure that they meet those goals. We are working closely with UNAIDS and other international agencies to monitor the efficacy of the countries' responses, and we will continue to do so.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of the contribution and role of civil society, with particular reference to implementation and monitoring. The full and genuine participation of civil society at country level in the preparation, implementation and monitoring of proposals is vital to the fund's success.

I wholeheartedly agree with many of the points made in the excellent contribution from my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington). The financial initiative recently announced by President Bush should be welcomed, as it is a substantial financial contribution. However, there are some legitimate concerns that that money will be diverted from family planning services. We must look carefully at that and raise it with our American partners.

It is worth my underscoring the fact that the initiative is at a very early stage of development and has not yet been approved by Congress. There is a long way to go, and many of the points made today need to be considered in that context.

Finally, the hon. Member for Richmond Park professed passionate opposition to disarming Iraq. There will be no hope of tackling the AIDS crisis if we do not tackle proliferation and if weapons of mass destruction are used, the institutional order of our world will be in ruins. That should concern us all.

Coroners Courts

11 am

Mr. Chris Bryant (Rhondda): Again, it is a delight to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Over the past couple of days, several hon. Members have asked me why I called for a debate on such a recondite and obscure subject as the coroners' courts. I explained that there are many and good and strong reasons why we should have a full debate about the role of coroners in society, and how they operate, and I am delighted to see a former deputy coroner in the Chamber.

I wanted to raise the issue partly because of my experience as a curate in the Church of England. My first visit, which the vicar had asked me to make, was to an old lady who had been bedridden for several years. She died two minutes after I arrived. That regularly happened to me when I was a curate; people often died the moment that I visited them.

During the five years that I worked in the church, I saw how much extra and unnecessary grief the whole process of certification and dealing with inquests and post mortems can cause bereaved families. In cases of suicide, especially, when the family are already particularly distressed, a post mortem can cause even more grief when it is clear that the person has taken their own life and the family already face such complicated issues as how to explain it all to the children.

In the 20 months since I have been a Member of Parliament there have been 28 drugs-related deaths in my constituency alone. That is a very large number, by anyone's reckoning, but an accurate recording of the number of drugs-related deaths in the Rhondda. Each death was a tragedy for the person, their family and their community. In a valleys community in south Wales, unlike in a major city or conurbation, everyone in the street knows about the death of an individual, and a drugs-related death affects the whole community.

Under the current system, there is no room for the investigation of a series of deaths because there is no higher court, and the coroner stands alone and relatively unaccountable. An individual coroner might do a perfectly good job, but it is difficult to determine trends throughout the United Kingdom because there are no standard guidelines or rules on how a drugs-related death should be recorded.

In 2001, there were 532,500 deaths in England and Wales, 322,200 of which were certified by doctors without reference to the coroner, and 202,350 of which were reported to coroners. Of the cases reported to coroners, 121,100 led to post mortems but only 25,800 to inquests. In other words, 121,100 families went through the additional process of a post mortem. Almost one in four deaths in England and Wales led to a port mortem in 2001, which is a very high number in comparison with figures for other European countries. In Northern Ireland, where the coroner is allowed greater discretion as to whether to hold a post mortem, fewer than one in 10 deaths—9 per cent.—led to a post mortem.

I do not think that that is because there are more suspicious deaths in England and Wales or more deaths due to industrial disease that need greater investigation. I do not think that it is because people see their doctor less frequently or further from the moment of death. It is simply because the system in England and Wales has long been due for review. After all, most of the way in which coroners in England and Wales operate goes back to the Coroners Act 1887. The 138 coroners plus their deputies—roughly 375 individuals—operate in a miasma of fragmented legislation, which genuinely makes it difficult for people to have confidence in the system.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on raising this very important subject. He is right to say that far too many post mortems are ordered for no apparent reason. They should be confined to deaths in suspicious circumstances and genuinely sudden deaths for which there does not appear to be a medical cause.

On the hon. Gentleman's point about the need to bring the coroners' system up to speed, part of the reason for that, in my experience as an ex-deputy coroner, used to be that many coroners were part-time. However, that is not the case now. The situation has changed considerably, and now may be the time is right for better instruction from Government—for example, as to when post mortems should be ordered.

Mr. Bryant: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments. He is right about when post mortems should be held, and I shall come to that. However, a large number of coroners and deputy coroners are still part-time. I should like to see a far more professionalised service. Currently, a coroner has to have either legal or medical training. We should be able to guarantee both medical and legal training throughout the coroners' service. That is one of the issues that we need to consider.

I called for the debate because no society can truly value life unless it honours death properly. The traditional obsequies in different communities are important, and they vary enormously. Much of the 1887 law was written at a time when cremation was coming into use, but was still used by only a small minority of people in England and Wales. Now, however, 70 per cent. of funerals involve cremation. I shall deal with the three-tier certification process for cremation in a moment. In the multi-ethnic society in which we now live, and with the changing perceptions of death and how it should be honoured, it is important to review and renew the coroners' service.

Why on earth do we need a coroners' service in the first place? Obviously, we need it to detect and prevent foul play. I think that part of the reason why the Government initiated the review of the coroners' service that is being conducted at the moment—it should report finally at the end of the month—was the Harold Shipman case. It was clear that the certification process did not make it possible for us to detect and prevent further foul play in that case.

It is also important to determine trends in pathology and disease. One problem with a fragmented service is that it is difficult to provide the Office for National Statistics with clear and unambiguous reporting that is consistent throughout the United Kingdom.

An increasingly important aspect of the coroners' service is adjudication on cases of industrial disease. As a Member of Parliament for a former mining constituency, I know that for many widows what is on the death certificate is vital. A death certificate that refers to emphysema and chronic bronchitis results in a very different response from IRISC with regard to the miners' compensation process than does another certification, so it is vital that people have confidence in the process.

It is also important to adjudicate on whether a suicide has taken place, which may have significant legal and financial implications for the family concerned on mortgages, life insurance and so forth. Many implications stem from the determination that a suicide has taken place.

Finally, one important aspect of the coroner process and certification of death that is seldom mentioned is that it provides reassurance and support to families and next of kin. Knowing how and why someone died—especially after protracted illness in hospital when it has been disputed whether the treatment was right and proper, or in cases of mental illness—can be crucial for the family and the coroners' service carries out no more important role than providing secure and understandable reasons for cause of death.

At the moment the system is failing, partly because of fragmentation. To the vast majority of people, the system is incomprehensible. Until the moment when people have to go through the process of certification, they do not understand how the coroner relates to the registrar and the pathologist, or why a post mortem is carried out at some times, but not at others. Often there is no requirement to tell families that a post mortem is going to take place; sometimes they are not told about it.

Remarkably few rules and guidelines are in place to ensure consistency across the United Kingdom. One part of the country might have a meticulous and diligent coroner, but a coroner in another part of the country might work to a different set of assumptions and standards, and that must be wrong. Although a court of appeal exists in theory, in practice, few people have been able to go through the higher courts because the coroner service has no structure for appeal.

As I said earlier, too many post-mortems are carried out in England and Wales. The system is still under investigation, but the certification process seems to lead to many errors in adjudicating the cause of death. Some estimates suggest that more than 30 per cent. of deaths are incorrectly certified. The process for the certification of cremations was devised in 1887 and amended in the 1920s; it is open to abuse, not least because the second doctor is often nominated by the first doctor or by the funeral director, so is clearly not genuinely independent. Furthermore, the medical referee at the crematorium often receives the papers so late that he is deprived of the opportunity to say no and insist on reference to the coroner.

Most importantly, the current system has little sensitivity to the needs of the bereaved. A mechanistic approach is customarily adopted—a point reinforced yesterday when an hon. Member told me that families should get used to the fact of post mortems because they are important to society. However, for many people, the thought of their relatives and loved ones being dissected unnecessarily—particularly a double dissection of the bodily cavity and the skull—is profoundly upsetting. The system should be able to honour grief that naturally arises.

What would I like to see happen? Above all, I would like a single national coroner service for England and Wales, responsible to the Home Office rather than to the Lord Chancellor. Superior courts should be used for contentious cases or for the review of multiple cases—for example, a raft of drug-related deaths in a particular locality. I should also like clearer rules on how coroners operate—not just the legal procedures used for an inquest or in a coroners court, but a clear set of rules governing every aspect of when there should and should not be a post mortem. Of course, there should be a presumption that there will always be a full public inquest into deaths in custody or in prison and also perhaps in psychiatric hospitals or under psychiatric care. However, there should not be a presumption that there should be a full post mortem with double dissection in as many cases as there are now.

Thirdly, there should be clear national guidelines on the recording of deaths as drug related and in particular on when to require a toxicology report. Toxicology reporting across the UK is very patchy. I pay tribute to my own local coroner who does a good job in that respect, but it is uncertain whether that is equally true around the whole country. We should have an end to the three-tier certification process for cremation, which many doctors refer to as the ash-cash system. Instead we should have a robust system to support and monitor the certification of death to ensure that we have fewer errors in the attribution of the cause of death and clearer prevention of any foul play.

The coroners' review has already suggested that there might be a medical auditor. The Government should look at that. Undoubtedly we need to move towards roughly the same processes for burial as for cremation. We also need clarification of responsibility for the disposal of human tissue. It is not just the Alder Hey case that has provoked a great deal of concern in the UK about that. There is great uncertainty about whether it is the responsibility of the NHS trust, the pathologist or the coroner. That needs clarifying. We also need the active involvement of the family in the process of post mortem and inquest. As I said earlier, sometimes families do not even know that a post mortem is taking place.

Yesterday in the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport we were told the tale of a couple whose son had died in a contentious case that was widely and incorrectly publicised in the media. They were required to pay £300 for a copy of the transcript of their son's post mortem. That is wholly unnecessary. We should make the full coroner's report available to the families and the next of kin in such cases, and we should interpret the concept of families or next of kin in the broadest sense to mean not just married partners but unmarried partners.

Finally, I believe that there should be training for all coroners and all their officers. Dealing with bereaved families is complex and sometimes doctors or lawyers—with all respect to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd)—have not had training that is necessarily relevant to that process. Many coroners also need training in dealing with the media. Often in contentious cases families will be gobbled up by the media and spat out at the other end. With just a simple element of sensitivity to the issues around the media and how to respond to them, coroners could make lives much easier for the bereaved.

11.18 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Hilary Benn): I congratulate my hon. Friend on having secured this debate and more importantly on his speech. It set out in an exemplary fashion the range of issues that society needs to address in relation to the coroners' service. It has made my job of responding that much easier. I also acknowledge the expertise of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), of which I was unaware until this morning. I do not know of any other hon. Members with that knowledge, and it is good that he has joined us for the debate.

First, I should like to address the question that my hon. Friend touched upon, which is the purpose of the coroners' service. It is an ancient office that has existed since the middle ages and which, particularly since the early 19th century, has evolved into the current mechanism for trying to ensure that violent and unnatural deaths are properly investigated on behalf of society.

Coroners' inquests serve four main purposes. First, as my hon. Friend said, they reassure the public that any untoward or uncertain death will be investigated impartially by an independent judicial officer, and secondly, they enable any rumour or suspicion surrounding that death to be dispelled. Thirdly—I shall return to the point—they assist in maintaining the integrity of data on causes of death in the interests of public knowledge and public health. Fourthly, they underpin arrangements for detecting and deterring crime.

The coroners' service also has to answer, and rightly so, the natural questions asked by society and relatives when someone dies about what happened and why. However, in recent years, the coroners' service has also been subjected to the pressure of determining how coroners courts fit in with the other mechanisms being developed to try to answer the questions of why, how, and whether someone was to blame for what happened. That is important with respect to the review that is being undertaken. Coroners courts are only part of that overall process. However, some of the pressures on them have been due to the fact that people have sought, when they have lost a loved one, to use the coroners' service to answer some of those broader questions. We should recognise that other mechanisms, such as public inquiries, have been developed to try to deal with those broader issues, particularly when a large number of deaths have occurred.

The second issue, which my hon. Friend touched on from his experience in his former profession, is society's approach and attitude towards death. In the 19th century there was a formal system, structure and rituals for dealing with death. In the 19th century, people were much more familiar with death—one only has to walk into any graveyard and look at the ages of those who died at the time to see that that was the case. The real truth—and I speak from personal experience—is that although we now seem to be able to talk openly about a wide range of things to do with people's personal lives, society still has some difficulty in grappling with death, although it is the most natural of occurrences. Some of the issues that I will discuss later arise from that attitude.

I feel strongly that we should be open about death and what it involves. For example, we need to provide open information for people on the arguments for carrying out post mortems, both in respect of the coroners' service and advances in medical knowledge. For the best of motives, people in the medical profession used to talk about taking tissue samples, but we have learned from a range of experiences since then, and that approach will not work in the modern age. People are entitled to receive information and to hear the arguments, so that they can then take decisions.

Coroners have always been local to the communities that they serve. They are still appointed and supported by their shire county councils, unitary authorities, or consortiums of metropolitan districts or London boroughs. The coroner's jurisdiction is quite different from that of the criminal or civil courts. The justice that they dispense is not one of arbitration between different parties. It is an investigation of those deaths which society rightly considers should be the subject of a judicial inquiry held in public.

Coroners are independent of the Government and are answerable in their judicial decisions only to the courts. That is an important feature of the system if they are to investigate deaths fully. Nevertheless, as a public service, coroners have to operate with many Departments and agencies that have an interest in their work, and the Home Office provides general support and direction, working closely with the Coroners' Society of England and Wales.

As my hon. Friend said, about 12 per cent. of deaths reported to coroners result in inquests. Although the inquests will report all the relevant details of how the deceased came by his or her death, much attention is of course focused on the verdict. Coroners and their juries are not restricted in the verdicts they may bring in, but for the sake of statistical consistency—a point to which my hon. Friend referred—a number of formulae have been recommended to coroners, including accident, unlawful killing, and suicide.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of drug-related deaths, in which I know he takes great interest. In 1984 new verdicts were suggested to coroners in respect of such deaths: death from dependence on drugs or non-dependent abuse of drugs. The truth is that these drug-related verdicts are not entirely satisfactory. Coroners believe that accident or other verdicts may more closely reflect the circumstances of the death. It is not always easy to separate the different contributory factors in trying to reach a verdict.

In view of the need to improve our information about the number of deaths due to drugs, work has been proceeding on finding the best way to use the information from coroners' inquests in conjunction with the Department of Health and the Coroners' Society of England and Wales. I pay tribute to their contribution to this work. We aim to issue guidance to coroners in the next couple of months, although it is in part linked to the coroners review. The suggested definition will be:

> "deaths where the underlying cause is poisoning, drug abuse or drug dependence and where any of the substances listed under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, as amended, were involved".

As an illustration I shall give statistics published on the total number of drug-related deaths in England and Wales. In 2000 it was 2,968. Within that total only 622 were recorded by coroners' verdicts as coming within the two 1984 definitions, of which 309 resulted from a dependence and 313 from non-dependent use. Yet the Office for National Statistics information on the total number of drug-related deaths draws heavily on the further information that coroners provide. Most coroners provide it in a form that the ONS has requested, but not all, which raises questions about the data's consistency to which my hon. Friend referred. This is part of the Government's national programme on substance abuse-related deaths.

My hon. Friend made the case for change in the coroner system with great skill. It has evolved over 800 years but the need for fundamental change has been highlighted by a number of recent events, of which the Shipman case is of course one. A separate inquiry into that is being led by Dame Janet Smith. One issue for the House after the inquiry will be balancing the arising recommendations, which will be important, with a recognition of the extraordinary nature of those crimes.

The Marchioness disaster highlighted the treatment of the bereaved. As Lord Justice Clarke's inquiry showed, it was easy for professionals who in good faith considered their practice as acceptable to fail to realise that it was not acceptable, particularly when it came to the concerns of the bereaved and the need to deal sensitively with families. I am particularly concerned, and I know my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is passionate about it, to ensure consistency of care and compassion across the board in the coroners' service. I have seen with my own eyes such care and compassion being exercised in the coroners court. I have also, as a Minister, received correspondence from families who felt that the opposite was the case. We must also take account of the issues arising from the Alder Hey affair.

The review of coroner services has been established to look at these issues. The Government are clear that we need to reform the system. In its consultation document, the inquiry said:

> "The prevailing impression we have is of people managing to give committed, professional, and compassionate service through obsolete and neglected structures".

That sums it up. We have committed and professional people but a structure that does not necessarily work. That is why the Government established the review, and we look forward greatly to its results, which are expected shortly, so that we can put the coroners' service on a new footing for the new century and meet the objectives that my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda so ably set out.

Rwanda and the Great Lakes

2 pm

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk): I am very pleased to have this opportunity to highlight what is happening in one part of the Great Lakes region, the Democratic Republic of the Congo. I want to focus on the report by the UN panel of experts on the illegal exploitation of natural resources and other forms of wealth in that country. However, I am pleased that the debate also gives an opportunity for others, with a much longer track record than mine, to raise important issues relating to the region. I know that other hon. Members applied for an Adjournment debate on the same subject.

The all-party group on the Great Lakes region and genocide prevention produced its own report on the exploitation of mineral resources in the DRC. I pay tribute in particular to the work of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King), who chairs the group, in pointing out the challenges that the region presents for the international community.

The DRC has been ravaged by conflict since 1998. It is pretty clear that the cause of the continuing conflict has in large part been the desire of countries or groups to get their hands on the country's rich natural resources—gold, diamonds and other rare metals such as coltan, in particular, which is used in mobile phones and is probably present in this Chamber. Six foreign armies have been involved in this war-ravaged country: Uganda, Rwanda, Angola, Zimbabwe, Namibia and Burundi.

Back at the start of the events in question, in 1998, there were already 50,000 troops from various countries engaged in the conflict. Child soldiers have been used on all sides. In February a BBC news report suggested that the DRC was "awash" with child soldiers. A report on the north-eastern Ituri region cited aid workers as saying that children formed the bulk of the troops in some armed groups.

The conflict has left between 2 million and 3.5 million people dead—that is the scale of the disaster that has afflicted the country. Disease and abuse are widespread. There have been recent reports of cannibalism practised by the Movement for the Liberation of Congo. A report in January suggested that there was a UN investigation into claims that rebel groups send pygmies out on hunting expeditions and, if they come back with nothing, kill them and feed on their sexual organs. There are also reports that pygmies are forced to eat the remains of their colleagues who have been killed.

A peace process was begun in 1999 and stepped up in 2002. I do not underestimate the progress that has been made in bringing peace to the country, but it is a long way from completion, with trouble continuing throughout the DRC. In 2002 peace accords were signed in Pretoria by the DRC and the Governments of Rwanda and Uganda. However, atrocities have continued. In the past few days there have been reports of a massacre near the Ugandan border, committed by pro-Government forces, including members of the Ugandan army. Estimates of civilian deaths in that massacre range from 250 to 467. Some 150,000 people have been displaced by the latest violence.

[Norman Lamb]

The Guardian has reported that both Rwanda and Uganda have denied breaking the peace accords. However, many believe that both countries are still intent on exploiting diamonds, gold and other minerals in the DRC. Africa Confidential, a London-based newsletter, has accused them both of delivering fresh arms to proxy militias, in defiance of the South Africa-brokered peace accords of last year.

The UN panel of experts was first established in June 2000 to consider the illegal exploitation of natural resources, and to consider in particular the link between that exploitation and the continuation of the conflict. Foreign armies were using the conflict as an excuse to continue exploiting resources. The first report was issued in April 2001 and concluded that illegal exploitation of mineral and forest resources was taking place "at an alarming rate." It considered two forms of exploitation: looting on a mass scale, and systematic, systemic exploitation of those resources. It identified key individual actors,

> "including army commanders and businessmen and government structures",

> "the engine of this exploitation."

The report also referred to the enrichment of top Ugandan military commanders and civilians—remember that we give millions of pounds in aid to Uganda. It noted the emergence of illegal networks headed by top military officers and business men, and recognised the > "opportunistic behaviour of some private companies and influential individuals."

Its recommendations included sanctions against both countries and individuals.

On 19 December 2001, the UN Security Council requested a renewal of the expert panel's mandate for a further six months. The panel was asked to provide an update on the situation and to make further recommendations. Its final report came out in October last year. Its conclusion was that there had been a > "multi-billion dollar corporate theft of the country's mineral assets".

The panel looked at politically and economically powerful groups involved in exploitation activities which had become "highly criminalised". It looked further at the concept of an elite network of senior military people, business men and government officials in the various foreign Governments and in the DRC Government, all acting together to continue that exploitation.

It is important to state that various parties who are named and shamed in the final report heavily dispute aspects of it. I should be interested to hear the Minister's comments on the process, because the panel's remit came to an end when it published the report. When the Governments concerned sought further evidence to support the allegations in the report, they were told that the panel's remit had come to an end and that it was unable to respond. Thankfully, the panel's remit has been re-established through another UN resolution, but we are still waiting for further supporting evidence. That is wholly unsatisfactory, especially for people who have been wrongly named in the report, quite apart from the need to bring the illegal activity to an end.

The latest report describes the operation of criminal groups linked to the armies of the countries to which I have referred. It describes how the groups do not disband as the armies withdraw, which is why this important issue continues to be unresolved. The report describes how such groups > "have built up a self-financing war economy centred on mineral exploitation."

As the armies withdraw,

> "the Governments of Rwanda and Zimbabwe, as well as powerful individuals in Uganda, have adopted other strategies for maintaining the mechanisms for revenue generation, many of which involve criminal activities."

The Ugandan defence forces have been training local militias to take over where they leave off, and Rwanda has engaged in similar tactics.

Senior Zimbabwean officers have enriched themselves by exploiting the DRC's mineral assets under the cover of arrangements to repay Zimbabwe for military services provided to the DRC Government. The Zimbabwe defence force has set up new companies and contractual arrangements to defend its economic interests. The report refers to the criminal activities that have been indulged in, which include theft, the embezzlement of public funds, the under-valuation of goods, smuggling, false invoicing, the non-payment of taxes, kickbacks and bribery—it is a pretty wide range.

In the Government-controlled area, the elite network that the report describes is made up specifically of Zimbabwean politicians and members of the military. The report says that the is the Speaker of the Zimbabwean Parliament, Emmerson Mnangagwa. It also refers to Air Marshal Perence Shiri, who is a long-time ally of Mugabe and who helped to turn Harare into a significant centre for the illicit diamond trade. The report names several other Zimbabwean politicians and military people.

> "key strategist for the Zimbabwean branch of the elite network"

I want to deal now with an individual who has a base in this country and who, according to the report, has been very active in this disaster. John Bredenkamp must be a serious concern for the British Government. He denies the allegations against him, but serious questions have been asked, and it is important that progress is made with the investigation. His British business is based in Sunningdale, and he has extensive interests in the UK. His estimated personal wealth is $500 million. The report says that he > "is experienced in setting up clandestine companies and sanctions-busting operations"

> "has a history of clandestine military procurement".

It is alleged that he was involved in sanctions busting for Ian Smith before the end of white rule in Rhodesia and, of course, before he transferred his allegiance to the Mugabe regime. It is alleged also that he supplied arms to both sides in the Iran-Iraq war.

In March 2001, The Observer reported close links between John Bredenkamp and the Mugabe regime, and critics claimed that he was making significant sums as a supporter of that corrupt regime. There were also reports that his companies were major suppliers of arms in the DRC war and that he had taken over the management of Zimbabwe's mining concessions in the DRC to make money from the exploitation of the resources to which I referred.

It is said that Bredenkamp favours one Emmerson Mnangagwa—the Speaker of the Parliament—as a successor to Mugabe. As I have already described, Mnangagwa cropped up as a key strategist in the Zimbabwean operation in the DRC. Bredenkamp operates through various companies, including Aviation Consultancy Services. ACS represents BAE Systems and has supplied Zimbabwe's air force with BAE Systems parts. Bredenkamp claims that that stopped when sanctions were imposed on the country, but the report refers to his discussions with senior officials and says that he > "offered to mediate sales of British Aerospace military equipment to the Democratic Republic of the Congo."

It also claims that BAE Systems spare parts for the Hawk 60 aircraft were supplied to the Zimbabwe air force early in 2002, in clear breach of the sanctions. I have tabled numerous questions about that, and we still have not got to the bottom of exactly how those parts arrived in Zimbabwe. It is reported that the Zimbabwe air force has used Hawks for attack operations in the DRC.

I want to refer now to British business man Andrew Smith, who is a former Royal Engineers captain. He manages Avient Air, which supplied six attack helicopters to the Kinshasa Government and contracted to perform bombing raids over the eastern DRC between 1999 and 2000. The report also highlights transactions between Avient Air and the accused arms trafficker, Leonid Minim, an unsavoury character by all accounts.

What concerns me are the responses that I have received to my questions to Ministers about contact between Bredenkamp and Andrew Smith and UK Government officials. Given the alleged involvement of both men in profiting from the conflict in DRC, there is, understandably, serious concern about the extent of that contact. A parliamentary answer of November last year confirmed that, in the previous 12 months, two meetings and two telephone calls had taken place between John Bredenkamp and British high commission officials in Zimbabwe, but when I subsequently asked what was discussed at those meetings and who was present, I was told that the Government were not prepared to answer my questions. Why not? These seem to be perfectly legitimate points.

Concerns about the activities of the high commission in Harare were underlined by a report in the Zimbabwean Financial Gazette in March 2000, which stated that the then British high commissioner in Harare, Peter Longworth, had dispatched a confidential memo to the Foreign Office arguing for the lifting of an embargo on arms exports to Zimbabwe. As recently as 2000, the Ministry of Defence appears to have supported arms exports to Zimbabwe, and it is alleged that another batch of spare parts for the BAE Hawk was supplied via Kenya in 2000. Was that done with the knowledge of the MOD and BAE Systems? No one knows.

I was also told in parliamentary answers that Andrew Smith has had several meetings with British diplomats in Harare during the past two years. In October 2001, he met the defence attaché. Why? What was that meeting about? The Government are not prepared to say. The previous political councillor at the British high commission in Harare apparently met Smith on several occasions. Officials met Smith at several social events in 2001 and had several telephone conversations with him during the same year. As with Bredenkamp, the Government refuse to provide information about who was present at meetings and what was discussed.

I understand that the Minister is, in a sense, a stand-in today, so if he is unable to answer my questions, I would very much appreciate it if he would undertake to ensure that they are answered by whoever is responsible for the matter at the Department for International Development. First, have the Government specifically investigated how those BAE Hawk spare parts got to the Zimbabwe defence force last year? In a written answer of November 2002, I was told that the Government were urgently seeking details from the UN and would have to investigate. What is the result? In letters to me, the chairman of BAE Systems, Sir Richard Evans, claimed that the company did not know where the spare parts came from. What is the truth of the matter? Do the Government accept that assertion?

Secondly, on the contact between UK officials and Andrew Smith, what has been revealed by the further investigations that were promised in a parliamentary answer on 5 December? Further investigations about John Bredenkamp were promised in another parliamentary answer. What have they revealed? Furthermore, given the fact that Bredenkamp has a business base in this country and Andrew Smith is a British citizen, what is the Government's assessment of their role and that of their respective companies in the massacre in the Congo?

When I asked who was present at those meetings, I was refused an answer. Can that be justified? Surely we should know who was present and what was discussed with those characters, given the allegations against them in the report. Will the Minister confirm what investigations are under way into the allegations in the report, in particular those about companies and individuals based in this country and named in the report?

Has there been a further request to the panel of experts for evidence since the new resolution was passed in January? What has happened since then? It is important that progress is made on the matter but from my perspective, there seems to be an absence of it. That may be the UN's fault; it may be the UK Government's fault, but we need to know what logjam is preventing anyone getting to the bottom of the scandal.

In a written answer dated 11 December 2002, Clare Short specifically said—

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): The Secretary of State.

Norman Lamb: I apologise. The Secretary of State said that the report contained "notable and deeply regrettable" inaccuracies. That may well be the case, as I said earlier, but what are those inaccuracies? What are the UK Government's concerns about the report? A written answer dated 4 November 2002 stated that the Government were considering a substantive response to the report's findings. When will that response be given? Will it be in the form of a statement to the House of Commons? What progress is being made?

[Norman Lamb]

For future action, the UN report recommends, among other things, travel bans on individuals identified in the report. It also recommends freezing their assets and imposing banking restrictions. Given the extensive business connections with this country, that is an important question, and the Government must deal with it. What action are the Government taking to follow those recommendations about individuals closely connected to the UK, and what is the time scale for that action?

How do the Government respond overall to the report's recommendations, specifically in considering how the actions of the countries involved in the conflict in the Congo will affect future grants of development assistance? Will those grants be conditional upon proper conduct regarding the DRC? On 13 November 2002, the chairman of the panel of experts, Ambassador Kassem, recommended a five to six-month grace period to allow individuals and companies to change their working practices. What is the Government's assessment of the position three or four months on from that recommendation?

Again in a parliamentary answer, we were told that the behaviour in Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda would be factored into future assessments for development assistance for those countries. What does that mean? How will compliance with the recommendations be measured? Is it already taking place? Will the Government agree to the all-party parliamentary group's proposal for a regional strategy paper on the Great Lakes region and for a regional conference?

The whole matter has been an absolute scandal. When 1 million people or more are massacred in one country in four years, it is important for the international community to treat the report's recommendations with the utmost seriousness and to ensure that action is taken. We recently heard about the loss of 1 million lives in Iraq; we are talking about the loss of far more lives in Africa. There is a tendency for us in the west to put to one side the loss of life in Africa, but that is not acceptable. It must be taken extremely seriously, and I look forward to hearing the Minister's response.

2.23 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) on securing the debate and on his very illuminating introductory speech. As one who had the privilege of leading the interparliamentary group to Rwanda about five months ago, I came to the debate for an update on the situation. He has helped us by referring to that very important report, which was published since the IPG's visit, and with the questions that he asked.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) and the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), who were members of the delegation, are present. During the delegation's time in Rwanda, as during a debate in this Chamber initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Ann McKechin) on 18 December 2002, we inevitably focused on the terrible issue of genocide, which was, in many ways, the reason for our visit. We saw the appalling evidence of what had taken place in 1994 and we were keen to see how the process of reconciliation was progressing and to ensure, in so far as we could influence matters, that never again would anything like that take place in Rwanda or anywhere else in the Great Lakes region. We were concerned then, as we are today, about the evidence of activity in the DRC. When we met President Kagame, he was not able to reassure us—he said that he had pulled out his troops but that if there were any suggestion of a threat to his borders, they would return.

We have no more reason for optimism today than we had then, particularly if, as the hon. Member for North Norfolk said, we consider the problems in Burundi as well. Three million people have perished in the DRC since 1998 and, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development reminded us in the debate on 18 December, there are still people in gacaca courts who want genocide to continue in the region. We still have great worries.

It is right, given the focus on international events, and the possibility of conflict elsewhere, that these terrible issues in Africa should not disappear from our thoughts. That is one of the reasons why I am delighted that the debate is taking place today. I welcome the Minister for Europe and look forward to hearing his views. When members of our delegation met President Kagame, we discussed with him three important issues, based on the memorandum of understanding between the United Kingdom and Uganda: respect for human rights, media independence and transparency. Those three issues remain at the heart of everything that we are trying to achieve in Rwanda and in the wider region.

It is right that we should put on record our questions and our concern about the achievements of the international criminal tribunal for Rwanda. A lot of funding and resources have been made available, there is a great deal of good will, and the nations of the European Union have given their support to its activities, but there is not as much action or as much evidence that long-standing problems are being dealt with as many of us might wish. Many people who should have been brought to justice have not been. That cannot be acceptable, given the knowledge that we have.

We discussed with the President and others the role of the European Union. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has a great interest in that, as well as in our own contribution towards conflict solution in the region. We were told, not least by the president, that in 1994, the international community stood by, aware that genocide was taking place, and did not respond in the way that that dreadful situation invited. My hon. Friends in the delegation, as recently as five months ago, saw some of the evidence. We visited the church where 5,000 people from both tribes had perished: men, women and children—babies as well. We visited Giterama prison, which holds 7,000 or 8,000 people. That visit reinforced our belief that reconciliation, welcome though it is, requires the speeding up of the legal process. People have waited far too long to see justice done.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill spoke here in December she reminded those of us who were on the delegation of a very poignant visit to one of the gacaca courts. When eventually one of the prisoners was called forward, the proceedings were conducted in a very humane way, despite the dreadful backdrop. A woman walked out of the crowd, comporting herself with great dignity. She asked the prisoner a few questions. He responded by admitting to killing 13 people, including three of her children. None of us, shocked as we were, wanted to rush to judgment. When we saw that woman's dignity, we wanted to be sure that such things could never happen again. We supported the endeavours of the people of Rwanda to co-operate with such hearings.

We came away disturbed, but not without hope. Despite Rwanda's dreadful past, its lack of opportunities, its poor prospects for prosperity in tourism and agriculture—the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) was firm on that point—the country does have opportunities. Commodity prices are falling, and we saw the problems that the country has in exporting coffee and cocoa, and market conditions in the EU are not helpful.

We had then, and still have, great hopes for the development of pluralism in Rwanda. We look forward to the elections that have been promised for July this year. If they do take place—and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will bring us up to date on them—I hope that all the political parties will have access to the voters; that the process will be seen as free and fair; and that when the results are declared we will see a society that is moving further towards genuine democracy. It will be able to inspire not just its own people but neighbouring countries in that vital region. It will offer them hope—

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): The right hon. Gentleman has very noble aspirations for Rwanda and the Great Lakes region, which we all share. Would he not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk and me that unless we do something about the legal and illegal—especially the illegal—exporting of arms to those countries we shall make little progress?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Lady is right. I know that she worked tremendously hard during the delegation's visit. She raises a fundamental point. We cannot speak about the dreadful things that are happening while we continue to export arms to Indonesia, East Timor and African countries. We must ask why we are doing that. Her point is a profound one, and I am happy to end on it, because it raises a number of ongoing questions. I am delighted to have had the opportunity to contribute to the debate initiated by the hon. Member for North Norfolk.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke). He ably led the parliamentary delegation to Rwanda in October, a group that I was privileged to join, as was the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), whose skills extended to treating me when I became rather ill there. Thanks to her help, however, I did not miss much of our visit.

I congratulate the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) on initiating the debate and speaking so knowledgeably on the subject of Rwanda and the Great Lakes. I shall confine my remarks to my experience of Rwanda. The right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston covered much of what I wanted to say, and I shall not repeat it. However, he was right to say that although we were aware of what was going on in Rwanda, the world stood by and watched.

I understand people believing that politics is a hypocritical business. At the moment, we are rightly concentrating on what is happening in Iraq. After that, perhaps, we shall consider what is happening in North Korea, Pakistan and Iran; but we stood by and watched while 850,000 people in Rwanda were being massacred in the most horrific way.

We visited a church in Rwanda where people had taken refuge, and had literally to walk through piles of skulls and human bones. We laid flowers on massive collections of human remains, which brought home the horror of the genocide that had taken place only a few years before. Unlike a previous parliamentary delegation, we did not find out more about how those people—men, women and children—had been killed. However, it was the most horrific thing that I have ever seen, and I am sure that I shall never experience anything like it again.

It got worse, however. As the right hon. Gentleman said, we visited the court and saw what was described as justice on the grass. I happened to meet a woman who had lost her father, her husband, her sister and three children in the massacre. Her dignity was incredible. She told me that she did not want retribution. She did not want to see the young man who had just confessed to the crimes being put to death, because that would have added to the carnage. She wanted justice, but also the reconciliation to which people in Rwanda now seem committed.

The right hon. Gentleman was right to say that that reconciliation needs the help of the international community. Although people there are determined on reconciliation because of the horrors that they have experienced, the situation in Rwanda is fragile. Indeed, as the hon. Member for North Norfolk said, that fragility extends to the countries that surround Rwanda: when we arrived, we found that conflict had broken out on Rwanda's borders, albeit briefly, which was a reminder of how fragile the situation is.

The right hon. Gentleman graphically analysed what we found in Rwanda. I shall not repeat what he said, but shall finish by saying that although we concentrated on the carnage and the desperate genocide that took place there, it is too easy to forget that the country is poor and diseased, that it has no infrastructure and that it suffers under European Union trade rules. We need to address all those issues: we should not forget that side of Rwanda.

A short while ago, I had the privilege of leading a delegation to Ethiopia, which is facing drought and the possibility of starvation. However, people there can survive—they probably will—with the help of the international community. In Rwanda such help is necessary. I support the Prime Minister's stance against certain countries, but I ask the Minister to remind him that, in addition to the threat from Iraq—we must never take our eye off that ball—murders on the most massive scale have been committed elsewhere, right under our noses, in what is supposed to be a civilised age.

2.40 pm

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) on securing the debate. I also congratulate the Government on their engagement with and support for the region. I have attended meetings with Ministers and officials, and I have seen a shift in policy. There is now a determination not to run away from the region's problems, but to remain engaged and to help to solve the problems that still have a devastating effect on millions of lives.

There are strong relationships between the countries of the Great Lakes region. For many years the all-party group has acknowledged a major issue: the need for a regional policy that recognises those inter-relationships. Although the UK Government initially did not seem to be persuaded of the need for such a policy, I understand that they have since recognised it and that there is now a regional policy paper. However, that paper is not a public document. There is much instability in the region, and there will be uncertainty about the impact of donor countries—supporter countries—such as the UK.

Sometimes it is in the interests of one of the Great Lakes countries to claim that the UK is biased in its support for another in the region. That does not help to produce a peaceful solution to problems. A public document—a published regional strategy—could show that the UK policy is focused not only on Rwanda and Uganda, but on peace, stability and fairness throughout the region.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk concentrated on the Democratic Republic of the Congo; he spoke on the involvement of the arms trade in that country and the illegal export of natural resources. I share his concerns about those issues. On the arms trade, it is right that we should consider the big issue of weapons of mass destruction, but we must also consider the minor weapons and the huge damage that they can cause. The UK is a large producer and exporter of arms and unless we make serious attempts at defence diversification, which we could do, there will always be concern because we fuel employment in this country by our continual sale and export of arms. We have many talented people working in the arms trade in this country, and they could be using their skills in other ways. It would be a better use of taxpayers' money if the subsidies that go into arms exports and other endeavours were used to diversify.

On illegal exploitation, I would urge the Government to respond publicly to the findings of the UN panel of experts. Is British and European bilateral aid likely to be linked to the cessation of the illegal exploitation of natural resources and to the implementation of the Lusaka accords? The all-party group welcomes the UN initiative to introduce certification schemes that detail the country of origin for diamonds; it also recommends that there be similar certification schemes, if that is possible and appropriate, to address the exploitation of other precious resources in the region. I also urge the Government to do all they can to ensure that an even-handed approach is adopted towards all the parties involved in the illegal exploitation of resources. Appropriate pressure must be brought to bear to end the suffering that has escalated, especially around the mineral-rich areas.

I hope that the Government will recognise that a sustainable peace in the DRC will not be possible without a solution to the crisis in Ituri and the Kivus. We must maintain the pressure on the Governments of the DRC, Rwanda and Uganda fully to implement the Pretoria and Lusaka accords. Primarily, those Governments must withdraw all foreign forces from DRC territory. We could guarantee the future territorial integrity of, and cease supplying the armed groups in, Ituri and the Kivus. I hope that the Government will do what they can to press all the parties that agreed to the political settlement on 17 September last year. The settlement has not yet been fully ratified to create and implement a full transitional Government in Kinshasa, which is needed as soon as possible.

The involvement of the MONUC forces is incredibly important. We must work with the United Nations to ensure that there are sufficient resources so that the forces can have a stronger mandate and an enhanced peacekeeping role. There must be protection of civilians because there is still a huge amount of rape and sexual violence in the region. I hope that the Government will make the strongest possible representations to the Governments of the DRC and Uganda to ensure swift effectiveness of the Ituri pacification commission.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) rightly pointed out the real issues in Rwanda. I ask the Government to take more action on specific issues. The Rwanda-UK memorandum of understanding needs to be redrafted to strengthen the language on human rights and conflict prevention and resolution, especially in relation to the DRC. Concerns have been raised that Rwanda is getting away with human rights abuses and conflict in the DRC, although I understand that the UK Government have not seen evidence of that. However, if it is occurring, neither the UK Government nor the Rwandan Government should have any worry about strengthening the memorandum of understanding—indeed, they should welcome it.

Clearly, if the Rwandan Government are to withdraw troops fully and permanently from the DRC and ensure that there is no supply to the rebel groups involved in the unrest in the Kivu and Ituri region, we must play our part by showing the importance of that. Things could start to move forward if Rwanda were at least pressed to answer the allegations of serious human rights abuses that have been made, such as allegations in the report by the United Nations panel of experts.

Burundi has not been mentioned much today although it is an equally important part of the great lakes region. A ceasefire was agreed in December 2002 between the Government of Burundi and CNDD-FDD, but that has not come into force. Both sides have repeatedly violated the ceasefire, although of course each side blames the other for the aggression. I hope that the Government will continue to negotiate with that country. We need to press all parties in the conflict to respect international humanitarian law and to bring those guilty of human rights abuses to justice.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): Rumours are circulating that the Burundians are considering giving an amnesty to the leader of the FNL—which is responsible for several atrocities in the region, including the murder of one of my constituents—in the hope that that would shore up the peace process. Will my hon. Friend join me in condemning any such pact?

Ms Drown: Yes. There is a serious argument for bringing those people to justice. The issue must be considered from the point of view of both sides of the dispute and there is a call for people to be brought to justice.

There is a need to reintegrate the rebel and Government forces in order to give them another route in life. The British Government have had success doing that in other countries and we could use skills and talents that we have developed, although financial and political back-up will be required. The whole security sector in Burundi needs to be restructured, demobilised and reintegrated into civil society. Political and financial support is important in order to achieve the swift deployment of observers and peacekeeping troops that the UN Security Council requested in January.

The Minister knows that I have been interested in the issue of debt for many years. I am currently chair of the all-party group on highly indebted poor countries. I would be grateful for an update on the debt situation of the countries in the Great Lakes region. All of them are hoping to move to a post-conflict position, which means that they can be helped by the HIPC initiative. If we are going to assist such countries to reconstruct, and to make them economically and militarily stable, they will have to be enabled to build up their infrastructure and public services to show their populations that peace is worth working for. All of that must start before we begin to talk about millennium development goals for those countries. We should be achieving those goals in every country throughout Africa and beyond. If they are going to achieve them we need to ensure that their bilateral and multilateral debts are written off.

The region has many intractable problems, but I encourage the Government to stay engaged and to find solutions, and I am confident that they will do so. That is what the ordinary people of those countries want. The prize of peace and stability in the region is worth working for, and I am pleased to be able to play my part in pushing the Government to do their bit to help to achieve that.

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) on securing the debate. I have worked closely with him in the past, and I know that he takes a strong interest in these matters. I wish to draw particular attention to the work that he has done in relation to countries in the Great Lakes region.

I also congratulate the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) on making an interesting contribution, and the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and the right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke), who led the delegation to Rwanda late last year. I heard both of them speak in the debate on the genocide in Rwanda, and I was greatly moved. Although I was not a member of that delegation I feel that I was because of their moving contributions both today and in the past.

Although the eyes of the world are currently focused on events in the middle east, it is equally important to remember the problems of the rest of the world. They may not involve weapons of mass destruction or threats to international security, but the Government and all of us would do well to confront these issues, and debates such as this help very much in achieving that purpose.

As several hon. Members commented, we thoroughly debated Rwanda in December. Particular attention was paid in that debate to the aftermath of the genocide, and Rwanda's problems were fully aired, but the debate also served as an opportunity to highlight some of the progress that has been made in that country. Today, we heard about the report by the UN panel of experts on the exploitation of natural resources and the way in which, under cover of conflict, looting has taken place in which the army and the Government have been involved.

I do not wish to repeat the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk, but he raised several questions that the Minister must answer. Not all the answers will necessarily be at his fingertips today, but they must be forthcoming. The behaviour of private individuals and companies leaves a lot to be desired, and we hope to hear more about that in the near future.

As I mentioned in the previous debate, Rwanda's commitment to development and the relief of poverty among its people must be accompanied by a commitment to peace with its neighbours. The agreement signed by Rwanda and the Democratic Republic of the Congo was crucial in laying the foundation for peace, but it was only ever going to work if all sides acted in accordance with the spirit of the agreement and if all aspects of it were implemented. Months later, despite good words, widespread evidence remains that that has yet to happen.

The October 2002 report of the UN panel of experts, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend, listed a series of recommendations on which I hope the Minister will comment. I was interested to read that the very first recommendation highlighted the importance of development aid for the region and stated that such assistance should be made a priority. It said:

> "the first set of initiatives could be for quick disbursing aid for the Democratic Republic of Congo and the other great lakes countries involved in the conflict, for reconstruction and rehabilitation programmes, aimed at creating jobs, rebuilding infrastructure, and improving conditions for local populations, notably in the areas of education, health and sanitation."

As in many other parts of the world, aid is the key to alleviating the poverty that often leads to hostility and warring between nations. If we can relieve that suffering, we will have come a long way in tackling conflicts such as those that have plagued east-central Africa in the past.

Although we Liberal Democrats welcome the investment that the Government have made in countries such as Rwanda and the increased spending that has occurred, I make no apology for returning to that old chestnut, 0.7 per cent. of GNP, which is so often highlighted inside and outside Parliament. We have consistently argued that the Government should set a clear timetable for raising UK contributions to 0.7 per cent. of GNP, but time and again they have failed to produce a satisfactory answer. To say, as they have said to me in parliamentary answers, that Department for International Development contributions beyond 2005-06 are matters for future Parliaments is unacceptable. The Department of Transport can plan a budget 10 years ahead, so I cannot understand why DFID cannot do likewise.

[John Barrett]

Last week Paul Kagame, the President of Rwanda, issued a further appeal for international support, especially because the country is approaching the end of a transition period ahead of the presidential and parliamentary elections. As the Minister knows, a new constitution is soon to be produced that will provide the basis for the political situation that will develop after the transition period. I am keen to hear details of the support that the Government intend to provide.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk rightly placed great emphasis on problems in the DRC and the institution building that will have to take place if long-term peace and security are to become reality. What is needed is not only building in bricks and mortar, but building trust between countries and rebuilding people's lives. If the trust that has so often been lacking in the region is ever to be created, there must be transparency at all points in the process. The commission of enquiry that was set up to investigate allegations against Ugandan companies and individuals highlighted in the UN report has helped a great deal in that respect. The Government of Rwanda would do well to follow suit, and, in view of the arguments advanced by my hon. Friend, there may well be a case for similar action by the UK Government.

The United Nations mission has been widely credited with doing sterling work in the region, but it is clearly hampered by a lack of resources. Many of us have argued for an increased role for peacekeeping and protection of civilians, but good will must be backed up with hard cash if it is to be made into a reality.

The ongoing occupation of eastern Congo by Rwandan soldiers cannot be tolerated. I recall a story I read some time ago in The Observer, which accused many Rwandan soldiers of working in conjunction with Hutu militiamen to stay within the DRC and exploit the resources of the country. One American diplomat stated:

> "The Interahamwe is now a very convenient excuse for Rwanda to loot Congo. Maybe it is 20 per cent threat and 80 per cent for show."

Another UN officer said that security concerns of Rwanda had become "a joke".

I conclude by reiterating the needs of the countries around the Great Lakes and stressing why at this time of international crisis we must endeavour not to take our attention away from countries in real need. Figures that I have received from the World Bank and the Minister's Department show that about 70 per cent. of the households in Rwanda are below the poverty line. Life-expectancy in Burundi is little more than 40 years, and in Uganda almost two in every 10 children die before the age of five. Those countries, along with many others in Africa, are living in the stranglehold of HIV/AIDS, which was discussed at length in this morning's debate on the international AIDS crisis. Rwanda is now among the 10 most heavily affected African countries, with an estimated 13 per cent of its population now infected.

It is surely those statistics that prompted the Prime Minister at the Labour party conference to describe Africa as > "a scar on the conscience of the world".

I look forward to hearing the Minister say what steps the Government are taking to help these African countries, at a time when our focus is elsewhere.

3 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I start by congratulating the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) on securing the debate. It has provided an important opportunity to hear the thoughts of hon. Members, many of whom speak with deep knowledge and have long experience of the part of Africa under discussion.

I look forward to hearing the Minister's response to the hon. Gentleman's important and detailed allegations. It is a pleasure to see the Minister for Europe. I accept that he will not be able to answer all our questions. The Under-Secretary of State for International Development is on important business in Cambodia, and we wish her well, as that, too, is a part of the world that we should not forget. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be so kind as to respond to some of the points that I shall be raising, as I am sure he will to those made by other hon. Members.

I have heard many people say how well the right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) led the important Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation. I was pleased to hear him say that, in spite of everything, he had a message of hope for that part of Africa. My hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) described graphically the personal horrors that he had witnessed, and he reminded us that the situation remains very fragile in Rwanda, a poor country that continues to suffer.

The hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) asked whether UK policy was biased. I shall return to that important point, but I share her commitment to ensuring that the Government remain engaged in the part of the world under discussion. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) also made many important points.

Will the Minister respond to some intriguing questions that were answered in the other place yesterday? Several hon. Members have referred to the UN panel of experts on the DRC. Yesterday, Baroness Amos referred to Security Council resolution 1457, which extended the mandate of the UN expert panel for a further six months. She said:

> "In the light of the panel's findings, Her Majesty's Government will consider taking appropriate action where there is clear evidence of wrongdoing."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 4 March 2003; Vol. 645, c. WA95.]

Will the Minister explain what the appropriate action will be? The hon. Member for North Norfolk gave a well-rehearsed and detailed account, but not much action has followed. What is appropriate? What is action? In an important answer given in the other place yesterday, Lord Bach referred to reservists being called up > "to support operations in Sierra Leone and the Democratic Republic of the Congo."

He said:

> "A new call-out order has been made under Section 56 of the Reserve Forces Act 1996 so that reservists may continue to be called out to support operations".—[Official Report, 4 March 2003; Vol. 645, c. WA101.]

What are the operations in the DRC? What is continuing to take place there with the assistance of the British military? I am delighted that the reservists are engaged there and I am sure that they are a great force for good, but I should be grateful to be updated and told exactly what British forces are doing in that part of the world.

An important aspect of illegal exploitation of natural resources is corporate social responsibility in the area. I start with allegations against British companies and nationals. As long ago as last November, according to the excellent briefing of the United Nations Association (UK), a long list of British companies were involved, but not a lot seems to have happened. It is a long time since last November and I hope that the Government will soon decide what action to take. Has DFID requested the available evidence from the UN panel of experts' report? A copy of the evidence could be placed in the Library in both Houses. What is the response to the report? Will DFID make a statement of its intentions in the light of access to the evidence?

The Government should also press Rwanda to publish a serious and comprehensive reaction to the allegations contained in the UN panel of experts' report. I hope that the Government of Rwanda will establish a commission of inquiry to investigate those allegations, similar to the successful commission established by Uganda. Have the British companies named responded and, if they have, has DFID seen copies of those responses? Again, those copies could be placed in the Library so that we can all know what is going on.

On the need for aid in Burundi, at the first donor conference in December 2000, President Mandela said:

> "it must be possible for the people of Burundi to materially distinguish between the destructiveness of conflict and the benefits of peace."

Jacob Zuma, the facilitator of the new ceasefire said:

> "regional efforts have achieved much progress in Burundi, but a complete peace could not be achieved without the full support of the international community."

The International Crisis Group said that donors should act now and release the promised dividends before faith is lost in the peace process and the situation deteriorates further.

There is a paradox in Burundi: peace will not be possible without international financial support, yet that support will not be forthcoming before peace is achieved. Will the Government release the funds pledged to Burundi? How will DFID deal with the paradox? What assessment has been made of the forthcoming change of leadership in the transitional Government in May? Many people wish to know what level of financial and political support will be provided to enable the swift deployment of observers and peacekeeping troops requested by the UN Security Council on 13 January. Will the Government put pressure on all parties to the conflict to respect international humanitarian law and to bring to justice those guilty of human rights abuses?

The hon. Member for South Swindon is wholly correct about the need for an integrated regional policy. UK involvement in the region has not been equally balanced. Total UK bilateral aid to Burundi in 2001–02 was £604,000, compared with £10,262,000 to the Democratic Republic of the Congo and £27,189,000 to Rwanda. Of the £604,000 for Burundi, £515,000 was humanitarian assistance. DFID recently appointed a permanent member of staff in Burundi—a positive sign that we welcome—and the Department has also contributed £1 million to the World Bank multilateral debt trust fund. DFID is apparently planning to expand its programme in the Democratic Republic of the Congo after the establishment of a transitional Government.

I am concerned by the Secretary of State's statement that Rwanda's security depends on regional security. The International Crisis Group report said that donor intervention now could be helpful to achieving peace. Even if the balance of aid is not biased, there is a perception of bias that could cause great tensions state to state and donor to state. Several British non-governmental organisations have said that there is a distinct anti-UK feeling in the DRC because it is perceived—rightly or wrongly—that the UK is bankrolling a country that occupied a third of its territory. There are still allegations of Rwandan involvement. What are the Government doing to deal with the problems surrounding the balance of aid in the region?

It is appropriate that we consider one other issue that has caused suspicion. The Secretary of State for International Development has developed a very good relationship with the President of Rwanda, whom she called, "Such a sweetie." In her genuinely charming way, she will not hear a bad word said against him, which is typical of the right hon. Lady. However, that sometimes gives the impression that there is a special relationship, and I wonder if something should be done to put that right.

Mr. Clarke: I must admit that other special relationships give me greater cause for concern that the one between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development and the President of Rwanda. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman reads the Hansard account of the debate in the Chamber of 18 December last year, if he has not yet had the opportunity to do so. If he does so, he will acknowledge that what my right hon. Friend has achieved because of that relationship has been truly outstanding. I doubt whether anyone in our delegation disagreed with the views that have been conveyed to us confirming that.

Mr. Key: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for making that point. It is well worth reading that debate.

Dr. Tonge: The hon. Gentleman is very generous. I want to add that I would not describe the President of Rwanda as a sweetie, but many of us who know what he has done, what he went through and what he achieved to liberate his country believe that, on the whole, he is pretty good news.

Mr. Key: I am sure that he is, but it would be wrong of me not to reflect the concerns that some NGOs have put to me. That is all I want to say on the subject; I certainly do not want to build it up into some great tabloid experience.

Reference was made to MONUC and its work to maintain liaison between the parties and carry out various tasks. It was set up on 30 November 1999 and is hugely important. We must ensure that it has sufficient resources both to carry out its current work and to press for a stronger mandate and an enhanced role in peacekeeping and the protection of civilians. Furthermore, it should have unlimited access in its investigations into Governments' and other states' actions. I hope that the UK Government will fully support its work.

Regional peace is crucial. Several hon. Members referred to finding a solution to the crisis in Ituri and the Kivus. I hope that the Government will maintain pressure on the Governments concerned—those of the DRC and Uganda—to implement fully the Pretoria and Luanda accords, primarily to withdraw all foreign forces from DRC territory, to guarantee its future territorial integrity and to cease supplying armed groups in Ituri and the Kivus. I hope that the UK Government will make the strongest possible representations to the Governments of the DRC and Rwanda to ensure the swift effectiveness of the Ituri pacification commission. Reference was made to the memorandum of understanding between the Governments of Rwanda and the United Kingdom in the area of conflict resolution.

Before I conclude my remarks, I should briefly mention the problem of food and water faced by the Great Lakes region. Only 50 per cent. of people in rural areas have access to safe water, and almost 45 per cent. of the deaths of children under five relate to water. We would warmly welcome the Government applying pressure to deal with those problems.

We discussed HIV and AIDS at great length this morning, as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West pointed out. Tearfund calls the problem of HIV/AIDS in the Great Lakes "the second genocide." A serious issue in the region, the problem is exacerbated by rape, poor infrastructure, and lack of education and access to medicines. The Government's programme on HIV/AIDS is crucial to the area.

Child soldiers are also of concern. They are still present in all the armed groups in the DRC—in some cases, they comprise as much as 35 per cent. of the troops—and they are being sent to the front lines. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that the Government are exerting pressure in that respect.

I end by repeating the message of hope for the region. We in this country are engaged and anxious for our Government to do more and to influence international organisations and the Governments of the countries involved. Above all, we send the people of that region the message that we are engaged. The Prime Minister has given a commitment and the rest of us in the House of Commons feel very strongly about the region. We will not forget its people, despite the other great issues of state that currently confront us.

3.15 pm

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): I am aware that, in this interesting debate, I represent three Ministries. That shows the cross-cutting nature of our international engagement between the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department for International Development and the Ministry of Defence. All three Ministries have been referred to, and it is important to understand the holistic nature of Britain's new international policy.

If we want to have a presence and be an effective power across the world, we must link our military abilities, development commitments and the diplomatic role of the Foreign Office. I am pleased that one of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary's first duties on appointment was to go to the region with the then French Foreign Minister, Mr. Hubert Védrine. That shows the other side of joined-up foreign policy, which is that we cannot act alone.

Several hon. Members, notably my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) and the hon. Members for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), referred to the delegation to the region of which they formed part. It is good that we as parliamentarians take an active and concerned interest, but other powers, in particular France, are involved, and it is vital that we co-operate as much as possible with our French partners.

If I may say so, it does not always help to indulge in some of the name calling that we have heard about some of our key European partners recently and in the past. If Europe is to have an effective policy and presence in the region, we must learn to work together, instead of reaching for the "book of scorn", to cite that excellent compendium by Matthew Parris, to make sour and unpleasant remarks. That is not the way forward.

I shall try to combine my overall remarks with answers to the specific problems raised. If there are issues that I cannot deal with, I will ask officials to write to hon. Members if they so desire. I also have to bear in mind the fact that serious and important allegations have been made, each of which will require investigation. There may be legal ramifications connected with that, so it would not be proper of me to prejudge the UN panel of experts, which, as hon. Members have noted, has been reactivated and is undertaking further inquiries. The Government will have to react to those in due course.

Dr. Tonge: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. MacShane: I would rather not, because the hon. Lady has made several interventions, and I should get on with replying to the points raised.

There has been significant progress on the peace process in the DRC over the past year, but that is not enough. The external participants in the war—Zimbabwe and Angola on the Kinshasa side and Rwanda and Uganda on the rebel side—have withdrawn from the DRC. That leaves the Ugandans in Ituri, to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) referred. I shall return to that point shortly. Unfortunately, the Congolese parties have seemed unwilling or unable to take advantage of that advance to bring peace to their country. The inter-Congolese dialogue drags on even as we speak, and all hon. Members expressed disappointment about that. The British Government have taken a great interest in the peace process and continue to do so. As soon as the transitional Government are instated in Kinshasa, we will be keen to play our part in helping the Congolese rebuild and develop the DRC in the same way as we have helped the Tanzanians, Ugandans and Rwandans in their countries.

I want to touch on some of the external and internal dimensions of the peace process mentioned by hon. Members this afternoon. The Lusaka agreement in 1999 effectively brought to an end the fighting between the various Congolese armed groups and their foreign backers, but the foreign armies stayed in the DRC, so the end to fighting was an advance, but it lead to stalemate rather than peace. The subsequent Pretoria agreement between the DRC and Rwanda, which was brokered by the South Africans, was signed in July 2002 and was a major breakthrough. It offered the prospect of Rwanda withdrawing from the DRC—the withdrawal most strongly demanded by the Kinshasa Government. It also offered to address the fundamental issue at the centre of the war, which was the presence in the DRC of the Rwandan extremist groups that had perpetrated the genocide in Rwanda in 1994 and which were fighting from Congo to return to Rwanda to complete the job.

The Rwandans withdrew as promised but the Government in Kinshasa have not yet fulfilled their side of the bargain. They apprehended and handed over to the international tribunal one senior genocide suspect and, as requested, proscribed and expelled the FDLR, the political arm of the Rwandan Hutu extremists. They also pushed over to the east many of the Rwandan Hutu fighters who had been part of their army so that they were able to say the fighters were beyond their control. However, they continue to support and arm them in the east.

It is in the eastern DRC that we see the volatility and violence to which hon. Members referred. The vivid descriptions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston and the hon. Member for Tewkesbury of the church that they visited will be on the minds of everyone who has listened to today's debate or will read it in Hansard. Such happenings are a source of deep concern and alarm. The abuse of human rights, whether it is brutal rape, the use of child soldiers or resource exploitation, is unacceptable, and we will continue to use our influence to demand improved respect for humanitarian rights by all parties. However, the real obstacle to progress is the failure of the Kinshasa Government to agree to the establishment of a transitional Government. That political decision must be faced. It would bring an end to most of the fighting and use of surrogates to create what is called in the jargon "facts on the ground".

The Ugandans must also now withdraw their forces fully from DRC. We should help them by pressing all parties involved in Ituri to stop fighting, and that is where our current diplomatic efforts are focused. The international community, including the United Kingdom, has been clear with all signatories to the Gbadolite agreement that the agreed terms of that and previous agreements must be respected. I call again on all Governments in the region, particularly the Kinshasa authorities, to do more to ensure the compliance of allied forces with the terms of those agreements. The UK has recently provided £1 million to the UN Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs to support efforts to co-ordinate humanitarian responses in the region, and we will continue to monitor the situation.

The fundamental goal is resolution of the conflict, which in turn will provide the necessary conditions to begin achieving the millennium development goals, such as halving poverty and boosting school enrolment for the Congolese population of some 50 million people. The key to any lasting political settlement will be to ensure achievement of power sharing within the transitional Government, followed by national elections.

Hon. Members referred to the issue of HIPC and the need to support debt relief in the region, and that remains a top priority of the Government. I am proud of the fact that we have doubled the amount of the people's money going on overseas aid, and I hope that the Liberal Democrats will stop their nonsense of endlessly demanding tax cuts. One cannot ask for massive cuts in taxation and then ask for massive increases in public expenditure.

We continue to provide substantial support to the UN operations in the Great Lakes region. We are also providing support—

Mr. Tom Clarke: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. MacShane: I would rather not, if my right hon. Friend will allow me to continue.

We are also providing support to civil society groups involved in grass-roots peace building and reconciliation. We have offered to play our part in enabling the establishment of a reformed national army drawing on the forces of the Kinshasa Government and the armed groups. We will also be helping in the enormous task of demobilising the tens of thousands of combatants who have taken up arms during the civil war. We have pledged £25 million over five years to the multi-donor regional demobilisation and reintegration programme in the Great Lakes.

The penalties of the region's severe instability fall most heavily on the civilian population, especially the most vulnerable. Civilians continue to die in large numbers, with mortality rates approaching five times the sub-Saharan norm in some front-line areas in the Democratic Republic of Congo. Only a small proportion of this "excess mortality"—I use the jargon term—is directly attributable to acts of violence. The main killers are not bullets and machetes, but diseases like malaria and malnutrition that have gained a hold and are spreading, as health services are disrupted and food production and distribution systems fail.

Access for humanitarian relief agencies is more complicated and challenging than ever, as the conflicts fragment. These can be very dangerous places to work. Relief agency staff, both expatriate and Congolese, have been attacked and killed by fighters who go unidentified and unpunished. It is estimated that only 20 per cent. of the population in Ituri in the Democratic Republic of Congo are accessible. The hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) gave us the most vivid and rather difficult-to-listen-to details of atrocities—one could almost use that word—that are taking place. Parts of Burundi are virtually inaccessible and yet access is vital in order properly to establish needs and to monitor assistance so as to ensure that the most needy are reached. Only a tiny proportion of the population in the area are fighters; the vast bulk are civilians caught up in a conflict not of their making, who need, value and deserve the help of the international relief agencies.

A major international relief operation is under way in the Great Lakes region to address these problems, and there are constant efforts at all levels, including at the

UN Security Council, to improve humanitarian access. Significant resources have been allocated by the international community to meet humanitarian needs. In 2002, that amounted to some $270 million in humanitarian assistance from international and bilateral agencies, including DFID.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon rightly asked about the need for a regional approach. The Government support the proposal for a regional conference to consolidate the peace and development process in the DRC once the transitional Government have been established. DFID is actively considering its future development strategy in the DRC following the establishment of the trans-national Government. Next Monday, DFID will host a round table to listen to the views of DRC experts in the UK and Europe. DFID notes carefully the view that one of the outputs of the process should be a regional strategy paper for the Great Lakes region. I hope that that goes some way to addressing the important matter placed before the Chancellor by my hon. Friend.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to explain the Government's position on the major challenges facing the Great Lakes region, and to explain what we are doing in terms of concrete assistance. It is of the utmost importance that the political groups in the region finally seize the chance for peace in the region. If they do so, I assure the House that we will play our full part in supporting its recovery. I am grateful to the hon. Member for North Norfolk and to other right hon. and hon. Members who have put on record the great concern of British parliamentarians for peace and reconciliation in the region.

Horse Racing

3.30 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I am delighted to introduce this short debate today on horse racing. I am not certain whether my horse racing column in The Scotsman on a Saturday qualifies as an interest to declare: if it does I willingly declare it. Some people reckon that it should be a matter of certification rather than declaration; nevertheless it is there on the record. The hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale), who takes a keen interest in these matters, would have liked to be present but unfortunately he is elsewhere on parliamentary business. I know that he shares many of my concerns.

In general, the horse racing industry is in pretty robust shape, although there are a number of challenges and difficulties, some of which have been well publicised. Much of the underlying health and growth in the industry is due to the Government's wise decision in October 2001 to move to a gross profits tax on the industry. I particularly liked that decision. It was one of the few occasions when the Government took my advice on a matter: it was not just my advice as there was a widespread campaign. However, the occasions when I find myself in central agreement with the Government are few enough to make something of them. It was a wise decision.

That decision was based on the view that there was a win-win situation in horse racing. Horse racing depends for its funding on punters: the large numbers of people all over the country who want to back horses. That is where the real flow of income comes from in horse racing. The view was taken that we could have a large-turnover, low-margin, betting market that would be good for everyone. Potentially that is the present situation.

The issue that I want to focus on today could partly undermine that and spoil an otherwise rosy picture. I said that there were a number of issues in the industry. They have been well publicised in television programmes, such as "Kenyon Confronts" and "Panorama", which investigated scandals and difficulties in the racing industry. I do not underrate those. Unlike some, I consider investigation a perfectly legitimate journalistic activity. It is the job of journalists to draw attention to anything that goes wrong. Only then can they be put right. I am confident that over time the racing structures will adapt themselves to confront and to overcome those challenges.

I am delighted to welcome the Leader of the House of Commons, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) to our debate—

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): It must be serious.

Mr. Salmond: I am sure we are about to have a statement announcing an extension of time or a Government motion to extend time for the debate. I particularly welcome his presence here. I acknowledge his interest in the industry.

Many of these challenges will be overcome. It is an important part of the journalistic process that attention is drawn to them. There are other organic and regulatory issues in the industry. It has so many representative bodies that even people like myself, and perhaps the Leader of the House and others who are interested, find it hard to keep up with who represents whom and who regulates what. I suspect that the Minister shares my concern that we need a much more rational understanding of who are the gamekeepers, who is responsible for policing various aspects of racing and whose interests are being represented by whom.

I had an interesting meeting with Michael Singer of the Punters Protection Association yesterday. I was struck by just how frustrated Mr. Singer was. He has a long career of trying to represent punters' interests. Punter is not a derogatory term: it is fairly well celebrated in the racing industry. He asked the question: are punters not consumers? Where is the consumer interest being centrally represented in the various bodies of the racing industry? The Minister might like to touch on that. It seems a substantial question that should be answered.

From a Scottish perspective, all five Scottish racecourses are grouped together in an organisation called Scottish Racing. The Leader of the House may be an honorary president of that organisation. He certainly has some association with it. That is to his credit, because that grouping says a great deal about the potential of Scottish racing to grow, with more fixtures, trainers, jockeys, meetings and more employment, making a substantial contribution to the Scottish economy. People feel frustrated by the limited number of fixtures that they are allowed to have.

Several important issues surround the horse racing industry, and the central theme that touches them all is the question of who is responsible for regulating which parts of the industry, and which bodies are responsible for representing the consumers. The decision by the British Horseracing Board to impose a charge of 10 per cent. of gross profits on on-course bookmakers may have substantial and profound implications. How was that decision arrived at; can it be fair and just; and, above all, what are its implications for many people?

On-course bookies are part of the firmament of the racing industry. They are not all as rich as Barry Bismarck Dennis, but they are all characters, as he is, and form a crucial part of the racing experience. It would be regrettable if their ranks were thinned and that part of the market weakened. They are concerned that that is exactly what will happen as a result of the new charge arising from the British Horseracing Board's decision.

To help us to understand the background to the decision, I shall quote from a letter from Mr. John Stevenson, chairman of the National Association of Bookmakers, to the hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page), which provides a crystal clear summary of the complex process behind the introduction of the new charge on 1 April next month. Last year, various large bookmaking companies were in dispute with the British Horseracing Board—almost everyone has been in dispute with the BHB recently. The dispute was resolved at a meeting in March 2002, when the chairman of Bookmakers Committee, comprising the big three bookmakers, took part in discussions. The letter states:

> "Peter Savill agreed to meet the only representatives of the 'Big 3' but it was pointed out that the Chairman of the Bookmakers' Committee . . . should also be present. Peter Savill agreed on the condition that he would only meet the above four bookmakers. This meeting was held at the Hilton Hotel on 26th March and was followed by a further meeting on 28th March at which Nigel Smith (BHB Commercial Director) also attended. At these meetings a number of decisions were agreed including that a 10 per cent. gross profits data charge should be paid by all bookmakers.
> The outcome of these meetings was circulated to members of the Bookmakers' Committee and discussed at a meeting of the Bookmakers' Committee on 5th April 2002 and ratified at a later meeting held on 15th April 2002 by a majority of 8:4 which under the Bookmakers' Committee Constitution was a virtual certainty"— any "certainty" in respect of the racing industry is to be welcomed!

> "Thus, the NAB was specifically excluded by the BHB from taking part in the negotiations which led to the decision concerning the 10 per cent. gross profits tax although we were informed of this decision by the Bookmakers' Committee when it was a fait accompli. However, at no stage was the NAB allowed to be involved directly with the BHB in these negotiations. Since Warwick Bartlett was also the Chairman of the British Betting Offices Association . . . which represents small independent off-course bookmakers it is clear that the interests of all off-course bookmakers were represented in negotiations with the BHB and that racecourse bookmakers were not represented."

That provides a fair summary of what happened at last year's meetings.

I have also had sight of the agreement between the BHB and the body representing the biggest companies in the industry—Corals, the Hilton group, Stanley Racing, William Hill and the Confederation of Bookmakers Associations—which brought to an end the disputes over the imposition of the charge on all bookmakers. Significantly, in clause 4.3 of the agreement, the signatories had to forgo any suggestion of making complaints or submissions to the European Commission or to any other competition or anti-trust authority anywhere in the world, unless they had a legal obligation to do so. That was the document that on-course bookmakers were later invited to sign, but refused to do so, preferring to develop their case through the Office of Fair Trading.

There seems to be a strong case for arguing that a section of the industry was not represented at the genesis of the agreement, and was only afterwards consulted and outvoted on a committee on which they were a minority. The process of imposing the charge on the on-course bookmakers is wrong.

Is the charge fair and just? I have a host of information that shows the essential difference between an on-course bookmaker, who bets at a fine margin, who can make a profit as well as a loss and whose satchel can grow larger or smaller, and a major off-course bookmaking chain, which has guaranteed profits across its range of undertakings.

On-course bookmakers do not need all the data for which they are being asked to pay an astronomical increase in charges. Over the past few years the estimate of that increase has ranged from 2,000 to 4,000 per cent., depending on how much the charge will rake in. It does not seem fair that those bookmakers, who are in a different financial position from others, should face such enormous increases in their charges.

The most important point I want to make concerns the implications for the industry as a whole. The on-course market is a bulwark: a protection for the wider punting interest. Starting prices, which still denominate the majority of bets that are struck and returned, are centred on the on-course market. If the on-course market is weakened by a substantial tax increase on on-course bookmakers, one potential—or certain—result will be to force an increase in on-course margins, which will then result in a substantial increase in off-course margins.

One does not need a crystal ball to know that some major bookmaking chains have an ambition to raise margins in the industry. Mr. David Harding, the chief executive of William Hill, speaking at the annual industry seminar this year, said that margins were unsustainable at starting prices, and that he wanted to see them raised substantially. The ambition to raise margins, at least for that company, is clear.

I had a discussion with Mr. Alan Ross, the managing director of Ladbrokes, who takes a different view. He thinks that I am reading too much into the sequence of events by suspecting that there is a conspiracy to raise margins and prices in the industry. He believes that people were properly consulted and that their interests were taken into account. However, I would say that there is, at least, a serious question mark over those proceedings.

Government policy in the past, and, I hope, the policy of the current Government, has been to encourage a strong on-course market. The latest consultation document from the Treasury on the modernisation of gambling tax discusses the success of the movement towards the gross profits tax on betting, and notes that the duty exemption for on-course betting was introduced in 1987 to promote a healthy on-course market in the horse-racing industry. It appears to imply—I am sure that that is the case—that the Government support that.

The Government's policy seems to be to encourage that market to thrive and prosper, and not to see it weakened in any way. However, I believe that market to be threatened with weakening if the charge goes ahead as proposed.

When people say that I should not read a conspiracy or a plot into these proceedings, I am reminded of a quotation from Adam Smith:

> "People of the same trade seldom meet together, even for merriment and diversion, but the conversation ends in a conspiracy against the public, or in some contrivance to raise prices."

In my closing remarks, I should make it clear that my chief concern is not with the activities of the major bookmaking companies. I do not think that there is a company in any market anywhere that has not tried to raise its margins by one means or another. It is part of the natural job of a company to attempt to increase its profitability. I am much more concerned with the role of the BHB. It seems to me that the genesis of the BHB and some of its activities, and the control that it has over things such as racecourse information, mean that it should be holding the ring. It is meant to be the referee—a regulator of the industry. There is a difficulty if the BHB has a vested interest in profits increasing for bookmaking chains because, under the levy, it will get 10 per cent. of that profit increase. It is difficult when the referee becomes one of the players, and that may be the case now.

The 10 per cent. charge on on-course bookmakers may not be the central problem facing the horse racing industry, but it is unjust. It was arrived at through the wrong means. There was no effective process of consultation, and the charge might have serious implications for punters across the country—millions of people who have the right to expect the protection of a competitive market.

In betting activities for which there is not such a competitive market, bookmakers arrive at their own prices. In horse racing in South Africa or Italy, for example, only pool prices are returned, and there are sometimes profit margins of 180 per cent. in the bookmakers' own starting prices. The margins in UK horse racing are much finer because the on-course market that sets the SPs is very competitive. It would be against the public interest if, through one means or another, those margins were unfairly increased. It is also against the public interest if a section of the industry—a lynchpin, a protector for the punter at large—is treated unfairly. The charge and the way that it is being introduced treats on-course bookmakers unfairly. I hope that the Minister shares those concerns.

I do not say that the charge is the only issue facing the industry, or that people may not have decent motives for doing what they are doing. However, I hope that the Minister is prepared to address my central concerns about the confusion between the regulatory bodies involved in the industry; what their interests are; and who is representing the punters and defending consumer interest, now that the charge is being carried through. Unless we consider those concerns through the Office of Fair Trading, ministerial intervention or at least ministerial concern, we might find that this magnificent opportunity, to which the Government contributed through their wise decision to change the taxation structure, is dissipated as the lack of an effective referee begins to operate against the public and racing interest.

3.47 pm

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): I congratulate the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) on securing the debate, even though I had to come back from a meeting of Ministers in Copenhagen to address the House this afternoon. It is nice of the hon. Gentleman to acknowledge that the Government have done quite a lot for the racing industry. He used phrases such as "win-win situation", "robust" and "very wise". The industry is doing extremely well on the betting side and on the horse racing side, which we are discussing. In fact, in a few years, horse racing income will have doubled.

3.48 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.56 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Frank Cook): We can resume our sitting with eight minutes of injury time.

Mr. Caborn: As I was saying, the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan gave due credit to the Government for what they have done for the industry. In a few short years, the racing industry will have doubled its income, which shows the magnitude of the tax changes. If the recent results of Ladbrokes are anything to go by, the bookmakers are not poor either. It has been a win-win situation for the industry. We are talking about relative positions because, overall, both sides of the racing industry are thriving. The punters have had a reasonable deal, and reinvestment into facilities will pay dividends.

The hon. Gentleman is right that it is disappointing that the industry has probably not taken advantage of the opportunities placed before it. We have tried to create a framework for the industry, which is extremely important for leisure activities, employment and economic activity. The hon. Gentleman referred to some of the problems that we have tried to resolve. The Jockey Club responded positively to the "Panorama" programme, and I am confident that in the not-too-distant future we shall have a new regulatory structure to deal with jockeys, owners and trainers.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, until the Office of Fair Trading decides who owns the data, it is unlikely to make decisions on complaints that bookmakers have made to it. Until the major principle of who owns the data is decided, we can only speculate on that decision and the major implications of it. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I take an active interest in the industry, and I will watch what is happening throughout it, particularly in the area to which he referred. We have made a major investment in the industry through our tax reorganisation. We have tried to be fair with the industry. The fact that the money on the data is actually going through the levy structure makes it tax efficient in its own right. It does not bear VAT, which is a saving of 17.5 per cent. Again, we have raised no objections to that at this stage. We have tried to be as helpful to the industry as we can.

Some important points have been raised. The starting price has been the subject of some discussion. Changes in the industry have been brought about by the convergence of technologies. Betting exchanges are now coming into play, although I have no evidence at the moment that they are undermining the on-course market. I have no proof of that, and it is very difficult to consider that situation objectively. If there is an unwelcome impact, it should be negated for the time being by the enforcement of the current National Joint Pitch Council rule, which prevents on-course bookmakers from taking or laying bets through betting exchanges.

Our starting point on the SP system should be an acknowledgement that there is nothing sacrosanct about it. We, as a Government, have no locus on that matter. It is for the industry to determine. It is not enshrined in statute, and whether to use it has always been purely a matter of choice for off-course bookmakers. Off-course bookmakers are licensed in the same way as on-course bookmakers, and could offer their own prices on every race now if they wished. That is a clear position, and a debate is under way on it at the moment. The same position on starting prices already exists in every other betting opportunity apart from horse racing and greyhound racing.

Mr. Salmond: I suggest that there is a legitimate Government interest. The on-course market sets the starting price, which sets the majority of bets. If this imposition weakened the on-course market and resulted in a raising of margins, at a conservative estimate, some £40 million of off-course money would go straight from the pockets of consumers—punters—into Government profits, into the BHB via the Levy Board and into the profits of large bookmakers. That seems to me to be a matter of consumer interest, which is part of Government responsibility.

Mr. Caborn: I was coming to that. The letters to which the hon. Gentleman referred—it would be helpful if I could have copies of them—implied that a cartel is emerging. I can assure him that the OFT is already taking a passing interest in the matter. The hon. Gentleman suggests that there could be a lack of competition, which could become unhealthy and lead to operations under a cartel. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right that the people who would suffer most would be the punters. We will watch that situation, and other institutions will look into it, too.

On BHB data charging, the commercial market and market forces will determine that. I shall take an active interest in any spin-offs from that, and will consider the matter carefully to ensure that the industry runs fairly for the punter. I have made it clear many times that the investment now going into the industry must be from not only the bookmakers and others, but the punters. Three areas should gain from the new fiscal arrangements in place. As I have mentioned, that matter has been referred to the OFT. I do not think that it will proceed at any pace until the OFT has taken the major decision on the rules and regulations and on who owns the data rights. Once that has been determined, the OFT may consider the imposition of the 10 per cent. requirement and whether it is fair to the industry and, in particular, to the punters. We shall probably have to wait a little while until the OFT concludes its work on the first inquiry.

Iran

4.8 pm

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): The people of Iran have now suffered some 40 years of tyranny. In 1963, the Shah undertook what was called the white revolution, clamping down on the people. Ever since, the people have been under tyranny. The Shah was regarded as a friend of ours and we tolerated him. In 1979 Ayatollah Khomeini succeeded in overthrowing the Shah. The tyranny continued, and the Ayatollah was our enemy. He died in 1989 and the current Ayatollah, or supreme leader, is Ayatollah Khamenei, who was previously the president.

In 1997, after Rafsanjani had been president, Ayatollah Khatami became president. People in the United Kingdom, and perhaps in the whole of the western world, almost breathed a sigh of relief because he had a reputation for being a moderate. As a result, in September 1998, at the General Assembly of the United Nations, the current Leader of the House—then Foreign Secretary—made a deal with the Iranian Foreign Minister, Kharrazi, to restart a relationship. In May 1999 that resulted in full diplomatic relations being restored.

President Khatami was seen as a man who espoused reform, was moderate and wanted change. The United Kingdom hoped that by contacting Iran we would help the reform process. That was summed up by the current Secretary of State for Defence—then a junior Minister in the Foreign Office—at a speech, appropriately enough, at Sandhurst, on 14 July 1999. He said:

> "We still have important concerns over Iranian policy, particularly over support for terrorism, weapons of mass destruction, and human rights. But we believe the current Iranian Government is making good progress in the right direction, and we are resolved to support that."

That sums up British policy in a nutshell. Since then, Foreign Minister Kharrazi has made two visits to the United Kingdom, in 2001 and earlier this year. The present Foreign Secretary has made two visits to Iran, and several other Government Ministers—Cabinet and non-Cabinet—have visited Tehran during those years.

The European Union takes a similar view. The External Affairs Commissioner, Chris Patten, in response to a US attack on Iran had this to say:

> "There is more to be said for trying to engage and draw these societies into the international community than to cut them off."

The United Kingdom and the European Union were as one in trying to create a dialogue involving both trade and human rights issues. The United States, however, remained totally unconvinced of President Khatami's ability to deliver the reform agenda. In February 2002, US Secretary of State Colin Powell posed the following questions, which were published in the Financial Times on 13 February:

> "How can we ignore the fact that this country continues to barrel straight ahead trying to achieve a nuclear capability?"

He added:

> "How can we ignore the fact that they are complicit in shipping arms of a very escalatory nature in the Middle East?"

He also stated:

> "Iran sponsors terrorist organisations. Should we hold back from pointing this out?"

The EU and UK, and the US have two quite diverse and different views.

What does the record tell us during the last few years? Huge amounts of material are available. There is a very useful House of Commons Library brief on Iran. The Foreign Office publishes human rights reports. There are reports from Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, United States Departments, the UN rapporteur on human rights, and a host of other groups with an interest in human rights and the situation in Iran, including the National Council of Resistance of Iran, the Iranian Women's Association in the UK, the Iranian Civil Rights Committee and the International Committee against Stoning. There are many more. What do those sources reveal about the progress being made in Iran through the process of engagement by the UK Government? The Foreign Office report of 2000 states:

> "Iran's reformers have made some progress over the last year. But there have been many setbacks too. The human rights situation . . . has on balance deteriorated over the past year despite the support of the reformers by an overwhelming majority of the Iranian people."

The 2001 report continues in much the same vein:

> "The pace of progress has slowed since he was first elected in 1997 mostly as a result of the continuing struggle between the reformists and conservatives.
> The conservative-dominated judiciary has closed down over 50 publications in the past two years . . . and imprisoned a number of journalists and editors . . . A number of members of the Majles have been given prison sentences, mainly for critical remarks made in the Majles"— let us hope that that is not taken up here, Mr. Deputy Speaker—

> "although only one, Hoseyn Loqmanian, was actually imprisoned . . . His pardon by the Supreme Leader, Ayatollah Khameini, defused the short-term confrontation, but the underlying issue of Parliamentary immunity remains in doubt".

There is one small bright spark on the horizon. We note that there has been some improvement in the situation of the Baha'is over the past year, and that none are now under sentence of death just for being of that faith. The Human Rights Watch report of 2003 paints much the same picture:

> "Despite landslide electoral victories in every major election from 1997 to 2002, the reformers were unable to dislodge repressive policies favored by the clerical leadership, including far-reaching restrictions on freedom of expression, association and political participation.
> The Guardian Council repeatedly blocked bills passed by the Parliament in such areas as women's rights, family law, the prevention of torture, and electoral reform. The judiciary . . . undermined the rule of law with arbitrary closures of newspapers and imprisonment of political activists . . . Any pretence that legal principles would be observed in regulating the press disappeared. Iran's press courts acted as a law unto themselves, issuing closure orders by decree without legal basis".

The picture is not good. Executions, floggings, stonings, maimings and arbitrary arrests all continue at a high level. The National Council for Resistance of Iran, which monitors the official press, reported that 474 sentences of execution were granted last year and many of them were carried out. That is 50 per cent. up on 2001. In reply to my written question it was pointed out that 139 executions were recorded by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, or whoever takes down such information.

Three men and three women were stoned to death in 1997; two or possibly three women in 2001; and three stoning sentences were passed on women in 2002. The National Council for Resistance reports that 26 stoning sentences have been passed since 1997. This year 50 executions have been reported up to 5 February. Ninety prisoners have received nearly 5,000 lashes—this is just in January—and there have been four cross-amputations: one leg and one arm cut off on alternate sides of the body. A woman's eyes were gauged out. The situation is not pretty.

Many of the mullahs maintain that they have banned stoning, but there is no evidence that that is so. A Bill to abolish stoning is said to have been proposed, but an MP says that that is a lie and no proposal for the abolition of stoning has been presented to the Majles. An official in south-east Iran told the BBC in December that he had received no written or official instructions from the judiciary to cancel sentences of stoning. The situation is bleak.

For the first time in seven years a UN rapporteur has been allowed into Iran. In a report on the jails in Iran published at the end of February this year, the team reported:

> "Iranians suffer large-scale arbitrary detentions and some prisons operate outside the control of the judicial system".

They were given full co-operation, but it was > "the first time the working group has been faced with such a practice on such a scale".

So the situation is not good in Iran's jails either. It is vital that within the European Union the UK makes sure that at the general assembly of the European Commission on Human Rights later this month a censure motion on human rights abuses in Iran is passed and the human rights rapporteur is reinstated, because last year for the first time in many years that motion failed by one vote. We must make sure that it happens.

It is not surprising for such a country to be the suicide capital of the world. It certainly has one of the highest rates of suicide. Some 75 per cent. of all suicides are women, and more than 80 per cent. of those are women between the ages of 15 and 31. The picture is not pretty.

We should consider the other areas of concern. The United States believes that Iran is the most active sponsor of terrorism and that it helps Hezbollah and Islamic jihad. Although it has condemned the 11 September atrocities and has sent some al-Qaeda people back to Europe for trial, early in January a boatload of arms was captured on its way to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Iran's nuclear plans are also a cause for concern. The National Council of Resistance of Iran revealed in August that the Iranians were working on new nuclear facilities for enriched uranium in heavy water, which would provide the opportunity to build weapons. Iran is a signatory to the non-proliferation treaty, but it nevertheless failed to report those new works to the International Atomic Energy Agency. I am not sure whether Mohammed el-Baradei has had a chance to go to Iran to check the situation, but he has expressed concern and intends to see what is going on.

The CIA national intelligence estimates reckon that Iran could have a nuclear weapon by 2015, but if it receives foreign assistance it could be a lot sooner. Its biological and chemical weapons programmes are recognised by the United States. It has a ballistic missile that can already reach 800 miles. The National Council of Resistance of Iran reports that the country is working on longer-range missiles, and the United States thinks that the country may have an intercontinental missile within the next decade, which is of grave concern.

I hope that our Government will do much more than carry on a dialogue. There have been recent local government elections in Iran. In Tehran, only 12 per cent. turned out. One of President Khatami's supporters said that that was an indication that the people had lost hope of achieving democratic change through the ballot box. That must be a serious warning of what might happen in Iran.

There was so much hope when Khatami came to power. There was a large turnout of 80 per cent. plus for his first election, but that is all turning to dust. On every front, the Government of Iran, instead of getting better, are getting worse. President Khatami seems to have been the fig leaf for the tyranny of Ayatollah Khamenei. The Majles has no power of its own and everything that it does must be approved by the Guardian Council. The country may want reform, but President Khatami has his legs manacled and one arm tied behind his back while being in the ring with Mike Tyson or Lennox Lewis—that is the measure of the struggle that the country faces. It is true that the people want change; they showed that by electing Khatami, a potential reformer. Reports in the western press coming out of Tehran also indicate that there is an underground desire for change. However, there is not much hope of it happening. Ayatollah Khamenei, the Guardian Council and the judiciary do not want change. People are certainly talking to them, but Ayatollah Khamenei is not listening. Many exiles, who live in countries around the world including the United Kingdom, fled from the tyranny of the mullahs and want to return to a democratic, free and tolerant state. They must recognise that those objectives are also our objectives.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) rose—

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. Perhaps I should explain to the Chamber that 30-minute debates are essentially between a Member and the Minister, unless prior arrangements have been made and passed on to the Chair.

Mr. MacShane: That clarification is helpful, because last week there was a half-hour Adjournment debate in which five hon. Members spoke. I was happy to leave room for the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir Sydney Chapman), but your clarification of House practice is helpful, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on securing the debate. The Government share many of his concerns about Iran, which is why I believe that we are right to pursue a policy of constructive and, where necessary, critical engagement. That allows us to support reform in Iran while maintaining a robust dialogue on issues of concern. Those issues include Iranian support to terrorist groups involved in the Israel-Palestine conflict—my hon. Friend has put the facts about that support before the House—Iran's reported development of weapons of mass destruction and aspects of its human rights record.

We continue to engage Iran on a wide range of issues of common interest, including bi-lateral co-operation in the fight against drugs, which is a matter of great concern for many of our constituents, and international support for reconstruction and the interim Administration in Afghanistan. For many years, Iran has hosted more than 2 million refugees from both Afghanistan and Iraq. The Department for International Development has provided substantial support--more than £4.3 million since 1999–2000—for refugee programmes in Iran and has agreed to fund several United Nations agency and non-governmental organisation projects. We regularly discuss Iraq with our Iranian counterparts. Like the UK, Iran is committed to the maintenance of Iraq's sovereignty and territorial integrity within its current borders.

Sir Sydney Chapman: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for misunderstanding the convention. Has the Minister any evidence that the violent, barbaric punishments and executions in Iran are subsiding? Will he confirm that it is false to assert, as the regime has done, that there is a moratorium on stoning?

Mr. MacShane: I hope to cover those points in the rest of my remarks.

Our policy of engagement enables us better to put forward our views and concerns, which has only been made possible by the changes that have taken place in Iran since President Khatami was first elected in May 1997. The UK supports President Khatami's stated objective of a civil society based on the rule of law. We welcomed his re-election in June 2001 with an increased share of the vote, which demonstrated the Iranian people's clear will for reform and gave him a strong mandate. Unfortunately, owing to the complex political situation in Iran, to which my hon. Friend referred, President Khatami has had many problems in implementing his policies of political and economic reform.

Naturally, the Government share many of my hon. Friend's concerns about human rights in Iran, which we and our EU partners have addressed through dialogue, UN resolutions and practical projects. We and our EU partners regularly make clear to the Iranian authorities, at all levels, our concerns about human rights. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary did so most recently in his meeting with the Iranian Foreign Minister on 6 February. We use a wide range of independent sources to assess the situation. Our embassy in Tehran also gathers information from its sources and colleagues at other like-minded embassies.

We welcome the efforts that the Iranian Government and Parliament have made towards seeking to improve the human rights situation in Iran, but we regret that because of the political stand-off between reformers and their conservative opponents, who include members of the judiciary, there is still a long way to go. The people and elected Government of Iran want an improvement in the human rights situation. The Iranian Parliament has drafted a number of Bills on important issues, such as the prohibition of torture, which have been rejected by the Guardian Council as incompatible with religious teachings: that is, despite the fact that the Iranian constitution prohibits torture. The Iranian Parliament is determined to make progress on the issue, and we hope that it succeeds.

The United Kingdom and European Union believe that one way of expressing their concerns is to sponsor resolutions on human rights in Iran at the UN General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights, as has been done for many years. We were disappointed that the Commission on Human Rights failed, by just one vote, to adopt the resolution on Iran in April last year. As my hon. Friend noted, that also meant the end of the mandate of the special representative. In practice, the special representative has not been allowed to visit Iran since 1996, but his reports on the human rights situation provided valuable detail on the human rights problems in Iran, and he was active in pursuing cases with the Iranian Government.

All EU partners are concerned about the human rights situation in Iran, and we are currently consulting on the most effective way in which to encourage positive change. A resolution is one of a number of tools currently under consideration.

Following the failure of the resolution last year, Iran made a number of gestures, including inviting the EU to engage in a dialogue on human rights. After an internal debate, the EU decided to take up the offer and the first round of the dialogue took place in mid-December. The next round will take place later this month, which will give us an opportunity to assess progress before the next Commission on Human Rights begins its work on 17 March. Discussions in December were frank, and the EU made it clear to the Iranians that they need to be able to show results to get agreement for the talks to continue. Initial impressions have been positive, although change, as ever, is likely to be slow. The EU delegation handed over a list of cases on which answers were sought, and those issues will be followed up this month. My hon. Friend quoted Commissioner Chris Patten. When Chris Patten visited Tehran in February he said that it was not enough just to talk about human rights and that we needed to see progress. Of course, he was right.

In a further development following the failure of the resolution last year, there has been an open invitation to UN Human Rights Commission inspectors to visit Iran. The UN working group on arbitrary detentions was the first to take up the invitation, and completed an inspection in February. The group has still to make a full report.

Together with our EU partners, we have repeatedly expressed concern about stonings, which is a subject on which reformers, and especially women's groups, in Iran have been campaigning for years. We welcomed the announcement at the end of last year by the head of the Supreme Administrative Court that the practice has been suspended. We have also been informed that, of the four women who were sentenced to death by stoning last year, three have been given alternative sentences and the fourth is awaiting the outcome of her appeal. We are monitoring the situation closely, because that barbaric practice is not acceptable to any decent human being anywhere in the world.

We are considering other ways of developing practical co-operation on human rights issues. We have supported a number of projects through the Foreign Office's human rights projects fund. The projects include technical assistance on specific issues relating to the rule of law and work by Penal Reform International, a highly regarded worldwide organisation, which was initially approached by the Iranian prison authorities, who are keen to reform their prisons. Other projects have included specialised training for judges working with juveniles, through UNICEF; strengthening the capacities of the Islamic Human Rights Commission; human rights training courses for young adults; and a familiarisation visit by five Iranian judges to the UK, which took place last March.

I accept the point that hon. Members have made about progress remaining slow. There is a steady, drip-by-drip attempt to show Iranian officials that an alternative system is possible. We noted at least 111 executions last year, some of which took place in public. The Government oppose the death penalty in all circumstances, and we urge all states to abolish it.

We regularly raise with the Iranian authorities our serious concerns about the treatment of the Baha'is. Persecution of individuals on religious grounds is unacceptable. Although no Baha'is remain under sentence of death, they continue to suffer harassment and discrimination in areas such as education, employment, housing and travel.

Despite moves to improve the situation of women, such as amending the divorce law to make it easier for women to initiate the divorce, there is continuing discrimination against women in the courts and in society generally. However, Iran has many women MPs and a woman Minister. Women are pursuing those matters and debating them with senior clerics, some of whom support their case. An increasing number of Iranian women go on to higher education and participate in politics, and that can only help them in their efforts to improve their status.

Freedom of speech remains under threat, particularly the freedom to speak out. However, there is lively debate in public and in the media on a wide range of subjects, and we acknowledge that Iran is a country of great culture and education. The Iranians want nothing more than to be able to enjoy the freedoms normally enjoyed by those who live in democracies. None the less, 90 newspapers and other similar publications have been closed during the past three years. Journalists and editors have been jailed, and lawyers have been jailed for speaking out on behalf of clients who claim that they have been tortured. Students have been imprisoned for taking part in demonstrations.

We take every opportunity to press the Iranian authorities on their approach to the middle east peace process. Peace in the middle east is in everyone's interests, including those of Iran. The Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary have discussed the matter with the Iranian Foreign Minister. We believe that Iranians should be more constructive in their attitude to the middle east process, and that they should support efforts to resolve the differences between those involved.

I am concerned, as is my hon. Friend, about Iranian resources being used by Palestinian groups to carry out atrocious and unacceptable attacks on civilians in Israel. We might argue about the definition of terrorism, but attacks on civilians can never be justified, whether in Israel or Palestine—or by terrorist groups in Iran.

We continue to press the director general of the International Atomic Energy Authority to investigate allegations that Iran has weapons of mass destruction. We have encouraged Iran to be transparent about its nuclear activities in order to dispel concerns about the nature and purpose of those activities. The situations in Iran and Iraq are worrying. They cannot be ignored, and we seek a peaceful resolution to both.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the matter. I assure him that the Foreign Office and the Government take seriously human rights and other political developments in Iran.

It being twenty-two minutes to Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Election Turnouts

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Yvette Cooper): I welcome this chance to discuss the important issue of increasing voter turnout, particularly through weekend voting. It is useful to debate those issues, because we have recently closed the consultation on weekend voting and combining the local and European elections in 2004. We have not yet considered all the responses to that consultation paper, nor have we taken any decisions on the way forward. We thought it right to give hon. Members the chance to debate some of the issues before any decisions were taken.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): I am sure that the Minister has anticipated what I am about to say. She said that she hoped that we would have a chance to discuss this matter, but she will recall that we discussed many of the same issues only a few weeks ago on 28 January, so I hope that some of my comments during that debate have been taken into account and that she will refer to them on this occasion; she did not do so at the time.

Yvette Cooper: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we always treat seriously the points that he makes in every debate.

It is right to give hon. Members the chance to debate this matter, particularly some of the issues concerning weekend voting and combining the elections in 2004, which we did not concentrate on in our debate at the end of January. That thoughtful and interesting debate about voter participation was initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan).

Voter turnout has been falling, and compared with 15 years ago, millions more people are choosing not to vote. Since the mid-1980s, the number of people who vote has dropped by more than 5 million. At the last general election, 6.2 million fewer votes were cast than in 1987, when I first cast my vote, and the percentage of the electorate voting fell from 75 per cent. in 1987 to 59 per cent. in 2001. In the most recent European elections, 5.1 million more people stayed at home compared with the 1989 European elections, and in the local elections turnout dropped by around 2 million from 1986 to 2002.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Has the Minister given any thought to why there was such a dramatic drop in turnout for the most recent European elections? Does she recall her right hon. Friend the then Home Secretary, who is now the Foreign Secretary, saying that as a result of his introducing a system of proportional representation he expected the turnout to rise significantly? In fact, it fell. Can the hon. Lady explain why the then Home Secretary's prediction was so wrong?

Yvette Cooper: There are a series of reasons why voter turnout falls, and I shall come to that subject later. In the debate at the end of January we discussed some of the issues concerning proportional representation. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that many people have suggested that proportional representation might increase voter turnout, and the European elections were an example of the PR system. Some supporters of that system are here now, so many of the issues may be raised this afternoon.

Many of the issues related to the turnout at the European elections are complicated, and not determined simply by the particular electoral system in place. It is interesting that there is no consensus at this stage on the reason for a drop in voter turnout. Such drops have happened in many western industrialised countries, and a range of theories have been offered by academics, journalists and politicians to explain why that has happened. Many traditional theories assumed that as populations became more educated, and had more information, voter turnout would increase, but that has not been the case. Theories about declining social identification, changes to social structure, a decline in deference and generational differences abound. There are also theories relating to political party behaviour; some argue that politics is too confrontational, and that is why people do not vote; others argue that politics needs to be more confrontational, and that we need more public rows to provoke people into voting.

There are also theories about the specific circumstances of the last general election and the expectations that surrounded it, such as whether it was perceived to have been a foregone conclusion. It is too early to say exactly what happened at that election, or what the different causes for the turnout were; it is too early to be clear whether we are looking at long-term trends or fluctuations. However, we cannot afford to wait until it is perfectly clear why voter turnout has been falling; if we wait, turnout may have fallen to the point at which the health of our democracy is seriously undermined.

Three challenges face us in addressing voter turnout. The first is the challenge for political parties, which is extremely important because parties are the vehicle by which people exercise their vote, campaign and conduct debate throughout the country. Political parties and politicians need to accept responsibility for the changes that are taking place, and they must address them. However, that is not the main subject of the debate this afternoon.

The second challenge is for the wider society and institutions to promote greater awareness, and to support voter education and a stronger sense of citizenship. I include in that the promotion of citizenship education in schools, and the role of the Electoral Commission in promoting information about elections, democracy and our political institutions.

Mr. Cash: The Minister will appreciate that one thing that causes people a great deal of concern is broken promises. I shall not engage in a cheap exchange, because one side can say as much as the other, but does the Minister not agree that if the Electoral Commission and others are to engage in voter education through schools, it is terribly important for them to be conscious of the huge responsibility to make certain that that education is unbiased and meets the criteria of a democratic society.

Yvette Cooper: The purpose of setting up the Electoral Commission in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 was to establish an independent organisation, separate from political parties and the Government, to promote voter information and education throughout the country in a non-party political, non-partisan fashion. The hon. Gentleman is tempting me to get into party political discussions, so I shall point out that the Opposition's weakness at the general election and their failure to offer clear alternatives to the voter had a significant impact on turnout.

Today we should concentrate on how we can make voting more convenient, and make it fit into people's lives, but no one should assume that convenience is a panacea for raising voter turnout, or that it is the whole answer. Some of the trials significantly raised voter turnout, and it is therefore right that we should explore ways in which we can make voting fit into people's lives so that they exercise their democratic rights.

The recently closed consultation canvassed the ideas associated with holding elections at the weekend. We should explore weekend elections, and have views on the idea. Unlike most of our European counterparts, this country has historically voted on a Thursday, but it is unclear why we have become so committed to that particular day of the week. The folklore is that the original reasons for choosing a Thursday involved a process of elimination. Sunday was no good because voters might be influenced by the sermon. Monday was too close to Sunday, and a persuasive priest might still hold sway. Tuesday and Wednesday were market days, while Friday was pay-day, which meant that voters might be influenced by alcohol. On Saturday they might still be drinking, or might be too hung over to vote. As a result, Thursday was the only day far enough away from the influence of both pulpit and publican, so that is the day on which people were trusted to cast their votes.

An international study by the Chicago election board in 1999 found that of the 34 countries studied, three quarters held elections on a Sunday. Italy, Spain, France, Germany, Belgium, Sweden and Finland all hold at least some of their elections on a Sunday, and their turnout levels are generally higher than ours. However, one cannot use that evidence alone, and one cannot make simple comparisons between one country and another. Recent academic work by Mark Franklin, which attempts to address some of the other factors, found that in a range of countries, voting on a rest day—in this country, that would be over the weekend—has a significant positive impact on turnout.

It is not too hard to see why that might be the case, because for people who work and have kids, or lead some other sort of busy life, voting on a busy Thursday can be a hassle, and it should not be a hassle for people to exercise their democratic rights.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster): People who work and have kids will almost certainly have some form of child care for their children while they are working, but that will not be the case on a Saturday. In the light of the contradictory comments that the Minister made about how, rather disappointingly, the more educated people become the less likely they are to vote, can she see that kind of contradiction in her argument? A Saturday election would be detrimental for working mothers with children.

Yvette Cooper: No, I do not think so. If we held elections over Saturday and Sunday, arguably people would have considerably more time in which to make appropriate arrangements, or to take their children to the voting booth. The case should not rest on a specific example: we can all imagine the people who rush to pick up their children at the end of nursery school or school and then struggle to get out to vote in the evening. Equally, Thursday might be more convenient for people who work shifts or weekends.

The question is what is likely to have the broadest impact on the greatest number of people by making voting more convenient. Mark Franklin's evidence, which we should take seriously, suggests that voting on a rest day could increase turnout. The consultation specified that weekend voting would mean both Saturday and Sunday, so as to recognise religious concerns, but we need to know people's views about weekend voting. We must also recognise that the only pilot that has been carried out on weekend voting, in Watford, was not successful; interestingly, voter turnout fell. However, the people of Watford voted the weekend after the Thursday on which everyone else voted. When the nationwide election results had already appeared in the Friday and Saturday papers, setting out the local elections as a done deal, everyone in Watford was expected to go out to vote. It is interesting to ask, therefore, whether pilots on weekend voting can be successful in small areas, when people in other areas still vote on different days.

We must also take account of cost. Weekend voting, in direct terms, is likely to be more expensive, especially if it is held over two days. It involves the higher costs of staff working at the weekend. On the other hand, an awful lot of schools would not have to close for the day, with all the hassle that that can create. There are mixed issues surrounding weekend voting, so we think it right to consult and take people's views before deciding on the way forward.

Personally, I am inclined to think that there is a case for further trials, perhaps as part of a programme, and on a much larger scale than the Watford example. We need to hear the House's views, however, and we need people to consider and debate the issues. The European elections might be the right elections in which to trial weekend voting, given that the other countries are voting in their elections at the weekend; but we must recognise the considerable logistic and practical problems to be overcome if weekend voting is to be introduced in time for the 2004 European elections.

The case for making voting more convenient, however we do that, is strong. I have concentrated so far on weekend voting, but various trials are already under way for different approaches to voting in pilot programmes across the country. It is worth reflecting on the progress made in those trials, and on the next wave of pilots. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister leads the programme of pilots for local authority elections, and there have been a series of pilots on postal voting, e-voting and other mechanisms. The results in the all-postal vote pilots have been the most significant. Average turnout in the pilot areas was considerably higher than in the country as a whole. In Crawley the turnout rose from 19 per cent. to 34 per cent. In Gateshead it rose from 30 per cent. to 57 per cent., in North Tyneside from 36 per cent. to 42 per cent., in Stevenage from 29 per cent. to 53 per cent., and in Chorley from 32 per cent. to 62 per cent. Those all-postal ballots had a considerable impact on voter turnout.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Minister has pointed out what happened in the postal votes, but can I point out what happens in my constituency, which covers two local councils? In Amber Valley, which has elections every year, the turnout is very poor, but in Derbyshire Dales, which has elections every four years, the turnout is significantly better. Does she think that there is anything to be said for the idea that people are getting a bit fed up with continually having elections forced on them?

Yvette Cooper: There is evidence that reduced frequency of voting can be correlated with higher voter turnout. A balance has to be struck between achieving the right level of accountability to the public and to voters—giving them the opportunity to vote often enough to maintain accountability—and maintaining turnout. Those are complex issues. That is why we have asked the Electoral Commission to examine the issues surrounding the timing and frequency of elections.

Mr. Cash: I was slightly worried that the Minister might not have read what I said in our previous debate, and she has just given a good illustration of why I was right to worry. She has mentioned the experience in Chorley, and on 28 January I said that:

> "in Chorley, electronic counting was piloted, and turnout increased from 31.3 per cent. in 1998 to 61.5 per cent. in 2002. However, the same system was used in City of Westminster, and turnout dropped from 32 per cent. in 1998, to 27.4 per cent. in 2002. It is extraordinary that the same system doubles turnout in Chorley but decreases it in City of Westminster."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 28 January 2003; Vol. 398, c. 239WH.]

She did not answer that question before. Can she answer it now?

Yvette Cooper: The Westminster pilot was an e-counting pilot. The all-postal pilots—Crawley, Gateshead, Greenwich, Havering, Middlesbrough, North Tyneside, North West Leicestershire, Preston, Stevenage and Trafford—did not involve separate counting methods, and all showed a significant increase in turnout.

Mr. Cash: What about Chorley?

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that I also mentioned Chorley. Chorley held an all-postal and e-counting pilot. Chorley, Hackney and South Tyneside all had all-postal and e-counting pilots. Turnout in Chorley and South Tyneside increased but Hackney, which had an e-counting and all-postal pilot, experienced a 3 per cent. decrease. The e-counting pilots included Broxbourne, Epping Forest, Rugby and Westminster. That was a different group of pilots, of which Westminster was the only one of the four that showed a reduction. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that results have been varied, but overall the Electoral Commission, which assessed all the pilots independently, concluded that the all-postal pilots had a significant impact in increasing voter turnout.

Concerns about issues such as fraud and voter identification have been raised in relation to all-postal ballots. We should take those concerns seriously, and address them. In its report on the first wave of pilots, the Electoral Commission said that it could find no evidence of widespread fraud, or problems of voter identification. Nevertheless, we should take the possibility seriously, which is why the commission recommended further pilots of the all-postal vote approach, which we have accepted.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): Is the Minister also considering the other factor that remains of concern with all forms of remote voting, whether postal or electronic, which is that electoral law requires us to ensure that voters can vote free from coercion and undue influence? That is clearly difficult when voting takes place at a remote location. Is that point being considered? In some ways it is more significant than the issue of fraud.

Yvette Cooper: It is embedded in the Human Rights Act 1998 that we should have free and fair elections, and it is important that we can be sure that they are taking place. As the hon. Gentleman says, we must be able to ensure that people can make their own choices free from undue interference or improper influence. We already, rightly, accept the principle of postal votes for those who choose to have them.

The solution that some have suggested to the problem that the hon. Gentleman raises is a multi-channel election. People would be able to choose to vote through one of many different routes. They would be able to vote with a postal vote or by going into a polling station. Our broad interest is in the idea of a multi-channel election being introduced in the future, which would give people options. The debate is not yet closed on that. We need to keep debating and discussing it as the pilots go on.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): In Stroud we have an e-voting and a texting pilot, which is as it should be. We should experiment with such methods. My worry is about what we mean by choice. That is all fine for those who have different ways of accessing the electoral system, but there will be others who have a limited choice. That could be overcome only through postal balloting, which seems to be the most successful alternative method. When the Minister evaluates the situation, will she consider how many people genuinely can make such choices? We cannot have discrimination in favour of people who are IT-literate and have access to the relevant means, and against people who do not.

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend is right. That idea affects not only voting but all kinds of areas in which we try to deliver services, opportunities or information through new technology. We must not introduce a different form of exclusion, whereby those who cannot get access to information technology cannot get access to a service. When we are talking about the right to vote, that is more important and fundamental than in any other context, so clearly it is a consideration.

My hon. Friend raises a broader point about turnout, which is that people who are on the lowest incomes, have the least education or come from particular minority ethnic groups are the least likely to vote. That is a troubling fact for democracy. The issue is not simply the overall turnout; it is the differential turnout between different groups. Clearly, that should have a serious impact on anyone who is concerned to ensure that everyone has an equal right to vote and an equal chance for their voice to be heard.

The postal ballot pilots have already demonstrated that there appears to be a significant willingness to vote so long as it is easy, and that that willingness is greater than the actual number of votes being cast under the existing system. As long as that is the case, that means that there are people who would vote if it was easy, or if the opportunity was there, who are not currently voting and are therefore not having their voices heard in a democracy, or being counted when it is decided who should represent them and take decisions on their behalf. That is a serious matter, and means that even for those who oppose all-postal votes, there are serious issues that need to be addressed. We cannot simply accept the current position.

I know that many Members want the chance to speak, so I will make my conclusion brief. There will be a further series of 59 electoral pilots in this year's May elections—nearly double the number held last year. They will include e-voting pilots, most of which will offer a range of e-voting channels, including remote voting via the internet, text messaging, touch-tone telephones and, for the first time, interactive digital television. The pilots will be the biggest ever test of e-voting in the UK.

We have also concluded the consultation on combining the European parliamentary elections with the local elections in 2004. That reflects the point made by the hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) about not asking people to turn out to vote too many times in a short period. Members' views would be welcome before the Government take a final decision on whether the elections in 2004 should be combined on the same day.

Declining turnout is clearly one of the biggest challenges faced not simply by political parties but by all those who care about democracy. We are here this afternoon as democratically elected representatives. We stand where for centuries elected representatives before us have stood to debate the concerns of the nation. Of course, most of our predecessors were not elected by the whole nation that they purported to represent. Many of us will have taken constituents to the little cupboard at the back of the Crypt, at the other end of the main Westminster Hall building, where, as the story goes, the suffragette Emily Davison hid in the Palace of Westminster on the night of the 1911 census so that, at a time when women were not allowed to vote, she could record her address that night as the House of Commons.

Votes for women, and for all men, were hard fought for and hard won. Emily Davison threw herself in front of the king's horse to draw attention to her case, yet four generations later, millions of women are not using the vote that Emily Davison died fighting for. Our political institutions depend on the legitimacy of the ballot box. As the ballot box gets lighter, the legitimacy of our political institutions becomes weaker. Most importantly, when turnout declines too far, anti-democratic movements and parties can more easily step into the void. None of us should kid ourselves that there are any easy answers to raising voter turnout.

Mr. Cash: I have listened to the Minister's peroration with great interest, but I am bound to reflect on the fact that only yesterday the Budget date was shifted, which is bound to affect the Welsh and Scottish elections, not to mention others. Can she equate that with her espousal of democratic procedures?

Yvette Cooper: For heaven's sake! That is not remotely relevant to the important issues that we are discussing. The judgment about the timing of the Budget must be made according to many considerations, but it has nothing to do with voter turnout. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman chooses to make cheap party political points, because Westminster Hall was intended to be a forum for more considered debate that may, on many issues, cut across party lines. The issues related to voter turnout should concern any democrat, whatever their political party or affiliation. If we are concerned about democracy, we should work hard to address them.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): There is much in the Minister's excellent speech with which we can all agree. Part of it might have been made on the Floor of the House. The moving bit about women getting the vote might have been said by her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and Minister for Women, who has been speaking in the Chamber today in the debate on international women's day. I am grateful to the Minister who is here with us for making available the speech that she gave last month to the Association of Electoral Administrators—although I suspect that it was written on a word processor, as chunks of it reappeared in a very similar form in the speech that we have just heard.

I suppose that it makes sense for the Lord Chancellor's Department to have responsibility for elections, but that responsibility seems to move around somewhat. It used to be with the Home Office, then with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, and it is now with one of the few Departments that does not have an elected Minister at its head.

My contribution will be fairly brief, because I see that there are some serious psephologists in Westminster Hall this afternoon. The Minister gave several reasons why turnout dipped at the last general election, to which I would add just one. As the two major parties are closer together than they have been for some 40 years, many voters, as well as thinking that the election was a foregone conclusion, genuinely thought that it would not actually make much difference who won it. Indeed, some Labour MPs believe that the Prime Minister is at heart a Conservative, so the wider electorate might be excused for making the same mistake.

The European election was touched on earlier, and I believe that the adoption of a multi-member proportional representation system did have an effect. People prefer to vote for a face, not a list, and the election of Members for a large amorphous region such as the south-east somehow lacked the relevance and immediacy of an election of one Member for a smaller parliamentary constituency. The mechanics of elections, to which I shall return in a moment, can influence turnout.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I agree with the point that the right hon. Gentleman is making. He may recall that Liberal Democrats—and, I believe, some of his party—argued strongly that we should have either open lists or smaller constituencies and a single transferable vote, which to some extent would have overcome the disadvantage to which he refers. It is important not to brand all PR systems as identical.

Sir George Young: I agree with the hon. Gentleman to the extent that I believe that people prefer to vote for one person—a face—rather than a list of people. That should be an important component of a successful electoral system.

The Minister spoke about declining turnout and voter apathy, which must concern all of us. In some cases, disenchantment with the main parties manifests itself in the election of independents, and Wyre Forest showed what can happen when an MP does not get on top of an important local issue. I regard such election results as worrying but healthy. Too many independents in the House would obviously lead to problems in delivering a coherent political programme, but if there are a few—and the threat of more—that keeps us on our toes. We have seen that with independent mayors in London, Hartlepool and Middlesbrough. It is more worrying, and less healthy, when people turn to parties that really are nasty, such as the British National party and the National Front. The best answer to that is for the mainstream parties to show that they have sensible policies to manage the issues that worry people.

For many people, the solution to disenchantment is simply not to vote. I remember that when I first went out canvassing people were reluctant to admit that they were not going to vote, and found all sorts of reasons to conceal the fact. People are now open about it. Only 39 per cent. of 18 to 25-year-olds voted at the last general election, and the British social attitudes survey in 1999 showed that only one in 10 of that age group considered themselves "quite interested" or "very interested" in politics. For some of those young people, not voting has become part of a culture, and a statement that they are at arm's length from the democratic process. They will sign petitions and engage in single issue politics, and they are interested in what happens locally, but in the fast-moving, consumer-based society in which they live, which gives them relevant choices and instant results, voting once every four years for a remote assembly is old fashioned.

There is no point in blaming those young people. They are perfectly entitled not to vote, and for many it is a conscious decision. They simply do not like what is on offer—so we must ask why they are not voting. There are two responses. One addresses the mechanics of voting, including Sunday voting and voting by text message. The other response concerns the motivation for voting, and that is by far the most important. Most people do not vote not because it is inconvenient, or because they do not have the time. They do not vote because they do not want to vote.

There are all sorts of theories for that, and the Minister advanced some of her own. I will mention another. The Hansard Society sponsored a meeting at my party's last conference; similar meetings were also held at the other two party conferences. At it, the makers of "Big Brother" explained why more people voted for Kate Lawler in the third series of "Big Brother" than voted at the past general election. They pointed out that the two houses involved had some similarities. They are both difficult to get into—150,000 applied for "Big Brother"—and both houses are filled by media-seeking self-publicists.

However, the short answer to the question about why one captured the imagination of the British nation and the other did not was simple. Viewers empathised with the contestants in "Big Brother" because they behaved like human beings. They spoke the same language and had the same problems and emotions, and viewers found it easier to relate to them. They find it difficult to relate to us because we do not seem to live in the same world as they do. There is also an opportunity for interaction and involvement with "Big Brother", and there may be lessons for Parliament about making it more interactive and relevant.

On that theme, the former editor of "Newsnight", Sian Kevill, said that:

> "people see politics and political coverage as being mainly about white, middle-class middle-aged men being badgered by other white, middle-aged middle-class men in a secret shared language. It is a symbol of an apparent new political divide: it is no longer left and right; it's now us and them."

There is a message in that for all Members of Parliament. We need to consider what we can do as individual MPs to re-engage people and get on the same wavelength. We could start by recognising that our opponents get some things right and we get some things wrong. We should also recognise that there is little appetite for conventional adversarial politics. I think that we should change the format of Prime Minister's questions, which I regard as a switch-off rather than a switch-on. It reinforces people's worst prejudices about politics and politicians. It should be a serious exchange on a few themes with a view to eliciting some useful information.

Vernon Coaker (Gedling): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that people do not mind the clash of view or opinion and ferocious debate when they think that it is real, but that they think that what they see in Parliament is cosmetic and unnecessary confrontation? Does he agree that we need confrontation when ideas clash, rather than just as a stage performance?

[Vernon Coaker]

Sir George Young: A lot of Prime Minister's Question Time is synthetic, and people would not normally behave like that; it is an act that they put on. It would be better if they did not do that, and asked questions in the usual way.

We all have our answers to the problem of voter apathy—I mentioned a few—and they are far more important than the mechanical ones, which I shall come to in a moment. We need to make people want to vote, and then we can ask how we could make it easier by changing how, when or where they vote. The basic question about Sunday voting is that if postal voting is freely available, do we need to change a well tried system to introduce weekend voting?

In the pilot schemes run by local authorities in 2000, which the Minister mentioned, postal voting was the only new electoral arrangement that had significant potential for increasing turnout at local elections. The Library analysed the results in a very good paper—02/33—and the Electoral Commission carried out its own analysis. It said:

> "The technology-based voting pilots appeared to have no significant impact on turnout."

It found that postal voting had again proved a success in improving voter turnout, although not in all the pilots. In Trafford, the pilot scheme produced an election turnout of 50 per cent., which is a significant rise from the 15 per cent. in 1997.

On the specific proposition of weekend voting, will the Minister say whether she means the weekend after the Thursday when we would usually vote, or the weekend before? General election campaigns are already lengthy, and I was alarmed to discover that the Electoral Commission is consulting on making them even longer by harmonising them with other elections. I hope that that move towards bureaucratic tidiness will be resisted. There is genuine election fatigue towards the end of the campaign, which would be made worse if it were three days longer. In any event, we are in permanent campaigning mode these days, and the campaign is much less significant than it used to be.

In its study of the previous general election, the Independent Television Commission found that 70 per cent. had little or no interest in coverage, and 40 per cent. switched channels to avoid it. The consultation paper published by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister referred to the experiment in Camden, in which voting was possible the weekend before the usual election day. Only 1.1. per cent. of the 28.4 per cent. who voted at all did so during the early voting period.

How good are the Government's arguments in the consultation paper for weekend voting? They argue that more leisure time at the weekend means more opportunity to vote. However, many of those who are disaffected have enough leisure time, and if time is an issue, as it is for some, they may vote by post. I suspect that my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) does not regard the Government's argument that an election should be held on the same day as elections in the rest of Europe as a strong one. We have different systems and different cultures, and that argument is unlikely to find favour with the public.

What really alarmed me was the proposition that the general election would take place on two days. It would be seriously bad news for the polling stations to be open for two days. Given all the other means of voting, do we really have to have an election for two days? I suspect that the second day would be like the extra hour that we now have at the end of polling day for local elections, when very few people actually vote, and we irritate many more by asking them why they have not voted—adding under our breath how close the race is locally. The same would happen if the general election were held over two days. Very few people would vote on the second day, and there would be a disproportionate effort for very few extra voters. I accept that the schools would not have to close, but in my constituency many people vote in a village hall, not a school, and taking a village hall out of play for two days over a weekend is serious local politics.

There are other issues, including exit polls and what the press and other media would be allowed to say on the second day, when perhaps more than half the country has voted, but the other has not. The sheer fatigue of a second day of chasing up the non-voters who do not want to be chased up is a strong argument against two days of voting. I understand the religious sensitivities that would be offended if we plumped for either a Saturday or a Sunday, but surely those who have religious objections to one of those two days could vote earlier by post, or by proxy on the day. Two days of polling seems dotty. It is tinkering with the system, not addressing the underlying causes of voter apathy.

To conclude, I am not sure that I would look for alibis such as changing the day on which we vote. The answer lies far closer to home, and relates to how we conduct ourselves as politicians, how we motivate our electorate, and how relevant and effective they perceive us to be. If we get that right, they will vote on Thursdays, as they used to.

3.14 pm

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree): I agree substantially with the remarks of the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young). Tinkering with the system helps us to avoid examining the real problem.

When one reaches a certain age and moves into one's late 50s—although by Chinese standards, I suppose that I am no great age—one has seen quite a few years in politics. The first elections that I took part in were in the early 1960s. In the borough where I lived—Southend-on-Sea—40 per cent. was regarded as a very low turnout. My father stood in a number of elections in which the turnout was 60 per cent., and that was regarded as not uncommon.

As the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire observed, in those days—although he may be speaking of a slightly later time—voters were at great pains not to make any admission that they would not vote. Officially, the only people who did not vote were Jehovah's Witnesses. Sometimes one was impolite enough to suggest to someone that they might be a Jehovah's Witness if they declined to vote, and they would then explain that there was some other reason. However, such admissions were rare.

Now, non-voting is worn like a T-shirt of honour—I think that would be the appropriate expression. People will say that they are not voting as though that were something to be rewarded. I suspect that, to some extent, the background to that is the media culture in which we now live. All of us in the House, and those on local councils, are regarded as scallywags or fools, or as people who are out of touch. The aim is to portray democracy in a way that cannot be attractive to the vast majority of voters. There is a dangerous tendency in the popular newspapers, television programmes and radio interviews to treat politicians—irrespective of party—as the accused. There is no understanding that people may go into political affairs out of a sense of high calling, or because they wish to make the world a better place. The assumption is that politics is about sleaze, self-advancement and pettifogging arguments about things that do not affect people. That is not true today, and it never was true.

In the period after the second world war, the newspapers were very partisan on both sides. It may now seem surprising, but in those days the Daily Mirror was a firmly Labour newspaper, and even the Liberal party had the News Chronicle. Those papers put forward their own political views strongly, but those views were argued on the basis of politics, not on the basis of the personality of the political opponents whom they faced.

It is therefore not surprising that after the second world war there was a generation of people, particularly people who had come back from the forces, who believed that politics was a channel through which the world could be improved. It is not surprising, either, that in the 1950 election the turnout reached the highest level that the UK has ever known. It was 84 per cent., and in some towns and divisions it was 90 per cent. That is all the more surprising when one considers that the election was not held on a bank holiday weekend, but in February. It was the middle of winter, and in some parts of the country there would have been snowfall, but people were so committed to taking part in the democratic process that nothing would induce them not to do so. They saw it as their duty and their privilege to take part in the elections.

We need to try to rekindle that view of politics, so that elections become a meaningful exercise for everyone in the country. That will not be a simple task, with the baying background cacophony of the popular media, pretending that we are all shams and frauds, and that nothing can be achieved.

We ourselves are not blameless. The pettifogging arguments that take place about nothing in particular are not very edifying for the general public. However, it is remarkable that people take delight in coming to see Prime Minister's Question Time, which is an elaborate stage show. Perhaps people separate that out in their minds and consider that it falls into the realm of entertainment. However, I suspect that—even if this debate is being broadcast now—the nation's televisions are not firmly tuned to that channel.

What can we do about all this? A number of things. First, we can try to conduct politics in a more adult and intelligent way. That applies to all parties, although not to all politicians, as many of them conduct themselves in that way already. However, we should put some constraints on the head offices of all the political parties, because when an election approaches they enter into the most inane buffoonery, which has no beneficial effect whatever.

I represent one of the governing party's most marginal seats, and received great and bountiful benefits from head office during the last election. There were a series of huge, expensive posters on film themes, but one had to be very keen of sight to detect that they were urging the election of the Labour candidate. One might have thought that the picture was about to play at the multiplex cinema.

Nationally, such things may seem like clever ideas, and they may appear very smart to the advertising agencies, but they are completely meaningless to the average voter. For some strange reason, head office delivered to my constituency office footprints that were supposed to be laid out at the entrance to the Labour hall. At that point, my agent drew the line. He said that we were not going to make ourselves a complete laughing stock by putting footprints down on the way to the hall. Those are some examples from the Labour side of the political fence, and I suspect that hon. Members on both sides of the House have had similar experiences with their political organisations.

Another important reason for the decline in participation is the lack of contact between candidates and the voters. We think that we meet hundreds and thousands of people, but we do not; we have a lot of people to do that for us. When I first went into politics all those years ago, candidates canvassed people; you knocked on the doors of their houses one after the other, and asked them if they were going to vote for you. If people wanted to raise anything they did so there and then, on the doorstep, and they could judge what manner of person the candidate was and what sort of effort he or she was putting into the local community.

There was a lot of canvassing, although the number of people canvassed was always exaggerated. As hon. Members know, the 100 per cent. canvass is an impossibility. I have called at one house about 20 times in the last 20 years and never found anyone in, although I am sure that someone lives there. Members need to meet personally the people whose votes we are seeking. We need to get back to engaging them in conversation and giving them our time.

Our head offices tell us that telephone canvassing, or "voter ID", is the answer. I had a strange experience of telephone canvassing shortly before the last election. I went to see a lady of 90, and was sitting in her bungalow talking about not terribly political things when the telephone rang. The lady jumped and asked me if I would mind her answering the call, as it might be her son. The caller turned out to be a political canvasser; thank goodness it was a Conservative, rather than one of our own. She said to me, "That's very strange. It was someone wanting to know about the Conservative party. Why would they be asking me about that?" That lady is very intelligent, and well involved in political issues. In a way, that call was an affront.

We all say that we do not like being canvassed by double-glazing salesmen who telephone us out of the blue just when we are going out. The more humane of us try to be polite when we turn them down but others are as rude as possible. However, when it comes to politics, we are told that telephone canvassing is the only way, as it is much more accurate. But we all know that it is not accurate at all. Most of the people who are telephoned have to be re-canvassed, because the responses are so negative that they do not provide an accurate picture. There is also no human contact in any real sense. I was quite pleased that my Conservative opponent used that method. I thought, "By golly, the poor chap must be so depressed each day when he gets up and asks his agent what the returns are."

We need to reinvolve ourselves in the community, which is not as easy as it was. In the past, political initiation took place through our parents, other family members, trade unions, Churches and fairly tight communities. However, much of that structure of society has weakened. Indeed, in some cases it no longer exists. It is much more difficult for people to become involved, because the mechanisms whereby they learn about these matters are a long way away. Things are beamed into their living rooms or delivered on to their doormats, so the bonding in society that is often a precondition of voting does not take place.

People can probably gather from what I have said that I am not a great enthusiast for weekend voting. It never does any harm to have been around a long time and to have read some history, because then one knows that this country has had weekend voting before. In many areas, the old rural district councils voted on Saturdays until 1974, so there is a precedent. In our county, we would help our friends across the border on the Saturday on the condition that they had helped us on the Thursday.

I do not have figures on whether the turnout for those elections on a Saturday was higher than the turnout for the other elections on a Thursday, because all turnouts were higher in those days. We could probably find the figures and discover whether weekend voting made a substantial difference, but it probably did not.

There is an argument for postal voting, provided that it does not lessen even further the amount of political activity that takes place. An agent who was not from my constituency once said, "Well, there's postal voting now, so when election day comes round, we don't have to do anything." That will reduce turnout yet again. As I have said, there may be a case for postal voting, but we should not be deluded into thinking that because the turnout for some of the local election postal votes is higher than the turnout with other forms of voting, there would be the same effect in a general election. Such votes are moving towards the maximum level of likely voters. Unfortunately, a large section of people in our society do not vote, cannot be persuaded to vote and have no interest in voting.

I am very hostile to some of the experiments on many-sided ways of voting. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who is no longer in his place, referred to that earlier. We do not want some groups in society to have an advantageous position in the electoral system. Many poorer and older people do not have all the electronic gadgets with which people can vote so easily. They will therefore be at a disadvantage, whereas those who have such gadgets and that type of lifestyle will be at an advantage. Elected politicians should be mindful of the fact that if some people vote and some people do not, the result may well be different from what it would otherwise have been.

We should tackle the core of the problem, which is our own behaviour and the cynical society that has been created for many people. We should try to restore idealism and activity to politics, so that it becomes an integral part of people's lives and communities.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): We have already had three substantial speeches in this debate, which once again shows the value of this Chamber for debating an issue of this type. Some of the themes to which I shall refer reflect what has been said.

I was struck by what the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) said about the 1960s. I first stood for Parliament in 1966, having already been elected a county councillor. Obviously, there have been all sorts of changes since then, but I should like to draw attention to the contrast between the turnout when I was first elected to this place in February 1974 and the turnout when I was elected last time. In 1974 the wise electors of the then Bodmin constituency knew that the race would be close—indeed, in the end there was a majority of just nine—so they turned out in large numbers. We had an 83 per cent. turnout, in a scattered rural area with snow falling. In June 2001, in our customary balmy summer, my turnout in north Cornwall was 63 per cent.—a fall of 20 percentage points. The big difference was not in the natural climate but the political climate—the electorate took the wise decision that I had a relatively safe seat and was likely to be returned. The critical issue with turnout is whether your vote counts.

I want to focus on the mechanics first, before the motivation. The Minister was right to offer no panacea for improving the mechanisms, but in her peroration she made an important point about the legitimacy of Parliament. I wondered—I have not had the chance to check—whether she agrees with her boss, the Lord Chancellor, that the second House of Parliament can remain legitimate by being wholly unrelated to the electorate's wishes, with no democracy, no ballot box and no opportunity for the electorate to influence the composition of that House.

The mechanics are important, which is the reason for this afternoon's debate. Part of the equation—perhaps only a small part, but we should not ignore it—is trying to keep pace with the times and make the process of voting more accessible to the voter. To that extent, I congratulate the Government on introducing the pilot schemes. Even if we discover that they have little value, they will have fulfilled a significant function. My office has averaged the various experiments—with the result that all postal ballots come out at plus 14.93 per cent., which is significant.

What of electronic counting? One might think that it makes no difference whatever. It probably does not, but three of the elections—North Tyneside mayoralty and council and Chorley—were all-postal ballot votes as well. We can largely discount electronic counting; I cannot imagine why electors should turn out more enthusiastically because a computer will do the counting. Extended voting hours produced a result of minus 7.15 per cent., electronic internet voting plus 6.32 per cent., and early voting 1.7 per cent.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test): I hate to be picky, but does the hon. Gentleman accept that aggregating the figures as he suggests is difficult unless one knows the relative weighting of the numbers voting in each election?

Mr. Tyler: The hon. Gentleman has much experience and a distinguished academic career in this subject area; I was about to make precisely the same point. Furthermore, the points of comparison are often difficult. I shall return to that in a few minutes in the context of my wider thesis that all these pilots of are dubious value in the longer term, precisely because of the difficulty of comparison.

I shall quote from the Electoral Commission report on the pilots of last August. Brief reference has already been made to one sentence, but I want to cite the whole paragraph:

> "In a majority of pilot authorities, turnout was up by comparison both with recent local elections and with non-pilot area local elections in 2002. In some cases, turnout increased significantly—even matching the general election figures from 2001. But there were differences in performance between different pilot areas, and variations between wards even in areas that secured significant increases overall. The technology-based voting pilots appeared to have no significant impact on turnout."

That is the mixed bag to which the Minister referred, and it is important to return to the more deep-seated issues to which the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) and the hon. Member for Braintree have already referred.

Let me deal briefly with weekend voting. My colleagues and I support the idea of a pilot, because the case cannot be proved one way or another unless we have a go at it. I do not support the view expressed by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire that we should just have one day—Saturday or Sunday. That is not just because of religious sensitivities. The Jewish community and other communities would not wish to vote on a Saturday, but we want them to take a full part in the process. Proxy voting is not an answer. Similarly, some Christian communities will find Sunday inconvenient, or perhaps even against their principles. Two-day voting is also a matter of convenience. Some people work all day on Saturday and do not work on Sunday, and vice versa. If we are to have weekend voting it should take place not on just one weekend day, but on both. Moreover, weekend voting should be combined with the European elections of 2004, because almost all our continental partners vote on a Sunday. There is some merit in the whole of that weekend being a Europe-wide electoral occasion, rather than its being confined to just one day, with us as the odd ones out.

The Local Government Association research report "Elections: the 21st century model", which was an evaluation of the May 2000 local electoral pilot, notes that one authority—Camden—conducted its local election in the weekend following the traditional Thursday polling day, and turnout declined there more than in any other authority in the country compared with 1999. The Electoral Commission also noted a fall in turnout in 2002 to 28.4 per cent. when there was a repeat pilot of weekend voting. It is by no means certain that we will see a major increase in turnout as a result of this one little tweak.

Mr. Cash: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman intends to go on to deal with this, but one of the things that has intrigued me about the Lib Dems is that of the 10 seats in England with the highest turnouts in the 2001 general election, five were won by Lib Dem candidates. I am quite surprised that the hon. Gentleman has not mentioned that. I think that there is something important there, not least that it demonstrates that where there is a fight going on, quite often in marginal seats—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. The debate is about turnouts.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), but I obviously must not pursue him too far down that route, Mr. Deputy Speaker. He sounds as if he will support my view that turnout can be greatly enhanced if every vote has a reasonable opportunity of affecting the result. That is the critical issue.

Martin Linton (Battersea): Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the subject of pilots, will he reconcile his first comment that there should be a pilot with his subsequent comment that the previous pilot could not be taken as evidence because the results were probably affected by completely different causes? I doubt that a pilot would work in this area, because we will not know whether it has succeeded or failed, as the fact that the election is at a weekend is only one of many different factors. Indeed, that is probably one of the weakest factors in influencing whether people vote. We need to go over to having a general election at a weekend if we are to have any idea of the real effect.

Mr. Tyler: The hon. Gentleman makes a powerful point. My thesis is that comparability is extremely difficult in this area. That is why I will return to the careful analysis of the real life results of the 2001 election rather than going for averages. That will also be an answer to the hon. Member for Stone. We should not spend too much time tweaking here and tweaking there with these pilot schemes. We should go back to the motivation, and more radical reform.

I should like to quote back to the Minister the comments she made in this Chamber earlier this year. She said:

> "Convenience is an issue, although it is not the only issue".—[Official Report, 28 January 2003; Vol. 398, c. 243.]

She has made similar comments again this afternoon. I hope that she and her Department have that over the door of their office. I believe that there are much stronger reasons for reviewing our electoral processes than she and her colleagues have previously given credence to.

Mr. McLoughlin: I agree with a number of the points the hon. Gentleman has made. It has been suggested that if people were allowed to abstain in an election by marking a box saying that they wished to abstain, it would increase turnout. Does he think that that is the case? Would he welcome a box marked "None of the above" on the ballot paper?

Mr. Tyler: There is a genuine argument for that, but the aim would be achieved much more effectively if the choice were put the other way round. Rather than giving people the negative option, we should give people a preferential option to be positive. There are good examples of that. Currently we do not have compulsory voting in this country, so if people want to say "None of the above", they stay at home—as they clearly do. It is surely preferable to present them with a ballot paper enabling them to state their least bad option, which turns the negative into the positive.

As I said earlier, the biggest single factor is surely the perceived value of the impact of one's vote. I cited the case of the turnout figures in my constituency in Cornwall, but there are more recent examples. The average figures for the 2001 election are all from the same day—this is not making a comparison between different years, which is much less reliable than looking at figures from the same day—and if we look carefully underneath them we see that the foregone conclusion syndrome, which was to some extent a national one in June 2001, was even stronger in certain constituencies.

I have cited in this Chamber the turnout for Liverpool, Riverside of 34.1 per cent. I believe that the turnout there is always around that figure, because they weigh the Labour majority there, rather than constituents looking with interest to see who might win. Compare that with the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), who in 1997 had a majority of just two. There, if anywhere, people knew their vote was likely to be of significance to the outcome, and he had a 72.3 per cent. turnout—more than twice that of Liverpool, Riverside—on the same day. That is a genuine comparison, rather than the pallid comparisons that we have been looking at.

A system of voting that allows a greater degree of proportionality will reflect the views of the majority of the voting public instead of a minority. We all know what proportion of the adult electorate actually voted for the present Government, despite their large majority. Such a system would also provide more diversity among the electoral representatives, which would do more than anything to engender a better connection between public and politicians, and more participation in elections. Surely we should be addressing that issue.

In that debate, the hon. Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) said:

> "On average across the whole globe, turnout in first-past-the-post elections is 58 per cent., which is similar to the figure in this country, while turnout in proportional systems is 68 per cent."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 28 January 2003; Vol. 398, c. 235WH.]

That is a real live difference, and it is extremely important that the Government address it.

The Scottish Executive have just published a draft Local Government Bill that proposes a proportional system for the purpose of returning local councillors. A lengthy and extensive consultation process was undertaken before that stage was reached. Even in Wales the subject is now back on the agenda. There may be progress—depending, I suspect, on the result of the Assembly elections. Northern Ireland already benefits from single transferable votes and has a marked tendency towards improved turnout. The Library tells me that in Northern Ireland, where a system of single transferable votes is operated in all European elections, turnout has been significantly higher than in the rest of the UK.

Mr. McLoughlin: The hon. Gentleman says that the single transferable vote has led to a higher turnout in Northern Ireland. Will he acknowledge that in the Northern Ireland elections to the United Kingdom Parliament, which are carried out on a first-past-the-post system, the turnout is also higher? The fact that it is higher for another system, too, does not lend his case much credence.

Mr. Tyler: I cannot confirm or deny that. I think that the discrepancy is much greater in the European elections than in general elections, but someone else can investigate that matter. An extremely valuable and well based independent review of electoral systems is currently being undertaken under the auspices of the Constitution Unit, under two distinguished chairs, David Butler and Peter Riddell, and I look forward to seeing what it produces. I hope that we shall have at least an interim report early in the summer. It will be interesting to see what comes forward from that.

The Government, including the Minister's Department, have already been tasked to undertake, lead or set up a more general review after the Scottish Parliament, Welsh Assembly and local elections have taken place in May. Perhaps the Minister will tell us a little more about that. I hope that she will be able to confirm, although she could not do so on a previous occasion, that she will pilot a single transferable vote system in the London borough elections of 2006. Lewisham has already offered to undertake such a pilot and others will, no doubt, follow if encouraged. That would be helpful.

As others have already said, the discussion of the various small-scale pilot options does not really provide a panacea; indeed, the Minister herself said that it did not. Weekend voting is probably worth looking at, but it is of marginal value compared with the radical change needed to reinvigorate the sense of purpose and commitment that we want the electorate to have in relation to the parliamentary system. To achieve that, we must have equal value voting systems. All the pilots will be dismissed simply as gimmicks if they are not accompanied by a more rigorous review of all the real options; they are like cutting our toenails when we need a hip replacement.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test): We are discussing a fundamental dichotomy: the wished-for health of the democratic system on one hand and the main purpose of the voting that takes place in that democratic system on the other, which is to decide which party has won and therefore gets power, either locally or nationally. To achieve that result, the parties will undertake certain actions relating to those elections, which may or may not add to the first half of the dichotomy—the health of the democratic system.

I doubt whether this afternoon, between 2.30 and 5.30 in Westminster Hall, we shall between us come up with the panacea for the malaise that prevents people from voting. Inevitably, we will be talking to some extent at the margins. It is important to make points about the health of our democratic system and the extent to which we as politicians should behave better to encourage that and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) said, to connect better with our voters. However, the dichotomy that I set out to some extent emphasises that it is difficult to see how, unless one legislates fundamentally to change that dichotomy, the things that cause people to be turned off voting can be tackled.

For example, attack campaigning is clearly seen to work. A number of studies show that, so if one is a party manager, seeking to undertake the second half of the dichotomy—to get one's party to win an election—one might decide to undertake attack campaigning, even though that does not help the health of democracy. Although people say that they are very annoyed by telephone canvassing approaches, that method works by and large, so people are likely to use it to try to advance their political purposes. Part of the problem connected with the dichotomy is that the discussion on who is going to win the spoils of power in an election might relate, perfectly coherently, to what slice of a cake is cut for a winning side, whether or not that cake is getting smaller because fewer people are going out to vote. If we are not careful, we could end up with two parallel discussions about the academic health of democracy and about how to win elections. We must recognise that both are relevant to our electoral system.

I believe that a system of proportional representation is morally right for this country and may well increase turnout, but in countries that have had proportional representation for a long time voting figures are declining although they are higher than in countries with a first-past-the-post system. The trajectory of voting over a period should be examined to inform our discussions.

The idea that turnout is a sign of democratic health is fundamental. It is important that people exercise their right to vote and decide one way or another how their lives should be run through the political process. I cannot think of a better system—this spills over into elections for second chambers, nominations to quangos and so on—of organising people's right to take decisions on behalf of other people. Having a system whereby the legitimacy of that election is guaranteed because many people have taken part in it is important in the first part of the dichotomy. What can we do now to guarantee that?

This afternoon, we are debating not changing the voting system, but weekend voting and new systems of voting that may increase turnout. Setting those aside, what happens at the moment? As my hon. Friend the Minister said, we vote on Thursdays and there may be good historical reasons for that. I can think of another reason: that the candidates are usually so tired at the end of the election that being able to have Friday off, as well as the weekend, before they have to take decisions as a result of winning the spoils of election is no bad thing for democracy. We ask people to vote on a Thursday in one place and if they do not turn up at that place they do not get a vote. We ask them to vote on a slip of paper that seems to have been printed by the last remaining letterpress printer in the country. We then ask them to fill in their preference on that letterpress-printed piece of paper using a carpenter's pencil attached to the wall by a piece of string. Finally, we ask them to do that in a horse box that has been set up in a school hall. That is probably one of the most bizarre activities that we ask people to do in their daily lives in expressing their opinions, preferences and thoughts. That might inform our thoughts on how to increase turnout and create the reinforcement to ensure that people are able to vote, although it may not necessarily be the answer to all our concerns about our democratic system.

It is true that some people may be disadvantaged by not having access to different forms of democratic participation that other people have. It is also true that the daily life expectations of society have changed radically. We do not all set off for work and return home at the same time. We do not all work in the same place, and we have different working practices. We used not to go to garden centres and the shops on a Sunday, but now we do. Several things have changed that relate to the assumptions that we make about our daily lives and what makes us vote. In the context of those changing ideas about our lives, it is important that we take that different way of doing things into account.

I was pleased to see the pilots that were originally set up by the Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions, and subsequently set up by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. We must consider whether those pilots are worth pursuing as far as local elections are concerned. Pilots were introduced for the 2002 council elections, and we shall see a further 41 this year; those relate mainly to e-voting, but also to other forms of participation.

I agree with the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) that it would be a good idea to agree with local authorities to have pilots on proportional representation voting systems, possibly under the public service agreement mechanism. For the Government to say to local authorities that high performing local authorities can have a great deal more freedoms but not the freedom to determine how to set up the voting system for their area may be viewed as a drawback to the otherwise admirable introduction of a system to enable local government to enjoy freedoms and flexibilities.

I shall spend a moment talking about the problems of pilots. As important as pilots are, there is a problem—this relates to my original point on how elections work—with the idea that we could select a better voting system, which overcomes faults and meets the needs of our lives, by examining the outcome of a pilot based on one local election in one area. Voting is by and large based on habit. Politicians know that, and apply that knowledge when deciding how their local electoral organisations will go about contacting voters. The political parties of all the people in the Chamber will have a note in their party office of who always votes, who votes in general elections but not in council elections, who votes in council elections but not always in general elections, who occasionally votes and who never votes. That information is in addition to information about whether people have always voted Labour, Liberal Democrat or

[Dr. Alan Whitehead]

Conservative. An element of the parties' approach is to ensure that those people who sometimes vote in council elections are encouraged to come out and vote in an election. Those people who always vote are also canvassed to ensure that they vote. The people who rarely or never vote are often set aside, not part of the efforts of the party. Parties operate in that way because voting is habitual.

However, when parties consider their longitudinal records, they will observe not only that electoral turnout is declining but that those people who vote habitually tend to be members of the older generation. The very oldest voters will die off, or perhaps I should say die—please excuse my infelicity—and the next generation of voters do not have the same habits. Not only do young voters not have that habit of voting, but they have a contrary habit, which I personally find concerning for the health of democracy: they have the idea that it is cool not to vote. Many see it as a positive thing to say, "No, I'm not voting. You're all the same, and that's the end of the matter." The question is whether those cohorts will acquire voting habits as they grow older, or whether the non-voting habit will pass on through the generations. In future, people may have an endemic habit of not voting very often.

Mr. Cash: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could enlighten us as to why the turnout of young people has dropped to such an extent. What does he think would encourage them to vote?

Dr. Whitehead: There are a large number of reasons why young people do not vote. I am not sure that we have either time or the breadth of discussion this afternoon to go into those reasons in detail. There is clearly a combination of factors that I have already mentioned, such as the assumed lifestyle of young people, the dissociation from tribal loyalties in voting, the idea that politicians are divorced from the concerns of young people and a large number of other factors.

I was attempting to illustrate the danger for the democratic process if a cohort emerges that has a habit of not voting. That may pass on through the generations, and we shall end up with a population who do not vote. Voting may become a minority activity carried out by rather strange people who debate with one another. The net result could lead to very strange outcomes in which a very small number of voters in the grip of a particular enthusiasm gain representation despite the antipathy of the vast majority of the people who do not vote, or do not wish to. That was the precise outcome in some of the recent European election turnouts.

On the analysis of the pilots, I concluded that I was not sure that we could draw hard and fast conclusions from the offer of a particular voting method on one occasion, because voting is habitual. That phenomenon is not just something that occurs in elections. If someone sets up a park-and-ride scheme to get people out of cars and into buses, that scheme has to run for between 18 months and two years before anyone has the confidence to use it. That is usually about the time that the money for the pilot runs out and the local authority decides to discontinue the scheme, claiming that it has not been a success.

Some of the results of the 2002 pilots showed that there was no enormous change, even if we discount the fact that they might reflect the stopping of a decline. However, if we continued the process over a period, people might develop voting habits that were of far greater long-term benefit because they would be encouraged to vote in a way that was aligned with their lifestyle, rather than in the peculiar way in which they have to vote currently.

Martin Linton: Does my hon. Friend agree, in that case, that the Government sometimes suffer from what one might call pilotitis—a wish to have a pilot of every possible scheme, instead of having the courage of their convictions and making the reform?

Dr. Whitehead: I would not like the phrase pilotitis to be widely used. It does sound like something terrible that happens when people sit on radiators. My hon. Friend has a considerable point, which I was about to come to. The operation of pilots can tell us something, but not everything. Indeed, the hon. Members for Stone (Mr. Cash) and for North Cornwall raised that point earlier—albeit incorrectly, in the case of the particular significance of the Chorley election. The vast majority of authorities using electronic counting experienced an increased turnout, which is counter-intuitive inasmuch as the general voting public do not care how their votes are counted. One of the best increases in turnout, however, was based on that particular section of the electoral pilots.

Taking on board the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Martin Linton), my view is that pilots may be important, but if we base our entire future philosophy of elections on them, we may miss fundamental points about trends and habits. Frankly, the only way in which we can deal with that, short of having widespread placebo election experiments in which we run entire elections in parallel using different methods, is to bite the bullet and change things.

Mr. Tyler: I agree with a great deal of what the hon. Gentleman has said. I hope that he would agree that bringing together the local elections and the European elections in 2004 is valuable for reasons other than pilotry. I think that he would agree that voter fatigue is a problem, because having two elections within five weeks of each other may well be a disincentive to turning out.

Dr. Whitehead: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Looking at the turnout in general elections and council elections in recent years, in 1979 council elections and the general election were held on the same day—that is also true of the most recent general election—and there was a much higher turnout in the council elections, for obvious reasons. I am uncertain whether the turnout for European elections will drag down the turnout for local authority elections. However, I agree in principle that the idea is an interesting way in which to address voter fatigue.

In conclusion, if we agree that pilots have limited validity in deciding how to change electoral behaviour to make turnout increase, which would enhance the legitimacy of our election to our seats, the decision comes back to the House. To some extent, we have to follow our noses. We should consider how the current voting system looks to those people who do not habitually engage in politics. In my canvassing for the previous election—this relates to why some young people do not vote—I found a number of people who simply did not know how to vote. Those people have not been to vote with their parents and find the process mysterious. They may well say that it is cool not to vote simply because they think that the process is more complicated than it actually is.

The Government should therefore press ahead with systems that bring our voting in line with how we live. We have to make a judgment because we do not have the empirical evidence to allow us to decide whether the leap will be beneficial. If we go down the weekend voting route and put together different methods of voting, it will make a difference. We will never know whether it made an empirical difference because we cannot judge the decision in the same way as a social science experiment. It is, however, our responsibility as politicians to make it happen.

4.8 pm

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): It is a pleasure to follow the previous contributions to the debate. The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) started the debate by dividing up the issue into motivation and practical factors. Voting is like planning a crime: one needs motive, means and opportunity, all of which have to come together for voting to occur.

The hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) started talking about motivation, and he made some important points about the generational shift. I want to talk about that in the context of the way in which the concept of civic duty is changing. I shall start by talking about some of the opportunity questions, which relate to the opening hours and locations of polling stations, and the means questions, which are about novel forms of voting, such as postal votes, electronic votes and various other forms of remote voting.

Means and opportunity issues are important. The hon. Gentleman sensibly relayed the observation that going to vote is like going back 30 years for a lot of people. It is an odd experience. We are used to it because we live in the political world. However, he helpfully described the way in which the voting system appears to a lot of people outside political circles, who think of it as going back in time.

E-voting has rightly gained a lot of prominence and is seen as a way to bring voting into the 21st century. I am keen on e-issues, but even I am somewhat sceptical about the way in which e-voting is being heavily oversold as a turnout improver. E-voting certainly adds a layer of convenience, and I would never want to stand in the way of that. In such debates, there is sometimes a sense that voting should be made difficult and that barriers should be put in the way so that only people who are serious about voting get to do it. I count myself well out of that school. Voting should be made as easy as possible. There is no justification for trying to make things difficult and no advantage in doing so.

The potential for e-voting is sometimes oversold on the basis of being related to the number of internet users. About half the country has access to the internet. In particular, the younger age groups, which we want to target, have that access. I have started to consider the matter, in conjunction with people who work in the area of e-democracy, and I suggest that the realistic potential audience for e-voting is somewhere nearer 15 per cent. than 50 per cent. That proposition is based on the fact that the comparators for people who are likely to use e-voting are, much more accurately, people who are already using e-banking or e-government services, who are a very much smaller subset of the total number of people who have access to the internet. People who feel comfortable transacting online are not equivalent to people who are online in a more general sense. The experience of e-government bears that out. We get nothing like the usage figures that one might imagine from looking at the number of people who are online.

The hon. Member for Southampton, Test also made an important point when he talked about the problem of continuous pilots or pilots that change from year to year and the fact that habit is an important element in getting people to vote. I had an e-voting pilot last year and I am going to get another, slightly different, one this year. Rather than seeing new people voting, I saw people who already voted shift from using the traditional paper method to the e-voting method.

The hon. Members for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) and for Stroud (Mr. Drew) picked up on the fact that the method of voting can influence who votes, and who votes can clearly influence the outcome. From a politician's point of view, e-voting is incredibly tedious because all that happens is that an electoral officer comes up and says, "You got this number and they got that number." That is it. There is no fun or excitement. Right at the beginning of the count, the officer comes out with a little scrap of paper and says, "There's your result, mate."

It was, however, exciting news when the results from the e-vote in one of the wards in my constituency that the Liberal Democrats normally win showed that we were three to one ahead, whereas our vote was down on the paper vote. The experience showed something that other studies bear out, which is that Liberal Democrat voters tend to use the internet proportionately more than voters for other parties do. Therefore we were three to one ahead, but we were three to two on the final count, which is exactly comparable to the result that we get every year.

Looking at the figures, it is fairly safe to say that we saw Liberal Democrat voters voting online, instead of going to the polling station. The Conservative voters who always went to the polling station kept going to the polling station. To pick up on the point made by the hon. Member for Southampton, Test, I may have a potential problem if the e-voting pilot is taken away, because my supporters, who have got used to voting online, may feel miffed and not turn out to vote at all if the service is suddenly withdrawn. There is still more work to be done in teasing out some of the issues, but I had not considered the fact that habit is so significant. That is something to take away from the debate.

A more significant aspect of the debate is the question of civic participation and the recognition that democracy is about far more than voting, which is only a small part of it. If we become too obsessed about voting, voters may say, "You are interested in us only at election time." To me, the key to increasing turnout is what happens between elections, not what happens at election time. We should be focusing far more on the tie-up.

Again the electronic agenda is important. It is not the fact that someone makes a virtual cross in a box on a screen that is significant in increasing turnout, but the fact that someone who engages politically to vote on the internet will engage all the rest of the time. People may become involved in politics and political issues because they now have a set of tools that were not previously available. Such tools may fit more comfortably with their lifestyle and way of working, particularly if they are a younger voter. Therefore, the linkage is important. If e-voting has a value, it is as a link to e-participation.

The office of the e-envoy published a White Paper last year. I believe that it was published under the auspices of the Leader of the House. I know that the debate on it and many of the representations stressed the point that e-participation was important, rather than simply the voting, whereas the White Paper was more or less evenly split between the two. I believe that people want more work to be done on participation. I hope that the debate that is taking place in the context of the Lord Chancellor's Department's responsibility for elections is linked in a joined-up government fashion to other debates about the wider democracy agenda that are taking place in the office of the e-envoy and other forums.

Earlier, I expressed my concerns about the possibility of coercion and undue influence under all forms of remote voting. It applies to postal voting as well. I was interested in the Minister's response that she envisaged a multi-channel approach. That was helpful, but it means that I must counter the point made by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire about weekend voting perhaps not being necessary if there is a large amount of postal voting. At present, I am very keen to see a multi-channel approach develop whereby, even if postal voting is available, there are also supervised polling places.

The key distinction between a polling station and any form of remote voting is that a polling station is a safe environment in which an individual can vote without coercion and undue influence. Obviously, there are situations in which one would be concerned about that. I think particularly of a man in a household who controls access to voting by controlling the computer. He would be setting up the voting procedure. Particularly when it comes to a husband and wife—or man and woman—situation in a household, the possibility that the man will direct the voting is obviously much greater than if the man and woman go to a polling station together but split up and go into separate booths to vote.

Some of those issues lead me to suggest that polling places will continue to be important no matter how far we go with remote voting. In that respect, we have not sufficiently explored the advantages of supervised electronic voting as opposed to remote electronic voting. An advantage of electronic voting methods and machines is that they can be linked to a central network, so that people can vote at any polling station anywhere in their district. They would not have to go to a particular polling station, which is an advantage in itself.

Such a system could allow us to provide more polling places as improvements in the technology reduce the costs. A polling place that is, essentially, a kiosk can operate with a lower staff ratio. A supervised electronic polling kiosk could be far more easily rolled out to multiple locations than the traditional paraphernalia of a paper-based polling station.

I stress that more polling places should be made available. Online banking is a good analogy for many things that are taking place in the online world. The banks have rapidly realised that online banking does not allow them to close all their branches. Many people want and value the branch network. In fact, banks are putting micro-branches in all sorts of places. Learning from that example could help us make polling accessible to people. Micro polling stations would be good for people. They would make it easier for them to vote but also give them certainty that they can vote free from coercion and undue influence.

I want also to cover the discussion about participation: whether people feel that they should participate and whether that leads them to vote. Important research is taking place at the moment, funded by the Economic and Social Research Council, in the democracy and participation programme. It is led by Professor Paul Whiteley of the university of Essex and is starting to report now. Its findings will be illuminating to this debate. In particular, research carried out by Rachel Gibson, Wainer Lusoli and Stephen Ward of the university of Salford examined young citizens' political activity via the internet. Some of the research results are being released at www.ipop.org.uk.

The section of the population that the study considered is one that we could try to engage and persuade to vote via the internet. The results showed that while only 10 per cent. of those in the 15 to 24-year-old age bracket were currently engaged in real world politics, 30 per cent. had been active and carried out a political activity via the internet. The study also picked up on a small but notable group who engage in only virtual politics, eschewing entirely the traditional offline options. Rather than being a privileged elite, however, those people are more likely to be recent recruits to the internet and of a lower socio-economic status than those engaging in traditional politics. The study also found that a clear majority of those who used the internet to contact a political organisation—63 per cent.—claim that they would not have done so if they had had to rely on traditional means. That research programme is starting to pull out some interesting results about changes in behaviour, and I hope that we shall be able to feed some of them into the debate. The debates on civic participation and on voting should be seen as running together.

My next point relates to civic duty, which I mentioned earlier. It follows on from the comments of the hon. Member for Southampton, Test about the generational shift and relates to the British election survey 2001, titled "Britain (Not) At The Polls, 2001", which was conducted by Clarke, Sanders, Stewart and Whiteley and published in 2002. They examined several of the hypotheses that we have debated today about why people did not vote, but the one that struck me related to what is often termed the end-of-deference debate. People nowadays do not feel that they have to vote, whereas before, they continued to vote out of a sense of duty and guilt.

That important theory has been alluded to already. The Minister spoke about it in the context of women voters, and we often pick up the idea from older voters that as people died for us to get the vote, we must use it. The study's authors picked up a potential shift in attitudes by asking people whether they thought that failing to vote was a serious neglect of their civic duty. That was upping the stakes, as they had previously asked whether not voting was a neglect of duty. In the 18 to 25-year-old age group, only 41 per cent. thought that it was a serious neglect of their civic duty; in other words, three out of five felt that it was not. In the 66-years-old and over age bracket, 86 per cent. felt that it was a serious neglect. The difference is stark, and it was much more marked in that question than in the general neglect question. Younger people felt that they should vote, but they did not feel that it was serious not to do it. That is an important distinction.

The authors suggested that those answers show the generational shift that has been described. We have spent many years pursuing freedom, and that has included the freedom to choose not to participate. As the hon. Member for Southampton, Test said, one factor may be that people say that they are choosing not to participate when they are scared to do so because they do not understand. I have experienced that. I have knocked on someone's door and said that I am the candidate for this constituency for this election, and I have had to start defining terms immediately, when asked what a candidate is and what the constituency is. The notion that everyone has an easy association between their Member and constituency is false. I have had to explain, "Sheffield has six constituencies. You've heard of David Blunkett. He's one MP, and I'm another." People often start at a low base, and in such cases people may be scared to look ignorant. That is prevalent, but the wider belief is that people no longer feel that they have to vote, and if they choose not to, we cannot make them. That attitude is significant.

The study examined that aspect of the dynamics of civic duty in its conclusions, which are worth quoting. It says:

> "Although a comparison of 1997 and 2001 BES data does not suggest that the belief that voting is an obligation of British citizenship has diminished appreciably in recent years, already strong age-related differences are accentuated in response to a new civic duty question in the 2001 BES", which is the one about serious failure if one has not voted. It continues:

> "If these enhanced differences signify growing life-cycle or—more ominously—generational gaps in civic duty, the 2001 decrease in turnout may be a harbinger of a future where levels of electoral participation in Britain more closely resemble those in the United States."

In other words, dropping to 40 to 50 per cent. will be the norm.

There are questions about whether democracies are legitimate once participation has dropped to 40 to 50 per cent. The United States is clearly an established democracy that functions at that level, but there is no suggestion in the United Kingdom that any of us would be comfortable with that. That generational shift may be the factor that finally tips us out of a comfortable situation in which participation has always been 70-odd per cent, although it occasionally slips down and picks up again, or slips down on elections that we all perceive to be relatively unimportant, such as the European ones. Interestingly, they were not seen as a crisis of democratic legitimacy, although the turnout was far lower than for the 2001 general election, which focused our minds because we all share a sense of the relative importance of general elections. The study highlighted the fact that dropping down to 40 to 50 per cent. at general elections is a real prospect as the generational shift takes place. We should all worry about it.

To conclude, I want the new methods to work, not fail. We should improve the opportunity to vote and the means of voting, but we always need to ensure that the integrity of the election is not compromised. I fear that it takes only one election result to be seriously challenged, or only one set of accusations about coercion or undue influence that cannot be properly resolved, for a whole new voting method to be written off in the minds of the public.

More important, we must improve the motivation of voters, especially by tackling civic duty head on. The democratic participation agenda research programmes will generate a lot of research and give us plenty of food for thought. We can make real progress if we get out of our cosy political environments and find out what is going on, and if we find imaginative new ways of conducting politics, rather than sticking a modern veneer on things and doing them in the way in which we have always done them.

Vernon Coaker (Gedling): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan). I agreed especially with his concluding remarks, which built on the remarks made by the right hon. Member for [illegible]orth-West Hampshire (Sir George Young). Both made very good contributions to the debate.

I shall re[illegible]eat many of the points that have already been ma[illegible]However, I do so with some trepidation, as last sum[illegible]er—a few months ago now—I held a meeting for young people on voter apathy, but no one turned up. I therefore do not feel best placed to contribute to the debate, although the problem was more to do with timing and organisation than with the young people. I was the problem, which is one of the issues that we face.

The situation is serious. I take the point made by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) that competitive elections help, but participation in elections is declining, whichever way we look at it. The figures for 2001 reflect that trend. As we know, 59 per cent. of people voted, but the figure declined to 39 per cent. among young people, as hon. Members pointed out. Among under-35s, the figure was only 45 per cent. Those figures trouble us all, and say something about the health of our democracy. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, if we consider the differential turnouts and break the data down so that we can focus on the detail, we see that in some parts of the country, particularly some cities, a very small minority of people vote. If we break the data down by age, we see that a very small number of young people in those areas vote.

[Vernon Coaker]

To understand what is going on, however, we must look beyond those figures and some of the measures that we are taking. There are problems with the formal political process. I make the obvious point that when we go to meetings or hear issues debated, there is no lack of interest in those issues or lack of desire to debate many of the great policies of the day. However, when it comes to making a statement about the formal political process through elections, people seem to see it as irrelevant. We must therefore find ways to make the formal political process much more relevant to people and to how they understand things are working. In other words, we have to increase the desire or propensity of people to vote.

The Minister and the rest of the Government are introducing various pilots, which I welcome. I have no problem with weekend voting. We could debate whether that should take place on a Sunday, a Saturday or both. I have no problem with e-voting, all-postal ballots or any of the other mechanisms that we could introduce for voting. We all agree that in encouraging people to vote, we need to make the act of voting as simple as we can. We need to make it easy, whether that involves the siting of polling booths, the electoral register or whatever. We need to help people.

However, these measures alone will not do the trick. If we think that by making voting easy we shall be doing anything other than tweaking the system, we are deluding ourselves and underestimating the scepticism, cynicism and mistrust that people have about the formal political process and, indeed, ourselves. That is reflected in election turnouts and the lack of desire to vote. That is the real challenge, which is why I particularly wanted to contribute to the debate. How do we as people's representatives in Parliament change, improve, reinvigorate, rejuvenate and enhance our democracy in such a way that people see voting for who should represent them in Parliament as worth while? Whether voting takes place on a Thursday, Sunday, Monday or Tuesday is irrelevant to the answer to that question.

A number of hon. Members have made that serious point. As the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam and my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) said, a massive majority of people in the younger generation feel disillusioned and frustrated. Only in the older population is there a sense of civic duty and connection.

I very much agreed with the remarks that I think were made by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire. I hope that I do not misquote him. We must consider what we do in this place and how we are perceived if we want people to vote and election turnouts to improve. We all say in elections, "Vote for me. I am not just here for you at election time; I am here all the time." However, one of the biggest criticisms that people can make is that politicians turn up only at election time. They say, "Because you turn up only at election times, we're not going to vote. If you're not interested in us between elections, we're not going to vote. If you knock on our door only when you want something from us, don't bother. We're not going to vote."

What happens between elections is important in people's decision whether to turn out and vote at the next election. If, having elected us as their representatives in 2001, the next time that people feel any sense of involvement with their MP or Parliament is in 2005 or 2006, no change to the mechanics of voting will do anything to increase voter turnout in the election. That is because people's cynicism, disillusion and despair will have grown during that time. It will be a real challenge for us to change that, but we must try to find ways to do so.

Members of Parliament are not delegates, and it would be a sad day if we ever became just representatives who are only ever accountable at an election. It would be increasingly difficult to sustain that position because people want a greater sense of involvement and to participate in democracy all the time, not just at elections. It is a real challenge to find ways of involving them.

I want to make some suggestions that could help us to reconnect with the public and overcome that cynicism and sense of disillusion, which would help to increase the turnout at elections.

First, we should consider how we conduct our debates in this place. The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire made a good point about unnecessary confrontation in the Chamber, which people do not like. They do not mind clashes of views and opinions when they are genuinely held and passionately felt, as shown in the debate on Iraq last week. I did not participate in that debate but I spent many hours listening to it in the Chamber. It was a great debate; there were huge clashes of opinion and Members expressed strongly held views. They vehemently criticised each other's points of view, but they respected them. People outside this place did not mind that; they did not see it as unnecessary, so it did not breed that sense of disillusionment that leads to their feeling disconnected from Parliament, which in turn leads to their asking why they should bother to vote.

We need to look at how we conduct our debates, how we address each other and some of the language that we use. We must consider how to involve people in the decisions that we take in this place and how we can more effectively take account of people's points of view.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman is making an interesting speech. Does he agree with me about modification of the Whip system, a matter that I have raised many times? Many people are simply not interested in seeing Members being driven like sheep through the Lobby.

Vernon Coaker: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, and so do many other people; that is why Westminster Hall is such an interesting innovation. Many people, if asked, would probably say that there is some unnecessary whipping in Parliament. Certainly, that is what a lot of people say to me. Either we tell those people that they have got it wrong about their democracy, and that the whipping system works very well, or we listen to what people have to say.

People are becoming more frustrated by Members voting rigidly along party lines. They want more genuine debates on the issues of the day, in which Members allow their conscience to dictate how they vote, although we must remember that we have a party system of government. In answer to the hon. Gentleman, I would say that we must have a whipping system but that it is probably too rigid. We should consider ways of allowing more free votes and debates on issues in which Members genuinely have a free vote. That would be helpful, and I think that people in the country would appreciate it.

Reforming the way that we do our business in Parliament would allow people to feel more connected to the formal political process and should, in the end, improve electoral turnout. Greater involvement in decision making and changes to our practices here should help.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) suggested, the media have a role to play in improving electoral turnout. I am not one of those people who view the media as the enemy, always getting things wrong. The media have a responsibility to report misdeeds and wrongs, but also to recognise and report people's genuine attempts to produce solutions to political problems of the day.

I have outlined a couple of ways of reforming the way that we do our business in this House. It is crucial to reflect on how we, as MPs, connect with our constituencies' and to gain an understanding of how we can give people a greater sense of involvement in the decision-making process. People in the 21st century do not accept that they voted for me, that I come to Parliament and that they have to wait another four years before passing judgment on how I have done. That factor has to be balanced against the dangers of a pure delegate system. To improve electoral turnout, we must start to deal with those issues as well as the mechanics of voting.

Let us be imaginative, radical and determined to change the factors that lead to disillusionment and despair, which often result in the declining participation of people, particularly younger people, in voting. We need to find ways of reforming ourselves, so that people see voting as part of the democratic process.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): As in the previous debate of 22 January and despite my remarks at the outset that we would repeat what we had debated before, I have come away from this debate with a sense of considerable enthusiasm for the subject. All the speeches have been thoughtful and excellent. As other hon. Members have said, what a pity it is that so few people are participating in this debate. Frankly, the massive decline in voter turnout—down to 59.4 per cent.—that occurred during the last general election is a serious sign for all political parties. It is effectively a demonstration of despair in the system.

I am not criticising the Government, but I doubt whether the key issue is about systems and techniques. They could change things at the margin, but for practical purposes, with the possible exception of postal ballots, no more than that. I hope that the Liberal Democrats will forgive me for saying that the solution does not lie in proportional representation. The problem is much more fundamental. The previous worst figure in general election turnout was in 1918. By nature and inclination an issues man, I am more concerned about the relationship between the events of a period and the consequences for general elections than about the technical aspects of voting systems.

If people are seriously worried about a problem, they will turn out to vote. In an agreeable exchange with the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) we found that five of the 10 highest turnouts were reflected by Liberal victories, which tells us a great deal about the degree of interest generated in those constituencies. Perhaps there is some connection, although I cannot think of it immediately, between what was going on in constituencies such as Liverpool, Riverside which have demonstrably low turnouts. Perhaps it was just the sense that there was nothing to vote about because it was a foregone conclusion, or it might have been because not enough political energy was being shown by the people who were their representatives. In other words,

> "The fault, dear Brutus, lies not in our stars,
> But in ourselves, that we are underlings."

That takes me back to the point that I have made about the Whip system. We will inevitably have a whipping system in a party system. The parties, after all, represent the translation of opinions into policies and law. Those opinions are reflected by the body of people who gather together, as Burke would put it, on a common principle in the national interest as they see it. People in the 18th century understood these things. I should like to mention a matter of anecdotal historical interest. I say this with great respect to the Lib Dems, particularly the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) who represents Ranmoor where I was brought up. My parents still live there and are his constituents.

The most illustrious member of my family was John Bright, who was effectively responsible for the 1867 Reform Act, passed by Disraeli. No one can doubt the degree of energy that he and others applied when they decided after the corn laws that they wanted to address the need for people to be given the right to vote, which was the point that the Minister made at the beginning. I entirely endorse that. I greatly admire the suffragettes for what they did. But this was not a feminist movement as such; it was a matter of the right to vote. The turnout was essential to those questions.

The Hyde park riots that preceded the 1867 Reform Act were a demonstration by people who were frustrated that, on the great issues of the day, what they said or thought was completely irrelevant. Although I am in favour of dealing with Saddam Hussein in an effective manner and although I am prepared to concede that it is not inevitable at the moment. I still think that the protest marches and other demonstrations are another form of turnout that is also extremely important not only in modern politics but in politics down the ages.

This is a terribly important debate. I suppose that I should not be surprised that there are not more hon. Members present, but I am disappointed that this is the second time that we have been around the circuit and there has not yet been a sufficient appreciation of the significance of the matter. I wish that we could have more debates like this and perhaps fewer of the other kind that often give rise to a comment that I frequently make at meetings—the best way to keep a secret is to make a speech in the House of Commons.

[Mr. William Cash]

I, too, am extremely alarmed by the lack of interest shown by young people. I am not entirely convinced that we have got anywhere near trying to appreciate it. The hon. Member for Gedling (Vernon Coaker) made important points about that. If I may again quote Disraeli,

> "The Youth of a Nation are the trustees of Posterity".

It would be an appalling state of affairs if the drop in interest among young people continued. If that trend were extrapolated into the next general election and the one after that, our democracy, which is already at risk for several reasons, would be severely tested.

I endorse and have always been enthusiastic about the idea of civic education. Some people would say that I am a traditional Tory, but they do not understand where I am coming from. Some of my more traditional colleagues are extremely suspicious of ideas of civic duty and teaching pupils in schools about the system of government, but I am all for it. It is terribly important. I wish that I had been better taught at that time. I was well taught in history, Latin and other such subjects, which have been useful in their time. But there is an important role for giving young people a clear understanding in this complicated, topsy-turvy world of why they should go out and vote.

Voting is the most important thing that a person does, when we think about it. Imagine if nobody voted, to put it in the most absurd context. The participation of a person in exercising his freedom of choice by turning out in an election and putting a cross against the name of the person who represents, in broad terms, the kind of society that he wants to live in is one of the most important things that a person can do. It is like eating, drinking and sleeping, but it happens only once in a blue moon. The fact that a vast number of people decide not to vote, for whatever reason, or think that politics is boring, uninteresting and irrelevant, or fail to understand the significance of what is going on is a dangerous sign of the times that we live in.

I was interested to hear on the radio this morning that George Orwell's "1984" has been rated the most important book in a poll of those who read books these days. Perhaps there is some significance in that. I am therefore extremely glad to know that the Electoral Commission is to take on this important role, but I issue a serious caveat, as I have done repeatedly in this House with respect to the BBC and the broadcasting authorities, about the manner in which it addresses these fundamental questions over which it has so much influence.

I suspect that unless we are determined in all parts of the House to ensure complete impartiality in these crucial arenas in the formulation of the culture of politics and democracy, we shall get into deep trouble. People will react against politics if there is not the necessary degree of impartiality. I also believe that we must give serious consideration to the manner in which we behave in Parliament. I do not just mean matters such as privacy that hit the headlines, but also the way in which we reform the House.

Two or three of our most interesting recent debates were on House of Lords reform, which produced an extraordinary result. It was a lesson in itself about the lack of navigation that we were able to bring to bear on that subject, for heaven's sake. I should have thought that it was an obvious matter, in concert with the views of the hon. Member for North Cornwall. The idea that we cannot have a second Chamber that is at least 80 per cent. elected is astonishing.

There is also the relative irrelevance of much of our Committee proceedings, where hon. Members are just babbling on, no one has the foggiest idea what about, and no one will ever look at the official record. It is a sort of game of chess that is being played between the civil servants and the party positions. Now is not the time to go into all that, but it is a problem.

I would also say, with respect to young people, that there is also the matter of the "celeb culture" and all that goes with it: the role models, what is considered to be important, the lack of discrimination, and the fact that young people are asked to form comparisons between politicians and celebrities. Celebrities may, of course, be very nice people. I often find that some of the people who have legendary mythologies built up around them are decent people when you get to know them, and some, such as Bob Geldof, whom I happen to know well, do an enormous amount of good.

However, young people will gain respect for politics and politicians only if they are given an understanding of their relevance to their lives. We are here to serve them, and I hope that we do the best that we can, but the turnout of young people will be reflected in the extent to which they have a respect for the institutions. That, perhaps, is why I am a Conservative, because I believe strongly in those things. I am not saying that other parties do not, but the Conservatives have, historically, put emphasis on that.

I believe that the problem is much more than a matter of systems. However, I must draw attention to the very mixed results that emerged from the pilot schemes. I assume that most people in this country are of more or less the same kind, whichever part of the country they come from, and that there is no obvious discrimination to be made between one constituency and another. I was therefore intrigued that the results for postal balloting were so mixed. Postal balloting is a simple thing—one either votes with a postal ballot or one does not. It is not dependent on whether people have new technology available to them—a point that the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) was right to raise.

A House of Commons research paper shows that turnout in South Tyneside almost doubled, from 24.2 per cent. in 1998 to 55.3 per cent. in 2002. Why should the people of South Tyneside double their response when they have a postal vote available to them? There were similar increases in Stevenage, from 25.5 to 52.9 per cent., and in Chorley, from 31.3 to 61.5 per cent. In Greenwich, however, it decreased from 32.5 to 31.9 per cent. That may not be a large decrease, but it is an interesting comparison with the others. There was also a decrease in Hackney.

I am loth to make any assumptions about those mixed results, or about other areas such as electronic/internet voting. In Crewe and Nantwich, where the website system was used, the turnout increased from 18 per cent. in 1998 to 31.4 per cent. in 2002. Perhaps more people are using websites in that area, but that trend may not be reflected in other parts of the country.

There is a mixed pattern resulting from the pilot schemes, so I am not convinced that, with the current low turnouts, we should be paying an undue amount of attention to the systems. I am convinced that the real problem is to do with the failure of democracy, or the increasing tendency for people to become disillusioned with what we are doing, which, after all, should not be seen as a separate function. It is part and parcel of their lives and affects them. The democratic deficit reflected in the low turnout in European elections—I shall mention Europe once, then not again—is another feature of centralisation.

The same problem increasingly applies to domestic politics, as more and more legislation is sucked and absorbed into a remote system that is so complicated in its institutional arrangements, which I deplore, that it is impossible even for Members of Parliament to understand the interaction between European and domestic legislation. I personally believe that that contributes to low turnout. People simply do not know who is taking decisions and how they are arrived at. The democratic deficit, with the European constitution, will cause an absolute nightmare and be a great danger in the future. The contrast between the attitude of France and Germany to the monumental problem with the Iraq war on one hand and the Prime Minister's advocacy of a common foreign and security policy on the other is enough to make anyone wonder whether they should turn out to vote. That is part of a much deeper problem.

The media, and interviewers, as I said in the previous debate, have a huge responsibility. I am not sure whether I want to use the word "blame", but it is sometimes necessary. We are now getting to a position in which, as the hon. Member for Gedling said, the media are not necessarily seen as the enemy. Sometimes, however, they are. I can be quite blunt about that. I have been on the receiving end of the media myself. Sometimes I do not mind if they want to do this, that or the other. I have had some extremely satisfactory and helpful debates, discussions and interviews with some important interviewers during the past 20 years. That has been pretty tough stuff, but I do not mind that. However, I am concerned by something that, I think, impacts on interest in the political system. People hear great interviews and real debates on such programmes as "Today" and "Question Time", and perhaps forget that the people involved, however good, important and skilled, are not elected. They are not people's representatives.

A distortion is taking place in the public mind, perhaps especially among young people—a failure to discriminate between what is really important to the law-making and policy-making processes in the national forum of Parliament and debate that takes place between unelected people. That is not a game; it is serious and influential debate, but the people involved do not have to take the same responsibility. John Humphrys wrote a piece in The Sunday Times recently in which he said that he can fill a village hall, whereas Members of Parliament holding public meetings get no response at all. I wrote a letter to The Sunday Times and ticked him off, saying, "Just get this right, John Humphrys. You are not an elected politician—just try to keep a sense of responsibility about this". I think that he is an extremely good interviewer and I have no doubt that he works very hard, but the problem is serious.

Now, politics is being taken on to radio, such as Radio One. Many, although by no means all, radio programmes on it are pure rubbish. There is no informed opinion there, just babble. The people who listen to that could be strongly influenced, especially young people who listen to pop programmes and come away believing that the people on those are important and so, perhaps by definition, politicians are not. I feel that we have a huge social and political problem here, and I am deeply worried by the way in which the disconnection from young people is escalating.

I also refer to the difficulties that arise from the growth of the far right; there is no far left these days. That growth comes from the centre right's lack of engagement in some of the serious problems of our time. The disillusionment and cynicism about asylum and immigration has been exacerbated by some Government policies, and that will be an increasing problem. In Stoke-on-Trent, which is near my constituency, there is a serious British National party problem. The Labour Members who represent constituencies there are aware of it. That problem exists not just in that area but elsewhere, and has a bearing on turnout. I shall not give the figures for Stoke-on-Trent, but turnout levels are a contributory factor to the increase in votes for the far right. It is far right parties that are often thought to have the passion and conviction; it is they who get out there and dish it out to the people. They play on people's apprehensions and concerns.

In some constituencies, Members of Parliament—I do not criticise those concerned—do not give the impression that they are that activated or bothered by the issues; they seem to be going through the motions. I feel passionately about politics, whether the issue is third-world debt, Europe or constitutional matters. The apathy among voters is a reflection of the lack of interest in the great issues that is shown by their representatives, who are over-controlled by the Whip system. That diminishes their confidence and determination to get up and speak for their constituents.

In my constituency in the previous election, my majority nearly doubled if for no other reason than because my constituents had a pretty clear idea about where I stood. Anyone who read my election address would know that there was no doubt about it. We need more direct discussion in Parliament, and far less finessing. There does not have to be sheer confrontation, but there has to be direct discussion. Then people will see the relevance to their lives of what we are doing. In my opinion, that is what this is all about.

I have found this debate fascinating, and I would like to say how much I have enjoyed listening to all hon. Members' speeches. I hope that we have all learned something from it; I have.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It might be helpful if I point out that if the Minister is to have an adequate opportunity to respond, she should be called no later than 5.15 pm.

5.8 pm

Martin Linton (Battersea): I value this opportunity to make a short contribution to the debate. I first became interested in the matter when I was a member of the

[Martin Linton]

Select Committee on Home Affairs in the previous Parliament, and we wrote a report on electoral law and administration. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) may have been on the Committee; I do not remember. We suggested many changes, including the rolling register and postal voting on demand, which were later taken up and are now in force, but we had no illusion that they would make a huge difference. We were advised that any changes like that would make, at most, a 5 per cent. difference in turnout, and I thought that even that was an exaggeration. Indeed, since the report came out and those changes were incorporated into the Representation of the People Act 2000, turnout in parliamentary, European and local elections has fallen, so clearly there cannot have been any dramatic effect.

The fact that turnout went down after the changes came in does not prove a case of cause and effect; indeed, it may be possible that the changes have helped to increase the turnout, but that other factors have had a greater effect in reducing it. That is probably what has happened. We made the changes not because of the effect they would have on turnout, but because they were worth making in themselves.

I am sorry that some of the other changes that we proposed were not made at the same time—weekend voting is one of them. I think weekend voting is well worth pursuing. I got a slight hint from Opposition Members that they may be worried that, because so many of their voters have second homes that they go to at weekends, this might have a disproportionate partisan effect on their vote. They need not worry about this. In the previous debate, I quoted figures from Sweden where 40 per cent of the population have second homes. The country is made of islands and lakes, and many people have little cottages that they go to at the weekend. They have always had Sunday elections, and nobody has ever suggested that they have a disproportionate effect on one party or another.

Weekend voting has to be accompanied by sensible measures for early voting and postal voting. We now have postal voting on demand, but that involves applying at least a week in advance; there could be a far easier system than that. In Sweden, people can vote at any post office in any town in the country, up to and including polling day itself. There are main post offices in all major cities that take votes up until about 2 pm in most cities—up until 5 pm in Stockholm—and then convey them to the relevant local polling station. It is just as if people voted at their local polling station. As long as there are sensible provisions, people who are called away on business, or who decide to go away for the weekend, will still able to vote.

There are many more things that could be done—for example computer-linked registers. One of the main problems is that people have to vote in their own polling station and that is often inconvenient. In this day and age, when all electoral registers can be linked to a central register, there is no reason why people could not be allowed to vote anywhere, even within their own constituency. Many people go to different polling stations, only to be told that they cannot vote there. It is a simple process to allow them to vote at a different polling station.

Overnight re-registration is another matter. We are now able to re-register in a maximum of six weeks, but there is no reason why it should take anything like as long as that. In some countries people can go to their local tax office, sit down in front of a computer and type in their new address. The following morning not only their voter registration but their tax address and address for all public purposes will be changed on the computer system, and they need do no more. We should compare that with the difficulty of registering a change of address in this country.

Postal ballots could be sent to every elector. The one change in the Representation of the People Acts that made a substantial difference was all-postal ballots. That resulted in an increase of 30 to 60 per cent. in the turnout at Chorley and Gateshead. That was not consistent everywhere, but it was clearly a substantial increase, and how much better it would be if we could send out as a matter of course a ballot paper to every voter, which they could take either to their local polling station or to another polling station, or send in if they so decided. We would thus have those dramatic benefits from all-postal ballots reproduced countrywide.

We must not start a pilot project on everything—if something is worth doing in one area, it is worth doing everywhere. It is worth having a pilot only when there are alternatives available. Most pilots do not give the answer to the question that was asked, because that is one of many factors that the pilot is never going to identify unless it is done on a massive scale; and if one is going to do that, one might as well do it countrywide anyway.

The Minister talked about the practical difficulties of having Sunday as the start of weekend voting in the European elections in 2004. This is an ideal opportunity because legislation already allows every European country to choose any day from the Thursday to the Sunday on which to hold its European election. It is a good idea to hold several elections on the same day; many countries do so as a matter of course. Some have general, regional, local and even Church elections on the same day and that leads to a much higher turnout.

Why not use the latitude that we shall have in 2004 to introduce the first serious weekend voting experiment for a long time? Holding elections on a Sunday will allow many more people to vote. I know that that will create difficulties in the Western Isles and elsewhere, but our idea that we should hold all our elections on a busy working day is crazy. There is no doubt that thousands, if not tens of thousands, of people who could not otherwise vote will be able to do so at the weekend. The test as to whether it is worth doing is not whether it will increase turnout but whether it will help people who cannot vote to do so. We do not need to put all the reforms to some sort of utilitarian test because, however many pilots we run, we shall never be able to prove what the effect is on turnout. We must follow our instincts, and if we think that the reforms are worth making we must introduce them.

5.16 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Yvette Cooper): We have had an excellent debate, encompassing some interesting and thoughtful contributions.

Many hon. Members made the point that addressing the mechanical, practical issues that are involved in changing the way we vote does not address the underlying problem of whether people want to vote or the fact that increasing numbers of people do not vote. They are right: we should not use changing the practicalities as an excuse not to address the fundamental problem for which we must take responsibility as politicians and as political parties—the growing number of people who are disaffected, who actively choose not to vote, or who do not see enough purpose in voting. Equally, the reverse is true. The fact that there are deeper issues involved should not be used to justify ignoring practical changes that might make life easier or that might increase the number of people who find it more convenient to vote and therefore do so.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) made some important points about disenchantment. He described the attitudes of people who vote for "Big Brother". It is easy to do that—it involves sitting on a sofa and pressing the red button on the Sky remote control. To vote for "Fame Academy", one has only to pick up the phone—until the last minute, when one cannot get through at all. In some cases, one can vote early and often. There are all sorts of lessons there, I fear, about the ways in which people vote.

My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) raised some important points about people's attitudes towards community and civic duty. They are complex issues and we should recognise the changes that there have been in society. We must also ensure that that does not become an excuse not to address practical changes that can be made in the short term.

Let us consider the pilots that many hon. Members have quoted. In Preston, 16 per cent. more of the electorate voted in the all-postal ballot than did under the traditional system, according to the Electoral Commission review. In Trafford, 20 per cent. more of the electorate voted in the postal vote than in the vote using the traditional system. It is still the case, however, that in the ballot in Preston, 60 per cent. of the electorate did not vote in the local elections, and in Trafford 47 per cent. of the electorate did not vote, so there are clearly a huge number of wider issues. Those margins of about 16 and 20 per cent. are sufficiently large for us to take them seriously and to respond to the pilots. The worst possible defence of the status quo is to say that, because there are bigger issues, we cannot address some of the narrower questions to which solutions might be found. Just as I would never support using the voting system as an excuse for not addressing the wider issues, I would never say that, because of the wider issues, we should not make some practical changes to the system.

There are two important reasons for making changes. First, some of the evidence from the postal vote ballots suggests that making voting more convenient for some groups of voters makes a difference to whether their voices are heard and registered in our democracy. Secondly, as my hon. Friends the Members for Battersea (Martin Linton) and for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) made clear, if we can make it easier for people to vote, we should. All other things being equal, it is better if voting is more convenient. My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test gave an amusing account of the way in which we vote and said how different certain aspects of voting are from ordinary life—for example, the horse boxes and little stubby pencils, although one can buy the little stubby pencils in IKEA, so perhaps they would catch on as part of a more modern system.

Hon. Members have referred to many issues in connection with the pilots and the evidence that they provide. I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea that one cannot wait for pilots to show everything—pilotitis, as he described it—but we need pilots in such areas because no one should tamper lightly with the mechanisms of democracy. It would be a disaster to change the way in which we vote, if it turned out, for example, that the whole system fell apart or the method of counting the votes did not work. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) was right to say that a mistake in implementing a pilot or a problem with a new voting mechanism could undermine it for the long term. Those practical issues matter. The purpose of the pilot programmes is to establish credibility and legitimacy, to test practical issues and to ensure that we do not introduce problems of fraud.

There is no evidence to support weekend voting. I agree that there is a case for following our noses and trying things out on a larger scale, but the e-voting pilots did not show any substantial impact on turnout. My suspicion is that the e-voting and text-voting pilots will make an impact not in the next election but 10 years down the line. If we do not explore different methods of voting, including electronic voting, now,—especially as there are so many complex issues relating to the technology and security of such systems—we shall find ourselves looking a little bit ridiculous in 10 years' time, because increasingly so much of our lives takes place through electronic means.

My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree made powerful points about inequality and who votes. That must be uppermost in our minds when we consider any changes to voting mechanisms. My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test made some important points about voting habits. The Electoral Commission did some research after the 2001 election into why people did not vote. That involved discussions with focus groups of people who had not voted. They were asked why they had not voted: some said that they did not know enough about it, that they did not feel confident enough to vote, or that they did not know enough about what they were voting for. I doubt whether those young people knew less than young people 30 years ago. However, there may have been a change in people's expectations of what they should know—and what they want to know—before they feel confident about making their choices, in the same way that, as consumers, they can decide what kind of car they want to buy.

I would not underestimate the long-term effect of issues relating to citizenship and education in schools, to which the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) referred. He is right to say that the credibility of such things depends on their being non-partisan. People should be given information about our political institutions, where they are, how one has a say in them, and the role of the people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Vernon Coaker) was also right: this is not simply about voting, but about participation in a wider sense. People no longer think it is enough to have one encounter with the politician—one vote—every few years. We should be considering other, broader, ways to empower people.

There are broader issues relating to people's engagement with their communities and local institutions. The issue is not simply one of engaging with Parliament; it is about engaging with other community institutions and civic participation. Those who participate in other institutions are more likely to vote. A lot of work has been done on how to reinvest and re-establish communities and how to give people greater involvement and participation in them.

Many initiatives have not been effective, but the sure start programme is. It focuses on the point in people's lives—when they have small children—at which they are suddenly faced with a big change and want to know who else is in their community. They want to be a part of the community, they want to engage with it and they are suddenly very keen to become involved in local organisations and institutions. That may be a counter-argument to some of the points made by my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Southampton, Test. He said that such habits start early in life and are never kicked—people either start voting or they do not. However, people can change at different points in their life cycle. Fundamental life changes can have a huge impact on people's participation in things, which can also be a way of engaging people with voting.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam mentioned the decline in deference and the sense of duty. He is right. We should not romanticise traditional communities. In many ways, it is a good thing that there has been a decline in deference. It is also true that people will no longer vote out of a sense of duty or deference. We must give them something else to vote for—other reasons to vote. That reflects many of the points made by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire. He spoke about the importance of the roles played by politicians and political parties. So much of the process of allowing people to engage more effectively with our democracy comes down to politicians and political parties becoming the vehicles of democracy. We cannot ignore or walk away from that fact. It is right that we should recognise that we are responsible for doing that. That does not mean that hon. Members have easy answers about how to do that. We will conduct much of the debate about that within our political parties, rather than in forums such as this. There are many changes that we could make in Parliament by considering other voting systems.

There is much work still to do. Decisions on many of the issues surrounding the 2004 elections and weekend voting have not taken place within Government. The debate has been helpful in contributing to those decisions, and I welcome the contributions of hon. Members this afternoon.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Five o'clock.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Business Tenancies Regulatory Reform Order

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): On 22 July 2002, we laid before Parliament a draft Regulatory Reform Order to reform the workings of Part 2 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954. The Act provides a framework for the renewal and termination of business tenancies, and the aim of our reforms was to make the process quicker, easier, fairer and cheaper.

The Order has undergone its first stage of Parliamentary scrutiny, and the House of Lords Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee and the House of Commons Regulatory Reform Committee published reports shortly before Christmas. I am grateful to the Committees for their thorough examination of our proposed amendments. I welcome their support for the bulk of our proposals to reform this complex and highly technical legislation.

The Committees had some reservations on our proposals to change the way in which landlords and tenants may agree to contract a business lease without the normal statutory rights of security of tenure. The Regulatory Reform Committee made specific recommendations to enhance the protection for tenants. However, the Committee on Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform had more fundamental concerns at the lack of evidence about the degree of protection that the courts provide, and hence whether our proposals to abolish the requirement for a joint application to the courts would remove necessary protection from business tenants.

We acknowledge that while there is considerable anecdotal evidence, there is a lack of definitive statistical evidence about the outcome of applications to the court for approval of agreements to exclude security of tenure. We therefore propose to carry out research to indicate the outcome of recent applications to the court for approval to exclude security of tenure. The research will study the proportion of applications rejected and the reasons for rejection. We will also undertake some further consultation of organisations representing small businesses.

We propose to present the research findings and the outcome of the further consultation to the Committees. Subject to the outcome of the research and consultation and the views of the Committees, we would then lay for second stage scrutiny an amended draft Order incorporating the amendments suggested by the Regulatory Reform Committee and slightly modified in certain other detailed respects.

Supporting People Budget

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): The Supporting People Programme aims to improve the quality of life of vulnerable people by supporting them to live independently in the community. It begins on 1 April. I am pleased to tell the House today that total provisional annual amounts of Supporting People Grant for England, based on estimates submitted by Authorities on 13, 16, and 17 December and other relevant information, for 2003–4, is 1.4 billion. I shall be writing further to Local Authorities to set out in detail their guidance.

The programme is now providing supported housing in the form of at least five hundred and thirty thousand household units for older people, mainly in sheltered services, forty five thousand household units for people with learning difficulties or mental health problems, four thousand household units to support the rehabilitation of ex-offenders, three thousand household units for women fleeing domestic violence and seventy five thousand household units for people who were homeless or from other vulnerable client groups, as well as a considerable and growing amount of non-accommodation based "floating" support (including community alarms and Home Improvement Agency (HIA) service) (around 410 thousand households in all). This is a major investment in some of the most vulnerable and disadvantaged members of society, with the clear objective of helping them to become, or remain, full participants in their local communities. The programme's aim is to prevent crises such as hospitalisation, institutional care or homelessness, by providing early support when it is most effective.

For the last three years the Government has been working with local authorities, providers, and other partners to prepare for this programme. Our overriding priority has been to make sure that people receiving services see no interruption to their services on 1 April. Equally those people receiving transitional housing benefit at the point of transfer must see their services continued during the transitional period on the same basis and cost to themselves as before. This has been done by work to accurately capture the current cost and nature of services in order to transfer these to new interim contracts on 1 April

The new Supporting People programme will be delivered under the Local Government Act 2000 section 93. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will therefore administer the programme under the normal arrangement of a cash limited budget using, in the future, an allocation formula on which there has been recent consultation.

Initial grant allocations are for six months since there remains work to be done to ensure that the estimates provided in December are accurate and fully evidenced. Final, fully verified, figures as at 31 March are required from local authorities by 30 September to confirm grant amounts. At that point any over or underestimates will be adjusted for.

We are also conscious that there are services in the pipeline, which are currently incurring capital spend, and which will require revenue finding once the buildings are completed. We have therefore made a provisional allocation for some of these, subject to confirmation of progress. We have made an allowance for expected savings due to declining obligations in respect of transitionally protected clients and the impact of early reviews. We are aware that authorities are entering into interim contracts in order to manage the process of transition, and are about to conduct reviews with a view to longer-term contracts. We will ensure that the allocations meet the validated contractual commitments authorities are obliged to put in place to meet their legal requirements and to manage the Supporting People programme on a stable basis up to Spending Review 2004 (covers 2005–6 onwards). We intend, by 1 April at the latest, to publish both further guidance on this and ground rules on how authorities can commit to longer term contracts, and how this fits with the Spending Review timetable at a national level. At this point, however, in the absence of the detailed figures from the final reconciliation, it would be inappropriate to set out definite figures for years two and three. Grant conditions are also for six months, allowing us to monitor progress of the new programme and make any small adjustment in year should these be necessary to allow the proper management of the programme.

It is now time for local authorities, providers, and their partners in health and probation to take ownership of this programme,. Every service must undergo a review during the first three years of the programme. This review is aimed at improving the quality of service, assessing its strategic relevance, and challenging its value for money.

The review process at the local level must be rigorous and disciplined to ensure that the services purchased through Supporting People are necessary, give good value for money, and are on a stable and appropriate contractual basis. Local authorities who do not carry out proper reviews or who provide insubstantial evidence of the benefits and strategic relevance of services cannot expect to receive continued levels of funding in future. We will also be looking carefully at the impact of the draft allocations formula, about which we are consulting at present.

This programme offers an exciting new opportunity to local authorities and their partners to develop local partnerships to meet effectively the needs of their local people, using innovative new models of preventive services. We look forward to the development and sharing of positive practice in achieving the targets of social inclusion of vulnerable groups in their local communities.

Regional Assemblies

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): In the White Paper Your Region, Your Choice: Revitalising the English Regions (Cm 5511) the Government invited views by the end of August 2002 on the question of how prescriptive we should be about the involvement of stakeholders in elected regional assemblies in England. In particular, the White Paper asked whether any requirements or principles should be specified and, if so, whether this should be done through legislation, guidance, or some other means.

By November 2002, 207 responses had been received on the involvement of stakeholders, of which most expressed views ranging more widely than these questions. The Government has today published an analysis of the responses received on my Office's website at http://www.odpm.gov.uk/, and I am placing a copy of this document in the House Library.

As we stated in the White Paper (paragraph 7.8), the Government is very keen that key regional stakeholders and their representatives should be involved within the structure of an elected assembly. I am therefore pleased to be able to announce today our proposed policy framework for the involvement of stakeholders in the work of elected regional assemblies. This framework will form the basis of the statutory provisions on stakeholder involvement in the legislation we intend to bring forward to establish elected regional assemblies when Parliamentary time allows and after at least one region has voted for an elected assembly in a referendum.

The Government wants to strike a balance between safeguarding the meaningful involvement of stakeholders in all relevant aspects of an elected assembly's work and allowing for regional flexibility to reflect regional priorities and build on existing working relationships. We also want to ensure that a wide diversity of regional stakeholders can be engaged. We therefore intend to make the following requirements and restrictions clear in the legislation:

> Each elected regional assembly will be required to actively engage stakeholders in the development and implementation of both the assembly's overall strategic vision for the region and the various specific regional strategies for which it is responsible.
> Each assembly should publish and make accessible an annual 'state of the region' report in a way which facilitates scrutiny and debate in the region.
> Only those elected may be full members of an assembly and thus eligible to sit on an assembly's executive.

In order to enable assemblies to fulfil these requirements, the Government intends to provide in the legislation for a non-prescriptive approach to additional forms of stakeholder involvement which assemblies may wish to adopt. This would give assemblies discretion to:

> involve all of the stakeholders they consider appropriate—with particular emphasis on ensuring that business, local government, the voluntary sector, and community groups are properly involved;
> co-opt stakeholders to serve on scrutiny committees, with the same rights and duties as elected members, including voting rights—although elected members should be in the majority and chair scrutiny committees;
> co-opt stakeholders to serve on policy development committees, appoint particular stakeholders to act as policy advisers in specific cases, or involve stakeholder groups in the preparation of specific strategies;
> establish a regional partnership forum to bring stakeholder organisations together; > establish consultative groups with specific sectors or on specific issues to facilitate consultation and/or the provision of advice; and > spend money to support the involvement of stakeholders in assemblies' work through these or any other reasonable means, and to develop stakeholders' capacity to participate.

We envisage that this legislative framework would need to be supplemented by statutory guidance in order to safeguard the effective involvement of stakeholders while avoiding over-prescription. The Government will ensure that a draft of any such guidance is provided for consultation at the appropriate stage.

London Borough of Hackney

The Minister for Local Government and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): We announced on 31 January 2002 that the Government would provide the London Borough of Hackney with £25 million of financial support in 2002–03. This was part of a package of measures including stringent conditions, requiring improvements in the authority's performance and the restoration of its financial stability.

The £25 million support is an exceptional measure, provided to prevent unacceptable cuts in services. It is being given to enable Hackney to get their finances back in order on a long-term basis and deliver the frontline services the people of Hackney deserve. Without this support Hackney would have been unable to balance their budget this year and action to turn the authority around would have been still further delayed. I am pleased to say I am advised that, with our help, Hackney are expecting to balance the 2003–04 budget, and are making good progress in a number of other areas to build for the longer term.

I am today laying before this House a Special Grant Report, number 113, which seeks approval for providing Hackney with the £25 million to support its 2002–03 finances.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Energy

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): My statement to the House of 28 November set out the basis on which the Government was prepared to support the restructuring plan put forward by British Energy (BE) to address its financial difficulties.

The Government's main objectives, which remain the same today, were: to ensure the safety of the nuclear power stations and the security of electricity supplies to the grid and consumers. In any circumstances, BE's significant nuclear liabilities require safe and experienced management. Because the Government has a responsibility to ensure safety, we had to consider how this goal could be most effectively delivered while protecting the taxpayer's interest. The company's plan, on which the Government imposed tough conditions, was acceptable because it met these tests.

The Government was therefore prepared to play its part in this restructuring by providing financial support for BE's nuclear liabilities—underwriting BE's enhanced arrangements for decommissioning, and contributing significantly to the historic spent nuclear fuel liabilities. We also extended a credit facility of up to £650 million until 9 March.

On 28 November we identified 3 key outcomes that the company would have to achieve by mid-February if the restructuring package were to be successful:

> agreement from existing creditors to a temporary freeze on payments, and a write-down in the value of what they were owed; > agreement to sell its stake in Bruce Power in Canada; and > implementation of a new trading strategy.

The company has announced its progress in fulfilling these conditions and I am placing copies of the relevant announcements in the Library of the House:

> its creditors have agreed to a binding standstill and agreed in principle to a significant write-down in the value of what they are owed as part of this plan;
> the completion of the sale of its interests in Bruce Power in Canada; and > progress on the implementation of its new trading strategy.

The sale process for the company's stake in Amergen in the United States is also underway.

The company has also announced the appointment (with effect from 1 March) of a new Chief Executive, Michael Alexander, formerly Chief Operating Officer of Centrica, who has extensive experience in the energy sector.

On the basis of the company's announcements, I have confirmed that I intend to seek state aids approval from the European Commission for the restructuring plan. I have placed in the Library of the House a copy of the Government's announcement of 14 February to the Stock Exchange.

As I indicated in my statement on 28 November, the Government is prepared to continue to fund BE's operations while the restructuring plan is agreed and implemented. I have therefore indicated to the company that I am willing to extend their credit facility at a reduced level for a period after 9 March. The limit and duration of the facility will be decided and reported to the House in the light of the company's future requirements, and in order to protect taxpayers' interests as well as under state aid rules, will be the minimum necessary. I should like to re-emphasise that it is a temporary loan, and not a permanent grant. The company has received proceeds of £270 million from the sale of its stake in Bruce Power and will use this money to repay the majority of the current amount of the facility outstanding.

British Energy's announcement on 14 February is an important step forward in the implementation of its restructuring plan. But much remains to be done by the company, including effecting the sale of Amergen and securing binding agreements from its creditors to the restructuring.

It remains open to Government to withdraw the credit facility if the company does not continue to make progress in successfully delivering its restructuring plan. We shall therefore continue to be ready with contingency plans to fund the administration of the company. The Electricity (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill that helps with these contingency plans has been passed by the House of Commons and has now entered the House of Lords. As I said on 28 November, whatever happens, nuclear power stations will continue to generate electricity and will continue to employ staff. Pension entitlements will be met. Trade suppliers will be paid. Customers' lights will stay on.

Finally, I would like once again to express my thanks to the staff at British Energy for their vital contribution in maintaining electricity supplies and nuclear safety.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

UK Special Representative (Nepal)

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): I am delighted to announce the appointment of Sir Jeffrey James KBE CMG as the UK's Special Representative for Nepal from 24 February. The Government is committed to assisting Nepal and identifying ways to help resolve its problems, including putting an end to a conflict that has resulted in immense suffering for the Nepalese people. Sir Jeffrey's role will be to provide a strong focal point for UK policy towards Nepal and in particular to co-ordinate UK and international efforts in support of the recent ceasefire and the emerging peace process.

United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): Officials in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Ministry of Defence have completed all the necessary work to enable the Government to proceed to ratify the Optional Protocol to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict.

We intend to complete the ratification process with the United Nations as soon as possible. To begin the formal process, I have today laid before Parliament an Explanatory Memorandum which explains the steps taken to meet our commitment to the provisions of the Protocol.

In particular, since 1 September 2002 Army personnel under 18 are no longer routinely deployed on operations outside the United Kingdom, although they may continue to participate in purely humanitarian missions where no hostile forces are involved. Furthermore, all three Services now have procedures in place to ensure that, wherever it is feasible to do so without undermining operational effectiveness or the safety of personnel, under 18s are removed from their units when there is deemed to be a greater than low risk of direct involvement in hostilities.

Written Ministerial Statements

Tuesday 25 February 2003

HOME DEPARTMENT

Juvenile Reconviction Rates

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Hilary Benn): The Home Office is today publishing its second annual report on juvenile reconvictions. The report, prepared by Research, Development and Statistics Directorate, covers the reconvictions within one year of juvenile offenders dealt with between January and March 2001. The proportion reconvicted has been cut by 22.5 per cent. compared with 1997, and this exceeds the Public Service Agreement (PSA) target of a 5 per cent. reduction by 2004. I would like to congratulate the Youth Justice Board and the other services involved in youth justice for this excellent result. I am placing a copy of the report in the Library.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Duty of Care Regulations

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Michael Meacher): The Duty of Care Regulations 1991 have been amended to give waste collection authorities (WCAs) the power to serve notices on businesses, requiring them to furnish the WCA with their duty of care records. This will help WCA officers to check whether businesses are transferring their waste in accordance with the law. Businesses that do not have such arrangements could be prosecuted.

This measure should help to reduce the level of commercial and industrial waste that is fly tipped. It will also assist waste collection authorities in pursuing fly tipping offences as, in some circumstances, it will be possible for the fly tipped waste to be traced back to the originator of the waste.

The Environmental Protection (Duty of Care) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2003 came into force on 20 February.

Vulnerable Groups Consultation Paper

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): I have today issued a consultation paper "Reductions for vulnerable groups", which invites views from individuals and organisations on the Government's proposals for amending the protection offered to vulnerable metered water customers under the Water Industry (Charges) (Vulnerable Groups) Regulations 1999.

The current regulations offer assistance, in the form of a capped bill, to certain low-income households with water meters who need to use a great deal of water for essential household purposes. To qualify, a household must be in receipt of an income-related benefit, and contain either a large family, or a person who has special water needs because of a medical condition. The current definition of a large family is three or more children under the age of 16 years, while a medical condition is defined in the regulations. The cost of this tariff is borne by other customers.

The consultation paper discusses a range of options for amending the regulations to improve the protection of vulnerable households. The main recommendations are to extend assistance to include children up to the age of 18, instead of 16 as at present, and to extend the list of qualifying medical conditions.

The consultation will run for twelve weeks and will end on Friday 9 May. Following this we shall consider all the responses and will publish the Government's response to consultation along with a regulatory impact assessment. Any changes made to the regulations as a result of the consultation will come into effect on 1 April 2004.

Animal Movements

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): The Government are publishing today the emerging findings from the risk assessment and cost benefit analysis of animal movement standstills. The studies were commissioned in response to the recommendations made in July 2002 by the Lessons Learned and Royal Society Inquiries and have been carried out for Defra by Risk Solutions and the Veterinary Epidemiology and Economics Research Unit (VEERU) at the University of Reading.

On 23 January 2003, Official Report, columns 20–24WS, the Government announced the intention to reduce the standstill for cattle, sheep and goats to six days with effect from 4 March. A supporting document explaining that decision, and referring to the emerging findings from the Risk Solutions and VEERU studies, has already been placed in the Library and posted on the Defra website.

TREASURY

Cash Ratio Deposits Review

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): Cash Ratio Deposits (CRDs) are non-interest bearing assets deposited with the Bank of England by banks and building societies. They are used by the Bank to finance its unremunerated activities, in particular its efforts to secure price stability and the stability of the financial system in general, from which these institutions are key beneficiaries.

The CRD scheme was extended to include building societies, and was placed on a statutory basis, when the Bank of England Act became law in 1998. At the time the Government, in the Treasury's response to consultation (published on 20 April 1998) made a commitment to review the new scheme within five years of its application. The Treasury, working closely with the Bank, will begin that review today.

The review will include an assessment of the detailed arrangements of the scheme as well as the continuing suitability of the scheme itself compared to alternative sources of funding. It will also address the impact of the scheme on the eligible institutions. The review will conclude in May, and we will publish the broad conclusions in a statement to the House shortly afterwards.

Inheritance Tax

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The Inland Revenue's Extra Statutory Concession F7 allows exemption from inheritance tax for works of art when they are only chargeable under strict law because they have been brought temporarily to the United Kingdom for cleaning or restoration, or for loan to an exhibition. That reflects a longstanding judgement that the public interest would not be served if foreign owners of works of art were unwilling to send them to the United Kingdom for these purposes for fear of a potential inheritance tax charge.

Similar disincentives can arise, outside the terms of the existing Concession, when foreign-owned works of art are kept in the United Kingdom for these reasons when they would otherwise have been taken elsewhere. That could occur, for example, where a work is already in the United Kingdom when it is first acquired by a foreign buyer, and the new owner allows a period of loan to a public collection here before taking it to a permanent home abroad.

I have therefore agreed that the Concession should be extended to cover such circumstances.

The revised concession (added words in bold) is as follows: "Where a work of art normally kept overseas becomes liable to inheritance tax on the owner's death solely because it is physically situated in the United Kingdom at the relevant date, the liability will—by concession—be waived if the work was brought into the United Kingdom solely for public exhibition, cleaning or restoration. The liability will similarly be waived if a work of art which would otherwise have left the United Kingdom to be kept overseas is retained in the United Kingdom solely for those purposes. If the work of art is held by a discretionary trust (or is otherwise comprised in settled property in which there is no interest in possession), the charge to tax arising under Section 64 IHTA 1984 will, similarly, be waived."

Financial System (Major Operational Disruption)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): I am today publishing a Green Paper, The Financial System and Major Operational Disruption. Copies are available in the Vote Office and in the libraries of both Houses. The document is available online at the Treasury website: www.hm-treasury.gov.uk/. The 11 September attacks on the United States caused terrible loss of life and physical damage. They also showed the problems that physical disruption on such a scale brings for the financial system—as exemplified by the four-day closure of the New York Stock Exchange.

Financial services play a vital role in the UK economy. This makes it particularly important to be sure that we have good arrangements to maintain the financial system's resilience during major operational disruption. While the main responsibility lies with the financial sector itself, HM Treasury, the Bank of England and the Financial Services Authority are working together, and with the private sector, to help strengthen resilience.

This consultation asks if new statutory powers should be sought to assist in promoting order in the financial system in extreme circumstances of operational disruption. The Government are seeking views on whether such legislation would be justified by the nature and scale of the threat. The consultation also requests comments about additional ways in which the financial authorities could usefully assist the private sector's work in making financial markets more resilient.

The consultation closes on 25 April. If the Government considers it appropriate to seek legislation, further consultation would follow.

Self-Assessment Returns

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I can today publish figures for the number of Self-Assessment returns filed by the 2003 January deadline.

The Inland Revenue has met its SDA target of 90.5 per cent. of SA taxpayers filing their 2001/02 tax return on time. The Department achieved 90.54 per cent.:

> 8,371,251—returns were received, out of 9,246,131 issued
> The number of returns filed electronically rose significantly. At 31st January 2003, around 700,000 had been received electronically. 325,000 of these were received from Internet filers, compared with around 75,000 in the same period last year. The remainder were received from agents using the Electronic Lodgement Service (ELS).

Activities that helped the department to meet the target were:

> an extensive media campaign, involving TV, radio and newspaper ads > front-line staff reminding people about the deadline in day-to-day contact with customers > phoning a quarter of a million (mainly new-to-SA) customers to remind them about the deadline, and offer help.
> a News Release in the run-up to the deadline, emphasising the message about late filing penalties, and interest and tax surcharges for late payment
> publicity on the Internet, promoting the Department's electronic services > sending two mailshots to 1.4 million self employed customers on the back of an existing national insurance letter raising awareness amongst agents with publicity in the Department's Tax Bulletin publication > using the Department's network of Local Radio Broadcasters to publicise the deadline message

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Business Rates

The Minister for Local Government and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I have today laid in Parliament new clauses by way of an amendment to the Local Government Bill which will provide for local authorities to retain some or all of growth in business rate revenues.

These proposals will allow us to introduce a scheme, along the lines the Chancellor announced in his 2002 Pre-Budget Report. The scheme will increase the incentives for business and local authorities to work in partnership to maximise local economic growth and regeneration while at the same time generating additional resources to address local priorities.

Any scheme introduced will generate additional revenues from increases in the tax base generated by local authorities successfully encouraging growth, and not from increasing the tax on existing business. The money raised would be genuinely additional to local authorities and they will be free to decide how to spend it.

The scheme will only allow local authorities to keep revenues associated with any growth in the business rate tax base and will not replace the current business rate pooling system. The business rate pool acts to reduce the unfairness of business rates and ensure that revenues are distributed in a more equitable way.

It is not the Government's intention that the new scheme should only serve to reward authorities that are already doing well at the expense of declining areas. We are looking at a range of options to get the best distributional fit, with each local authority receiving an incentive that is relevant to them, whilst keeping the scheme as simple as practical.

We have also been clear that local authorities will not bear the downside risk of a declining business rate tax base. We are considering options that will allow local authorities to benefit from the scheme, even though they are in a situation of economic decline, should they manage to slow the pace of decline.

We will be consulting on the options, including the distributional consequences, in the summer

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cyprus

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): The Government's aim remains a comprehensive settlement in time for a reunited Cyprus to accede to the European Union on 16 April. For this to happen, the UN has set 28 February as the deadline for a decision on the Secretary-General's proposals. On Sunday 23 February Kofi Annan put forward ideas to the two sides on how he might revise his 10 December proposals, and is consulting the governments in Ankara and Athens before his historic visit to Nicosia tomorrow. President-elect, Mr. Tassos Papadopoulos, has made clear that the change of government underway in Cyprus will not impede the UN timetable. The UK has supported the UN throughout this process, and has welcomed the balanced and comprehensive settlement proposals tabled by the Secretary-General. We urge both sides now to secure a settlement.

During the intensive negotiations which followed the Copenhagen European Council, it became clear that the issue of territorial readjustment was a key one, needing to be resolved if there was to be a settlement. In particular, it became clear that both sides attached great importance to adjustments which represented a relatively small percentage of the area of Cyprus. The Government therefore gave urgent consideration to whether it could in some way help to bridge the remaining gap. A decision was reached to inform the UN Secretary-General that Britain would be prepared to cede part of the UK's Sovereign Base Areas and this offer has now been included in the UN Secretary-General's ideas of 23 February.

The offer consists of 45 square miles just under half of the total area of the SBAs. This makes up 1.2 per cent. of the area of the new state of affairs in Cyprus. The areas involved would bring a number of Cypriots living near Limassol, and in the Dhekelia Sovereign Base Area, within the administration of their respective constituent state. It will also open up areas of coastline for possible development. The areas involved do not contain military infrastructure, and this offer will not have any adverse impact on the functioning of the SBAs. The offer would only become valid if there were agreement by both sides to the UN's proposals. And, of course, legislation would be introduced to bring the transfer of territory into operation. In the event that either side in Cyprus rejects the proposals, or the proposals are rejected in a referendum by either side, the offer, along with the rest of the UN proposals, will become null and void.

We urge both sides not to let this historic opportunity to heal the division of Cyprus slip away; and to go the last mile to conclude negotiations and secure the settlement.

HEALTH

Medical Careers

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I have today placed in the Library copies of "Modernising Medical Careers" the response of the four UK Health Ministers to the consultation on "Unfinished Business: Proposals for Reform of the Senior House Officer grade"

The document sets out the results of our consultation which began last summer on the reform of training for senior house officers, who are doctors in the early stages of their specialist training. We received over 250 responses to our consultation and our proposals were broadly welcomed. The document we are publishing today sets the way ahead based on the results of the consultation and work which has been done since with the key stakeholders.

Plans for reform will also extend to general practice training and will embrace the existing non-consultant career grades with easier routes back into training.

Partnerships will work to test these out in a variety of NHS environments. Pilot projects will start later on this year and with major implementation following in 2004.

TRANSPORT

Railway Safety

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. John Spellar): I am pleased to announce that today the Government has published its report on the management of the accidental obstruction of the railway by road vehicles. The report has been produced in response to the 19 separate recommendations made by the Health and Safety Commission[1] and Highways Agency[2] reports published in February last year.

The report sets out the work of representatives of the highway authorities, railway infrastructure authorities and other organisations to identify the steps we consider should be taken jointly by railway infrastructure authorities and highway authorities to manage the risk of the accidental incursion of road vehicles onto the railway. It includes a protocol for apportioning responsibility and costs of mitigation measures. Also, following the adoption of an initial risk prioritisation framework a second stage assessment process has been produced for sites where the risk of a road vehicle accidentally getting onto the railway is not clear cut. Good practice guidance measures have been identified to help mitigate risk at specific sites. British Transport Police have agreed to collect the data about such incidents on a common basis. In order to update the standards for safety barriers on major roads in a clear and open procedure, the Highways Agency has let a contract and set up a technical project board to steer the update of standards for safety barriers on major roads in a clear and open procedure.

Copies of the report will be sent to all local highway authorities and railway infrastructure authorities. Copies will be placed in the Library of the House. Details will be made available on the Department for Transport's website at http://www.roads.dft.gov.uk/roadnetwork/bridgesites/index.htm

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Historic Environment

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I would like to update the House on the progress made on implementing the recommendations contained in the Government's statement on the historic environment: A Force for Our Future during the past six months.

Since August 2002 the following has been achieved:

August
English Heritage completed its programme of establishing a Historic Environment Forum in each of the Regions.

October
HM Treasury confirmed that the Listed Places of Worship grant scheme would continue until the review of the European Union VAT regime had been completed.The Government formally acceded to the 1970 UNESCO Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property.

November
English Heritage launched the first State of the Historic Environment Report, which set out a framework for establishing indicators to measure the contribution the historic environment makes to the economy, education and communities.

I announced a review of current heritage protection legislation. This will also cover the ecclesiastical exemption and consider a range of options for enhancing Sites and Monuments Records.

The Historic Houses Association (HHA) and the Black Environment Network (BEN) announced a joint scheme to identify new audiences for the historic environment by encouraging ethnic communities to become more involved with nearby historic attractions. Local community leaders will be invited to work with selected properties to extend involvement and enjoyment of these attractions within ethnic communities. Five pilot projects will be in place by Spring 2003. They will be closely monitored and evaluated with a view to extending the programme in 2004.

December
The Dealing in Cultural Objects (Offences) Bill was introduced into Parliament. The Bill will make it a criminal offence to trade in illegally removed cultural goods.

The Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill was introduced into Parliament. It will take forward a number of commitments arising from the Planning Statement Sustainable Communities: Delivering through planning.

Heritage Link was officially launched. It will be co-funded by English

Heritage and The National Trust. Priority areas for action in 2003 are: the needs and potential of the voluntary sector; funding; inclusion; and land-use planning.

National Archaeology Days 2002, organised by the Council for British Archaeology, achieved a 5 per cent. increase in participating venues to 62, and a 66 per cent. increase in estimated visitors to 90,000.

January 2003

The National Trust launched "Untold Story", a pilot project involving National Trust properties in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. It will involve people in exploring and interpreting the significance of local properties through the medium of the performing arts.

The National Trust began work with Creative Partnerships in Cornwall to develop a number of projects involving artists, poets and writers workingwith local schoolchildren to develop ideas and activities inspired by National Trust properties in Cornwall.

February

Responsibility for underwater archaeology will be transferred to English Heritage shortly.Management Plans are now in place for all but five of the World Heritage Sites in England.

Management Plans for the Tower of London and the City of Bath are scheduled for completion by February and October 2003 respectively. Work on the Plans for Blenheim Palace and Westminster Palace and Abbey is ongoing, whilst work on Durham Cathedral and Castle will begin shortly.

Written Ministerial Statements

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Tourism

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): Following the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's review of Planning Policy Guidance note 21 on tourism, I am announcing today the publication of a consultation paper. This seeks views on a proposal to replace PPG21 with good practice guidance on planning for tourism. Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Local Government Association

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Today we published a protocol agreeing with the Local Government Association (LGA) a clear approach for engagement and intervention where council performance is unacceptable.

The approach set out in the protocol provides for the Government and LGA to discuss policy for the use of intervention powers, including how best to facilitate a role for the LGA in supporting local authorities.

It has been broadened in scope to encompass Government engagement with poorly performing local authorities on a voluntary basis. The protocol derives from a Framework for Partnership signed under the central local partnership in November 1997.

The protocol sets out the general principles that will underpin the engagement of central government with individual local authorities whose performance, including their capacity to improve, is categorised under the system of comprehensive performance assessment as poor or weak with little or no prospect for improvement.

It also applies to other circumstances where the Government take the view that an authority's performance in a particular service area is sufficiently poor to justify Government engagement or intervention.

The protocol also sets out general principles for the orderly resumption of service by local authorities following intervention.

Transport and Social Exclusion

The Minister for Social Exclusion and Deputy Minister for Women (Mrs. Barbara Roche): The Social Exclusion Unit has today published Making the Connections, its final report on Transport and Social Exclusion. Copies have been placed in the Library.

This report sets out a new strategy to help people on low incomes get to work and key services like jobs, schools and hospitals. The report includes a package of measures across government to improve transport links and to support people on low incomes and in deprived areas in reaching the services we all need.

The cornerstone of the report is a new commitment to accessibility planning, in which local transport authorities will lead a process of auditing and action to ensure accessibility—meaning that people can get where they need to go.

The report builds on existing Government initiatives to help improve accessibility, like the £123 million funding of the Rural and Urban Bus Challenges. It includes action right across central and local Government, for example:

> Better travel information in Jobcentre Plus offices to help broaden horizons for those seeking work
> £14 million to help fund new transport to college
> Transport to healthcare organised around the needs of the patient and supported by better information on travel options
> Better joint working between local authorities and Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships to reduce crime and fear of crime around public transport
> Revised planning guidance so new services are easier to reach

To help tackle higher rates of pedestrian deaths in deprived areas—a further issue highlighted in the report—Transport Ministers announced last November that £17 million of Government investment will go to the most deprived local authorities to help bring those rates down.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act (Northern Ireland)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Desmond Browne): During the making of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (Disapplication of Part IV for Northern Ireland Parties, etc) Order 2001 in February 2001, the Government gave an undertaking that they would review the need for the Order after two years. This stage has now been reached and I am therefore requesting views from interested parties as to whether the Order is still applicable to the funding of political parties in Northern Ireland. I shall be writing to the Northern Ireland political parties, the Northern Ireland Affairs Select Committee and the Electoral Commission.

The Order, made under section 70 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA), exempted the Northern Ireland political parties from the requirement to comply with part IV of the Act for four years. Part IV is intended to impose restrictions on the source of donations so as to prohibit foreign and anonymous donations to political parties.

The provisions of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act are based on the recommendations contained in the fifth report on Standards in Public Life, chaired by Lord Neill and published in 1998. The Neill Committee concluded that it would be unsafe to disclose the names of those who made donations to the Northern Ireland parties as this may result in their intimidation. It was also recommended that it would not be right to ban contributions from Ireland given its special role in Northern Ireland's political life, as set out in the Belfast Agreement.

The Government accepted the Neill Committee recommendations including those in respect of Northern Ireland. However, the consequence of this was that donations from countries other than Ireland could not be prohibited as there would be no way to prevent donations from other countries being routed through Ireland. It therefore became apparent that a ban on foreign funding could not be policed in Northern Ireland.

Once the review is concluded, I will, of course, report back to the House.

TRANSPORT

Thames Safety (Marchioness Sinking)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): On 20 August 1989 the passenger vessel Marchioness and the dredger Bowbelle collided on the Thames. The Marchioness sank and 51 people tragically lost their lives.

Ten years later the Deputy Prime Minister announced a wide ranging public inquiry into the current safety regime on the River Thames and the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the Marchioness. The public inquiry also considered whether there should be a formal investigation into the tragedy.

Following all the inquiries Lord Justice Clarke has made a total of 74 recommendations on Thames safety. Since November 2001 I have kept both Houses informed on progress on these through two reports placed in the Libraries at six monthly intervals.

I have placed a third update in the Libraries today. Much progress has, and continues to be made and this will therefore be the final report of its kind.

Since the inquiry:

> manning and training on passenger ships has been reviewed and guidance prepared on safety training for crew and support staff on passenger vessels;
> the Safety Management Code for domestic passenger ships has been introduced, and we believe this is supporting a more focussed safety culture in the industry;
> the London Coastguard now co-ordinates all Search and Rescue activities on the tidal River Thames, and the five RNLI lifeboats installed in January 2002 have proved their value by attending 679 incidents in their first 12 months;
> MCA continues to work with other Member States to ensure that the introduction of European standards for passenger ships on inland waterways does not compromise passenger safety in the UK;
> a Formal Safety Assessment, carried out since the introduction of many recommendations from the Thames Safety Inquiry and Marchioness Formal Investigation has shown that the overall level of safety on the River Thames falls within acceptable limits, judged against HSE criteria. Work is continuing to identify areas where additional safety measures could bring the most significant safety benefits. This work will be completed by the end of this year.
> recommendations in respect of alcohol are being implemented through the Railways and Transport Safety Bill which is currently before the House.

We believe that the safety measures put in place immediately after the Marchioness disaster and again more recently following the Thames safety inquiry and Marchioness formal investigation, substantially reduce the risk of a further tragedy and would significantly improve the response to such an incident. However, we continue to look for ways to improve safety on all passenger ships through education, proportionate regulation and enforcement.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

School Buildings

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): The quality of school buildings is central to the quality of pupils' education. High-quality buildings are an essential support for our educational vision of ambitious expectations, specialism and excellence, local collaboration, community involvement and high-quality teaching and learning. We are today publishing a consultative document, "Building Schools for the Future", to take forward a radical approach to improving the stock of school buildings. This document, which is being sent to all schools and other relevant bodies, shows how we aim to reform the way we allocate capital funding, design schools and procure school buildings. Our aim is to transform the conditions in which our secondary school children are educated, and to continue improving the quality of primary schools.

Over the last six years, schools and local education authorities have used increasing capital investment to tackle the backlog of repairs caused by decades of under-funding. Capital investment in this period has risen from less than £700 million to £3 billion. This money has been spread relatively evenly across schools and local education authorities. This has been right when most schools and all local education authorities had urgent repair needs, and they have done well in tackling the backlog. But understandably, investment until now has focused on repairs and maintenance, not on achieving systematic structural change. We believe that the most urgent of the backlog will soon have been addressed.

The increase in schools capital investment to over £5 billion in 2005–06, announced by the Chancellor last July, gives us the opportunity for a new approach which will aim to support a step change in standards. We can continue existing, successful capital programmes, such as those already available to all schools and local education authorities. But we can do more.

The Government commit themselves, in "Building schools for the future", to a programme of rebuilding and renewal to ensure that secondary education in every part of England has facilities of 21st-Century standard. The aim of this programme will be to deliver this goal successfully for every secondary school within 10 to 15 years from 2005–06, subject to future public spending decisions. We will also aim to provide substantial investment in primary school buildings.

The programme will be driven by standards—focused plans generated locally—by partnerships of local education authorities, schools, governors and the wider community. Proposals will be prioritised on the basis of agreed criteria, which could include educational standards, deprivation, condition of buildings, and readiness to deliver step change in provision.

We need to support local endeavour in the delivery of our aims. Therefore, we are planning a range of exemplar designs for primary and secondary schools as a basis for local decisions about renewal plans. We will consult widely to ensure that the interests of all stakeholders are addressed. We also want to reform the procurement process, to address capacity pressures at all levels and to bring innovation and efficiency into the construction of school buildings. We are working on the creation of a new national procurement body for this purpose. A balance of conventional and PFI funding will be used, where each is most appropriate.

We believe this educational vision and new approach to capital investment will benefit all. We aim to have school buildings that:

drive reform of the secondary system and improvements in educational standards; support teachers' teaching and pupils' learning;

are used by the community;

are well-designed, built on time and at a reasonable cost to the taxpayer, and properly maintained over their lives.

Copies of the launch document will be placed in the Library.

HEALTH

Food Standards Agency

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Hazel Blears): The Food Standards Agency's annual report and accounts 2001–02 was laid before Parliament today.

Copies have been placed in the Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prison Service

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): I have today laid before Parliament the report of the Prison Service Pay Review Body on the pay of governor and officer grades in the Northern Ireland Prison Service for 2003. Copies have been placed in the Library of both Houses.

Both the Secretary of State and I welcome the recognition in the report of the work of staff in the Northern Ireland Prison Service.

The Review Body has recommended a consolidated increase of 2.5 per cent. on existing rates of pay for the 12 month period commencing 1 April 2003 and an increase of 1.5 per cent. on allowances.

I have decided to accept the recommendations and implement the award in full.

TRANSPORT

Airports Consultation

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): Last summer the Government published a set of seven consultation papers on the Future Development of Air Transport in the United Kingdom.

On 26 November the High Court upheld a challenge against the exclusion of options for additional runways at Gatwick Airport. On 28 November I told the House, Official Report, columns 474–87, that I would not appeal against the judgment, because an appeal would result in an extensive period of uncertainty for people up and down the country. I therefore announced that I was keeping open the consultation, which had been due to end on 30 November, and that I would publish a further consultation paper including runway options at Gatwick.

I am today publishing the further consultation material. I have decided that it would be easier for consultees to publish it in the form of second editions of the full South East consultation paper, the summary South East paper and the questionnaires for both the South East and other areas of the UK. Consultees can easily see the text added as a result of including the Gatwick options.

The new documents include the original consultation material on options at Heathrow, Stansted, Luton and other South East airports, and the option for a new airport at Cliffe. In addition, in accordance with the High Court decision, the papers now include options for additional runways at Gatwick.

As for options on the other South East airports published last July, the papers now set out for Gatwick all the options which were appraised in detail in the later stages of the South East and East of England Regional Air Services (SERAS) study. Accordingly, there are two options for a single new runway at Gatwick and one option for two new runways there. The papers also set out alternative assumptions on the timing of these Gatwick options.

The consultation, for all parts of the UK, will now close on 30 June. We will consider carefully all responses received by that date, including proposals for options other than those which have been included in the Government's consultation documents. As I told the House on 28 November, this is an opportunity for anyone to express their views on all the options in the consultation, as well as to put forward any reasonable alternatives.

Copies of all the new documents are available in the Vote Office and in the Library. My officials are writing to everyone on the original consultation list, and to all those who have responded to the consultations so far, to alert them to the new documents and to the 30 June deadline, and explaining that people who have already submitted responses can choose either to let their response stand, or to add to, or amend, or withdraw their response in the light of the new material.

Night Noise Restrictions (Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted Airports)

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. John Spellar): We have been considering the timetable for the forthcoming consultation about night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports. The present night restrictions regime at those airports is due to end in October 2004. We have decided to consult shortly on an interim proposal to extend this regime for a further year, to October 2005. This would allow us to consider comments received in response to the question about the five yearly review cycle in the consultation paper Future Development of Air Transport in the United Kingdom: South East (the second edition of this paper has been published today), as well as the wider policy context, before we consult on a regime to take effect from October 2005.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Agri-environment Scheme

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): The Policy Commission on the Future of Farming and Food recommended that an entry-level agri-environment scheme should be made available to as many farms in England as possible. The Government accepted this recommendation and announced in the Sustainable Farming and Food Strategy in December 2002 that, subject to a successful pilot, the Entry Level Scheme would be made available to farmers across England from 2005.

I am pleased to inform the House that the pilot for this new scheme begins today. Guidance Booklets which give full details of the scheme design, including the environmental management options that farmers will implement under the scheme, the application process and application forms are now available. Farmers in the four pilot areas will be able to apply for the new scheme from now until 30 May 2003.

All farmers with land in the four pilot areas have been invited to launch meetings in the week beginning 3 March, at which they will be able to collect copies of these booklets. Defra staff and representatives from our partner organisations will be on hand at the meetings to answer farmers' questions and provide further information. These meetings will be followed by workshops in the four pilot areas, which will provide further practical help for farmers.

The design of the pilot for the Entry Level Scheme, including the location of the four pilot areas, has been developed in close consultation with key partner organisations through regular meetings of an Entry Level Scheme Working Group.

The pilot areas were chosen carefully, according to a range of objective criteria, to be representative of a variety of English farm types and landscapes. There are approximately 200 farms in each of the pilot areas. The areas chosen to pilot the new scheme are:

Area	Nearby towns	Pilot area broadly Representative of:
North East	Barnard Castle (Co.Durham)	Upland farming
South West	Tiverton (Devon)	Grassland farming
South East	Mortimer (Berkshire, nr Reading)	Mixed farming
East Midlands	Market Deeping (Lincolnshire)	Arable farming and cropping

Maps showing the precise boundaries of the pilot areas have been placed in the Defra library in Nobel House.

The basic features of the Entry Level Scheme Pilot will be as follows:

> Farmers taking part in the Pilot Scheme will have to identify important environmental features and areas on their farm. They will also have to make a commitment to carry out simple, yet effective, environmental management activities, which they will select themselves from a wide-ranging list of options. Examples of options available include wildlife-friendly hedge management, buffer strips around key features on the farm, the maintenance of stone walls and managing low input grassland.
> Each option will be worth a certain number of points, related to the cost to the farmer of implementing that option. If the farmer achieves a target number of points for their farm they will be guaranteed entry to the scheme and payment. The target number of points will be based on farm size. Farmers will have to get 30 points per hectare, except for LFA land in parcels of 15 ha or more where the threshold will be 15 points per hectare.
> There will be a flat rate payment of £30 per hectare over the whole holding, paid annually. However, for LFA land in parcels of 15 ha or more, farmers will receive £15 per hectare. The lower rates reflect the fact that this land, which is normally extensively grazed, is generally managed less intensively, farmers could not be expected to implement such a wide range of measures, or at the same level of intensity, as in lowland farming situations.
> The scheme will be open to all farmers who farm land within the pilot area boundaries.
> Agreements will be for 5 years.

A key aim of the scheme is high take-up, as the environmental management activities available will be most effective if they are applied across a wide area. To facilitate high uptake, the scheme has been designed to be simple to administer for both the farmer and Government. We hope that farmers participating in the pilot will be able to understand and implement the entry level scheme themselves, without the need for specialist advice on a one-to-one basis.

The pilot will be closely monitored and evaluated for the next two years. The evaluation will assess the application of the environmental management measures at the farm level, including their potential to deliver the expected environmental benefits. The accessibility and popularity of the scheme, and an analysis of the factors affecting uptake, will also be considered.

The experience gained from the pilots will enable us to adapt and improve the scheme design before aiming to roll out the Entry Level Scheme across England in 2005.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Pension Schemes 2003–04

The Minister for Pensions (Mr. Ian McCartney): I am pleased to announce that there will be no increase in the General Levy rates for 2003–04. Rates will remain at the 2000–01 level as set out in the tables, due to buoyant levy receipts and good housekeeping.

I am also pleased to announce that although some payments have been made out of the pension compensation fund, it will not be necessary to raise a Compensation Levy in 2003–04.

The Government's Green Paper, "Simplicity, Security and Choice: Working and Saving for retirement", Cm 5677, published 17 December 2002, sets out plans for a new, risk-focused pensions regulator, which also provides support, advice and guidance to the pensions industry.

The General Levy rates for 2003–04 are as follows:

Table 1—Occupational Pension Schemes

Scheme Size (Number of Members)	Basis	Amount per Member	Minimum Payment Per Scheme[1]
2 to 11	£12 Per scheme	-	-
12 to 99	Per Member	£1.25	-
100 to 999	Per Member	£0.90	£125
1,000 to 4999	Per Member	£0.70	£900
5,000 to 9,999	Per member	£0.53	£3,500
10,000 or more	Per member	£0.37	£5,300

Table 2—Personal Pension Schemes

Note: 1. Minimum payments ensure that schemes in the lower bands do not pay more overall than those the higher bands

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Employment Relations Act

The Minister for Employment Relations, Industry and the Regions (Alan Johnson): I have today placed in the Libraries of the House copies of a consultation document as part of the Government's review of the Employment Relations Act 1999.1 have also placed in the Libraries copies of the draft regulations prohibiting the blacklisting of trade unionists, which arose from the review. The review was announced on 11 July by the Secretary of State, with the following terms of reference:

> The Government has reformed the labour market to build a durable and fair basis for constructive employment relations. By a range of measures, the UK labour market is achieving high levels of employment and combining fairness and flexibility.
> In line with commitments made in the 1998 Fairness at Work White Paper, the Government will review the operation of the statutory union recognition and derecognition procedures in the Employment Relations Act 1999. The review will also look at the operation of the other provisions of the Act.
> The review will be carried out by the DTI through full public consultation. The DTI will complete this task to a timetable enabling any legislative recommendations which the review may make to be introduced within the lifetime of this Parliament.

Based on the evidence, the review has found that the Act is working well. The review has concluded that the central pillars of the Act should remain unchanged, but it makes a number of proposals to amend other parts of the Act to improve their practical operation. The consultation document also presents the Government's proposals to change trade union law in line with the judgment reached on 2 July by the European Court of Human Rights in the Wilson and Palmer case. The consultation period ends on 22 May.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): The twelfth Report on the implementation of the Sino-British Joint Declaration on Hong Kong was published today and copies have been placed in the Library of the House. A copy of the Report is also available on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office website http://www.fco.gov.uk/. The Report includes a foreword by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. I commend the Report to the House.

HOME OFFICE

Prison Service Pay Review

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Hilary Benn): The second report of the Prison Service Pay Review Body (PSPRB) on the pay of governing governors and operational managers, prison officers and related grades in England and Wales in 2003 is being published today and copies will be placed in the Library.

The PSPRB have continued to be impressed by the professionalism and dedication they found amongst the remit group staff, particularly in view of the pressures of rising prisoner numbers. They have recommended a basic rise of 2.8 per cent, which is in line with the rate of inflation in December 2002 and other review body awards.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has decided that the recommendations will be implemented in full, with effect from the operative date of the award of 1 April 2003.

The key recommendations of the report are:

A 2.8 per cent increase to basic pay rates from 1 April 2003;

Locality allowances paid to Prison Service staff in eligible areas in London and the South East will be increased from 1 April 2003:

from £3,500 to £3,800 per annum for the top rate from £2,300 to £3,000 per annum for a new "higher" rate from £2,300 to £2,500 per annum for the middle rate from £1,000 to £1,100 per annum for the lower rate

An improved performance-related progression system for operational managers from 1 April 2003 and assimilation to a new pay spine retrospectively to 1 January 2003;

An increase of 2.8 per cent. to the Healthcare specialist allowance paid to prison officers from 1 April 2003. Other specialist allowances frozen at current rates; and

Other allowances increased by 2.8 per cent.

Criminal Records Bureau

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): On 6 September 2002 I announced the appointment of an Independent Review Team, led by Patrick Carter, to take a fundamental look at the operations of the Criminal Records Bureau (CRB). In particular, the Review Team was tasked to support the CRB management in the short-term and to identify necessary longer-term changes in the way the CRB operates to ensure that it can deliver its twin objectives of providing greater protection for children and vulnerable adults whilst ensuring that the Disclosure process does not act as a bar to speedy recruitment.

I have today placed in the Library the main findings and recommendations of the Independent Review Team.

I am extremely grateful to Patrick Carter and his two colleagues—John Holden and Ron Skelley—for their rapid and thorough examination of the situation at the CRB and their recommendations on the way forward. The team has come up with a wide-ranging set of recommendations for improvements to the CRB intended to enable it to meet future challenges as demand for its services continues to grow. The CRB is a vital element of the Government's programme to improve the protection of children and vulnerable adults from those who might wish to harm them. It needs to be put on a sounder footing to meet these objectives more effectively and provide the levels of service rightly expected by its customers.

The Independent Review Team's recommendations build on the steady improvement in the GRB's performance over the last six months which has seen the average number of Disclosures issued rise from 24,500 per week in August 2002 to the current 40,000 per week. Some 80 per cent of Standard Disclosures and 50 per cent. of Enhanced Disclosures are now issued within three weeks. These improvements have been achieved by both the Agency and Capita working in partnership to deliver the service that the CRB's customers are entitled to receive.

The Government propose to take forward the 10 recommendations in the report as follows:

> Ways should be sought of optimising the end-to-end CRB process efficiency, by reviewing and rationalising the management responsibilities and respective roles in the complete chain undertaken by Registered Bodies, the CRB Agency, Capita and local police forces.

The Government agree that the roles of the different parties involved in the CRB process should be strengthened and clarified. In particular, we intend to enhance the intelligent customer function within the Agency so that there is a stronger focus on setting standards across the whole operation and ensuring that these are met. There also needs to be better management co-ordination of the CRB end-to-end business processes. This may involve the more flexible deployment of Agency and private sector staff and to this end we will take powers in the Criminal Justice Bill to enable the Secretary of State's functions under Part V of the Police Act 1997 to be exercised by the private sector as well as Agency staff.

> The critical role of Registered Bodies in the CRB process needs to be recognised and upgraded. Registered bodies should be unambiguously responsible for validating the identity of those for whom they seek Disclosures and for ensuring the quality and completeness of applications submitted to the CRB. The number of Registered Bodies should be optimised to establish sensible economies of scale and improve proficiency.

The Government accept this recommendation and will legislate this session to make it clear that Registered Bodies are responsible for verifying the identity of an applicant. It would, as now, be open to a Registered Body to delegate the function of validating identity to the prospective employer or other agent while retaining overall responsibility, as long as we are satisfied in a particular case that delegation provides a reasonable safeguard. To ensure that Registered Bodies discharge their responsibilities effectively, we will take powers to attach conditions to a registration and to revoke a registration where such conditions are breached. We share the Review Team's view that optimum levels of efficiency within a Registered Body can best be achieved by handling a sufficient number of Disclosure applications. With the new responsibilities for Registered Bodies, a number of those currently countersigning relatively small numbers of applications may seek to de-register of their own volition. We will monitor the situation carefully. The Government will take reserve powers to set a threshold for the minimum number of applications to be processed by a Registered Body each year and to de-register those Registered Bodies which fall below the threshold. Registered Bodies and others across the sectors which use the CRB's Disclosure service will be fully consulted before these changes are implemented. We will take particular account of concerns that have been expressed about access to Registered Bodies and the level of fees charged by some umbrella bodies. As part of the consultation exercise, we will seek views oh placing a cap on the fees that may be levied by Registered Bodies.

> There should be a progressive move to mandate electronic submission of applications by Registered Bodies.

The CRB will introduce an electronic application channel as soon as practicable; a pilot will be undertaken later this year. We believe that many Registered Bodies will want to adopt this channel as their preferred means of submitting Disclosure applications. In time, as more and more Registered Bodies migrate to the electronic channel there will be a diminishing case, on efficiency grounds, for maintaining the existing paper and telephone channels. At that point, consideration would need to be given whether to mandate—by means of a condition attached to registration—the electronic channel for registered bodies to submit applications to the CRB. This will not preclude individuals submitting their applications to registered bodies by paper or telephone channels where mutually agreed.

> Given that the production of Enhanced Disclosures is significantly more costly and ties up local police force resources, new arrangements should be established for the Agency to set priorities, in accordance with Government Guidelines, on which applications should get Enhanced and which should get Standard Disclosures.

The Government agree with the spirit of this recommendation, but it is important that the criteria are set by ministers, in consultation with relevant stakeholders, on the basis of a risk assessment. Having established the criteria for Standard and Enhanced Disclosures it is important that there is some mechanism to ensure that they are properly observed. It is proposed, therefore, to amend the Police Act 1997 first to enable the type of Disclosure for any given occupational group to be determined by regulations and then to enable the CRB to give effect to such regulations. Where necessary, the CRB would be expected to seek additional information from the registered body in order that it could make its assessment in any given case. We will take account of the views of Registered Bodies and others before implementing these changes.

> It is recommended that the Police National Computer (PNC) files are "flagged" to denote the existence of intelligence information on any individual held at local force level and not included in convictions recorded on the PNC.

The cost and feasibility of introducing a system of flags on the PNC to denote the existence of local intelligence will be tested in a pilot due to commence in three forces (Metropolitan Police, Staffordshire and West Midlands) in the spring. Decisions about the rollout of such a system will be taken in the light of the outcome of the pilot.

> It is recommended that the launch of Basic Disclosures be postponed until the CRB systems have been developed to provide a substantially greater capacity. It would be inappropriate to launch Basic Disclosures until higher priority categories of applicant for higher level Disclosures are seeing their needs fully accommodated. It is also recommended that Basic Disclosure applications should be routed through Registered Bodies, with identity validation undertaken by these Bodies, rather than allow direct submission from applicants as currently envisaged by the legislation.

The Government concur that the priority for the CRB is to ensure that demand for higher level Disclosures is fully met and that applicants for such Disclosures receive a satisfactory service. Basic Disclosures will not be introduced until these objectives have been achieved. The Government note the case for routing applications for a Basic Disclosure through a Registered Body as in the case of Standard and Enhanced Disclosures, but will want to consult fully with employer organisations and others on the implications before coming to a final view. In the event that the Government decide to proceed, legislation would be needed to implement this recommendation.

> The Information Technology system built and operated by Capita has been subject to a range of improvements and enhancements since original delivery, as a result of which performance has improved. A further programme of significant enhancement will be required. Additionally, almost all the recommendations set out here would lead to requirements for system change and therefore would have contractual consequences. It is therefore recommended to attempt to renegotiate the contract with Capita to implement necessary technology renewal and align the contract to the changed and evolving circumstances.

The Government accept this recommendation and will seek to renegotiate the contract with Capita so that it reflects the changed environment in which the CRB will be operating.

> An investigation should be undertaken into the possibility of requiring fingerprints to be submitted by applicants for Disclosures where the sensitivity of the employment role to be undertaken makes this appropriate. This would enable a more rigorous linking of police records (which in turn are mostly linked to fingerprints) and the individuals submitting applications for Disclosures. This investigation will need to look at the balance to be struck between such increasing rigour of CRB identity processes and the cost and convenience of the service to the customer.

The Government will undertake a further study in consultation with Registered Bodies and others on the case for, and practicalities of, requiring applicants for Disclosures in particularly sensitive employment roles to submit their fingerprints with their application. Among the issues the study will need to address, is how to avoid any unnecessary intrusion into the privacy of applicants. A decision whether to proceed will be taken in the light of the results of the consultation exercise. Legislation would be needed to implement this change.

> While recognising the benefits derived from establishing the CRB under the wing of an existing Agency, it is now recommended that an independent Executive Agency is created within the Home Office to carry forward the CRB's changing and increasingly demanding functions. There will need to be a transitional period which will be overseen by a transitional Management Board operating within an appropriate governance framework.

The Government agree that the CRB, currently part of the Passport and Records Agency, should be reconstituted as a free-standing Agency. The new Agency will be established as soon as practicable. A Transitional Board has been established to ensure a smooth transition. John Holden has agreed to serve as the non-executive chairman of the Board and Patrick Carter and Ron Skelley as non-executive members. A stakeholder group will be established under John Holden's chairmanship to represent the interests of Government Departments and the police.

> In order to implement a number of the recommendations, changes to the legislative framework under which the CRB operates (Part V of the Police Act 1997) will be required.

As indicated above, the Government will take forward in the Criminal Justice Bill the necessary legislative changes needed to implement recommendations 1, 2 and 4.

Certificates of Identity

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): On 6 February we announced that we would consult on plans to tighten the policy on issuing Certificates of Identity. We have completed the consultation as quickly as possible, as there was evidence of abuse. I can now announce that, from 27 March, these documents will only be available to people who can prove that they need them.

The change has proved necessary because some people who claim to have fled their home countries in fear of their lives have used our documents to travel back. Recently, we found 125 Iraqis using these documents on just 16 flights to Damascus, which is 140 miles from the Iraqi border. (There are no direct flights to Iraq). We cannot allow this to continue. We have decided that all applicants for a Certificate of Identity, including those who have indefinite leave to enter or remain, must prove that they cannot obtain a passport from the authorities of their own country. People who have exceptional leave to enter or remain (i.e. leave for a limited period) will also have to show that they need to travel for an essential reason, such as business, education, religion or compassionate circumstances. They will have to tell us which country they need to travel to and will not be allowed to go to any other countries using the Certificate of Identity.

With this change of policy, we also intend to send a clear message that the United Kingdom takes its obligations seriously, and we expect those who benefit from our protection to do the same.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Councillor Codes of Conduct

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Christopher Leslie): Promoting high standards of ethical conduct among Councillors is one of the most important requirements for the strengthening of local democracy and the building up of trust between people and their elected representatives. The Government are today laying an amendment to the Local Government Bill which will lead to new regulations allowing local authorities to play a more active role in dealing with cases of councillor misconduct.

The amendment has been prepared following an extensive consultation exercise last summer on the proposed regulatory framework which would allow local investigation of allegations and local hearings. Close consideration of more than 1,000 responses to that consultation led to the conclusion that a robust and workable set of regulations could not be made without changes to the primary legislation.

The Government now intend to issue regulations in two parts. The first set of regulations will set out the regime within which local standards committees will be able to consider reports on alleged councillor misconduct completed by ESOs and referred to the monitoring officer of the relevant authority under section 59 (4)(c) of the Local Government Act 2000. The intention is that these regulations will be laid before Parliament in early April. I understand that the Standards Board for England intend to publish guidance for local authorities on the operation of these regulations

The second set of regulations will provide for the conduct of investigations by monitoring officers, or their deputies, following a decision by an ESO to cease an investigation and refer the matters to the monitoring officer under section 60 (2)(b) of the Local Government Act 2000. Our intention is not to lay these regulations until a change has been made to the Local Government Act 2000 which would allow a monitoring officer to appoint another person to conduct an investigation, especially in circumstances where the monitoring officer might have a conflict of interest. The amendment which is being laid before Parliament today is designed to achieve this change. Subject to Parliament's enactment of the amendment, regulations dealing with investigations will be laid in the Autumn.

Written Ministerial Statements

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from: (i) a take-up of £500,000 programme resources from DfES for school milk; (ii) a take-up of £6,044,000 administration resources from ODPM for accommodation costs (Ashdown House); (iii) a take-up £500,000 administration resources from ODPM for staff costs; (iv) a take-up £60,000 administration resources from ODPM for local Public Service Agreements; (v) a take-up £179,000 programme resources from DfT for best practice programmes; (vi) a take-up £2,512,000 administration resources from the Invest to Save Budget, representing Defra's successful projects in the fourth round of awards; (vii) a transfer £22,000 resources to the Maritime Coastguard Agency (MCA) for engine power surveys; (viii) to take-up £65,000 administration resources from HMC&E for CAP export licensing under the Invest to Save scheme; (ix) a switch of £7,075,000 from capital to administration resource in respect of information technology (IT) costs, as agreed with Treasury; (x) a transfer £90,000 administration resources to ODPM for Planning Inspectorate;

(xi) a transfer £1,200,000 programme resources to DfID for the Environmental Know-How Fund; (xii) a transfer £20,000 programme resources to DfT for PEP implementation; (xiii) the increase in programme resources and appropriations-in-aid in RfR 1 of £2,571,000 for the Over Twenty Months Scheme (OTMS) and £1,220,000 for international environmental purposes; (xiv) the increase our in Executive Agencies administration resources and appropriations-in-aid of £14,200,000 to meet appropriations-in-aid target in Estimate; (xv) a transfer from RfR 1 to RfR 2 of £4,700,000 programme resources for the Rural Payments Agency (RPA) in respect of the England Rural Development Plan (ERDP); (xvi) to switch £15,000,000 from capital and move £2,700,000 to administration resources and £12,300,000 to programme resources, as agreed with Treasury; (xvii) to switch £45,075,000 administration resources to programme resources in respect of front line services, as agreed with Treasury; (xviii) the reclassification of £27,100,000 flood defence capital grants to the Environment Agency as grant-in-aid and matching non-Voted resource budget cover, to reflect the Agency's accounting treatment of these grants; (ixx) the increase in Resource DEL of £1,865,000 as a result of the transfer of English Nature's unfunded pension liabilities into the Principal Civil Service Pension Scheme.

The change in the resource resource element of the DEL takes account of the take-up of our departmental unallocated provision (DUP) of £15,290,000 programme resources.

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from: (i) the drawdown from Treasury of £50,000 capital for the Evidence Based Policy Fund; (ii) the switch of £15,000,000 from capital to administration and programme resources, as agreed with Treasury; (iii) the reclassification of £27,100,000 flood defence capital grants to the Environment Agency as grant-in-aid and matching non-Voted resource budget cover, to reflect the Agency's accounting treatment of these grants; (iv) to take-up £128,000 capital from the Invest to Save Budget, representing Defra's successful capital projects in the fourth round of awards; (v) the switch of £7,075,000 from capital to administration resource in respect of information technology (IT) costs, as agreed with Treasury.

The change in the capital element of the DEL takes account of the move onto the Estimate as capital grants of £2,397,000 supplementary credit approvals (SCA's).

TREASURY

Departmental Expenditure (Inland Revenue)

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The Inland Revenue Departmental Expenditure Limit will be decreased by £124,000 from £2,601,986,000 to £2,601,862,000 and the administration costs limit will be decreased by £124,000 from £2,644,712,000 to £2,644,588,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

£'000

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted	Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted
124	2,601,862	2,252,675	349,187	0	168,086	168,086	0

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from the transfer of debt management activity to the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP).

Departmental Expenditure (National Savings and Investments)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, National Savings & Investments' Resource DEL will be increased by £11,500,000 from £156.898,000 to £168,398,000 and the administration costs limits will be increased by £11,500,000 from £156,898,000 to £168,398,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

	Resources	Capital
Change	12,000,000	—
New DEL	168,398,000	300,000
Of which:
Voted	167,398,000	300,000
Non voted	1,000,000	—

The increase in Resource DEL comprises of an increase of £12,000,000 in the voted element offset by a reduction of £500,000 in the non-voted element.

This will be used to cover expenditure relating to NS&I's modernisation programme, specifically the Savings Account Implementation programme and signing up to the Banking Code.

There is no change in the capital element of the DEL.

Departmental Expenditure (Treasury)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, HM Treasury DEL will be increased by £170,224,000 from £205,514,000 to £375,738,000 and the administration costs limits will be increased by £16,815,000 from £110,204,000 to £127,019,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted.	Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted
26,724,000	226,449,000	162,625,000	63,824,000	143,500,000	149,289,000	148,989,000	300,000

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

- an increase in Treasury administrative costs of £6,600,000
- funding of £9,000 from the Capital Modernisation Fund for a project on regional inequalities
- an increase of operating appropriations in aid of £10,000 for conference fees from 1 Horse Guards Road
- an increase in OGC administrative costs of £4,681,000 for restructuring costs and a voluntary retirement scheme
- an increase in OGC other current of £4,900,000 to finance changes in the accounting treatment of transactions related to the OGC residual estate
- a reduction in OGC operating appropriations in aid of £10,544,000 (£7,044,000 administrative A in A, £3,500,000 other current A in A)

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from:

- 1 Horse Guards Road being brought on to HM Treasury's balance sheet (£141,000,000)
- refurbishment costs of £2,500,000 for the OGC headquarters building Trevelyan House

Departmental Expenditure (Customs and Excise)

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the H M Customs and Excise DEL will be increased by £4,259,000 from £1,158,728,000 to £1,162,987,000 and the administration costs limit will be increased by £23,535,000 from £1,017,967,000 to £1,041,502,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted	Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted
23,400,000	1,097,710,000	1,093,671,000	4,039,000	-19,141,000	65,277,000	64,277,000	1,000,000

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from the following administration costs adjustments: a claim on the reserve of £1,600,000 in relation to team bonuses as part of the second year of Makinson trials; drawing down £22,000,000 Departmental Unallocated Provision to reflect investment in the e-Government programme; a transfer of £65,000 to the Rural Payment Agency in support of CAP Export Licensing; and an increase of £135,000 in the level of appropriation in aid receipts.

The change in the capital element of DEL arises from: the take up of end year flexibility entitlement of £3,234,000 as set out in Public Expenditure White Paper (Cm 5574); a reduction in capital expenditure of £510,000 concerning round three of the Capital Modernisation Fund; a transfer of £22,000,000 Departmental Unallocated Provision into resource DEL to reflect investment in the e-Government programme; and an increase in capital expenditure by £135,000 in relation to capital costs in running Money Service Businesses.

As a result of the specified resource DEL changes mentioned in the above paragraph, not including the appropriations in aid adjustment, the administration costs limit has increased by £23,535,000.

Departmental Expenditure Limits (Office for National Statistics)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): The Office for National Statistics Resource Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) will be decreased by £764,000 from £128,236,000 to £127,472,000 and the administration costs limit will be decreased by £764,000 from £127,437,000 to £126,673,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted	Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted
-764,000	127,472,000	123,112,000	4,360,000	NIL	22,063,000	22,063,000	0

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from an increase in Resource DEL due to the draw down of £308,000 from the Invest to Save Budget in respect of the "Citizen Information Project: feasibility study" and due to the draw down of £50,000 from the Evidence-Based Policy Fund towards the costs of the English Longitudinal Study on Ageing. This increase is outweighed by transfers of £1,122,000 in total to other government departments. £537,000 of the transfer is in relation to data development work [illegible] the Neighbourhood Statistics programme. The transfers comprise £50,000 to the Department for Transport, £247,000 to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and £240,000 to the Home Office. Furthermore, ONS is repaying to the Neighbourhood Renewal Unit £585,000 administration costs which they advanced to ONS in 2001–02 to finance initial work on the Neighbourhood Statistics programme.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Departmental Expenditure

The Secretary of State for International Development (Clare Short): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate the Department for International Development DEL for 2002/2003 will be increased by £77,305,000 from £3,376,958,000 to £3,454,263,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

(£'000)

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted	Change	New DEL	Of which: Voted	Non voted
455,277	3,440,889	2,269,255	1,171,634	-377,972	13,374	13,374	—

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

RfR 1: Eliminating Poverty in Poorer Countries

a transfer of £1,200,000 resource from DEFRA representing a contribution to the environmental know-how fund to Bilateral Development Assistance resource; to give effect to the take up of DEL end year flexibility of £52,458,000 resource (non-discretionary—EC Attribution rollover) on programme expenditure to Bilateral Development Assistance resource;

a transfer of £988,000 from Multilateral Capital to Bilateral Development Assistance resource;

a transfer of £19,000,000 from non-voted capital to Bilateral Development Assistance resource;

a transfer of £18,000,000 from non-voted capital to Multilateral Development Assistance resource;

a transfer of £339,984,000 from non-voted Capital to non-voted Resource for the unwinding of Provisions; to give effect to the transfer of £24,472,000 resource from the Central Reserve as a contribution to HIPC 100% expenditure to Bilateral Development Assistance;

a reduction of £3,600,000 resource to the Bilateral Development Assistance net cash figure to account for the value of VAT receipts taken in 2002/03;

a transfer of £18,000 resource from DFID to the Home Office for the balance of DFID's contribution to GRECO membership; to give effect to the take up of Administration DEL end year flexibility of £4,893,000 resource (discretionary) on Administration;

a reduction of £955,000 resource to Administration net cash figure to account for the value of VAT receipts taken in 2002/03;

RfR 2: Conflict Prevention

a transfer of £3,588,000 resource from sub-Saharan Africa Conflict Prevention non-voted Departmental Unallocated Provision (DUP) to sub-Saharan Africa Conflict Prevention;

a transfer of £1,945,000 resource from sub-Saharan Africa Conflict Prevention non-voted Departmental Unallocated Provision (DUP) to the Ministry of Defence;

a transfer of £1,450,000 resource from sub-Saharan Africa non-voted Departmental Unallocated Provision (DUP) to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office;

a transfer of £17,000 resource from sub-Saharan Africa non-voted Departmental Unallocated Provision (DUP) to Global Conflict Prevention.

a transfer of £2,250,000 resource from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to Global Conflict Prevention;

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from: transfers from the capital to the resource budget as listed above.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Departmental Expenditure

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): This Written Statement explains the changes being proposed to the Department for Education and Skills' Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) (including the Office for Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools (OFSTED) which has a separate Estimate), which subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, will be increased by £681,049,000 from £23,500,366,000 to £23,984,215,000.

There are no Spring Supplementary changes to the OFSTED Estimate and hence they are excluded from the tables below.

The Administration Costs limits which will be changed as follows:

	Original £000	Change £000	Revised £000
DfES (RfR1)	207,541	+3,505	211,046
Sure Start (RfR2)	5,450	+1,005	6,455
Children's Fund (RfR3)	4,005	-81	3,924

Within the DEL change, the impact on the resources element and the capital element are as set out in the following table:

	Resources				Capital
	Change £000	New DEL £000	Of which: Voted £000	Non-voted £000	Change £000	New DEL £000	Of which: Voted £000	Non- voted £000

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from Machinery of Government transfers of £2,018,000 to other departments; a virement from capital of £4,000,000; additions from the Invest to Save Budget of £280,000; and net transfers to other government departments of £140,000.

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from additions from the DEL reserve of £9,000,000; transfers from other departments of £6,087,000; a transfer to the Security and Intelligence Agencies of £385,000; draw down of capital end year flexibility of £4,125,000; virement to resource of £4,000,000; and the difference of £400,000 between expenditure using proceeds from the sale of assets and the net book value of the assets.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Departmental Expenditure

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): Subject to Parliamentary approval the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) will be taking a 2002/2003 Spring Supplementary Estimate. The effect this will have is to increase the NIO's DEL by £35,101,000 from £1,211,862,000 to £1,246,963,000 and the administration costs limit will be increased by £13,269,000 from £154,716,000 to £167,985,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

£'000

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted	Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted
30,591	1,177,900	1,177,900	0	4,510	69,063	41,575	27,488

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from the draw down of £12,000,000 End Year Flexibility, a Reserve Claim for the Bloody Sunday Inquiry of £18,542,000 and net transfers into the Department of £49,000. This amount includes a total of £13,236,000 for administration costs.

The extra resource costs cover a range of areas within the Department such as policing plus security, central administration, political, criminal justice and prisons. The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from the draw down of £5,000,000 End Year Flexibility, and a capital transfer to the Northern Ireland Departments of £490,000.

The extra capital costs cover a range of areas within the Department such as policing plus security, central administration, political, criminal justice and prisons.

The NIO Spring Supplementary Estimates will also be used to increase the Grant payable into the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund by £372,000,000, from £8,089,000,000 to £8,461,000,000.

The increase in Grant payable is a cash increase to fund activities undertaken by Northern Ireland Departments during 2002/03. This cash increase allows the use of End Year Flexibility and net transfers to Northern Ireland Departments which will be utilised in delivering departmental programmes.

As a result the Northern Ireland Departments' DEL increases by £338,824,000 from £6,130,919,000 to £6,469,743,000. The increase comprises a take up of EYF of £337,440,000, a claim on the Reserve of £1,326,000 in respect of the disposal of fridges under EU regulations and net transfers of £58,000 from other Government Departments.

LORD CHANCELLOR

Departmental Expenditure

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Ms Rosie Winterton): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the Lord Chancellor's Departments (including Northern Ireland Court Service and Public Records Office) DEL will be increased by £419,953,000 from £2,897,414,000 to £3,317,367,000 and the administration costs limit will be increased by £160,001,000 from £639,888,000 to £799,889,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

All figures are £000's.

The change in the Lord Chancellor's Department resource DEL is the net effect of:

> A transfer of £27,000 administration costs and £11,760,000 appropriations in aid to the Home Office; a transfer of £110,000 administration costs from the Home Office; a transfer of £208,000 administration costs to the Department for Work and Pensions; a transfer of £48,000 administration costs from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister; an increase of £11,760,000 appropriations in aid from a short surrender of CFERS; a transfer of £70,000 resources from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs; a reclassification of £444,000 from capital to resource DEL utilising the 2½ per cent. capital to resource allowance; a transfer of £78,000 administration costs from the Office of Government Commerce; reclassification of £6,245,000 resources from resource to capital DEL, of which £7,000,000 is administration costs; take up of £412,000,000 resources from the DEL Reserve, of which £167,000,000 is administration costs.

The change in the Northern Ireland Court Service resource DEL is the net effect of:

> take up of DEL end year flexibility of £1,581,000 administration costs and a virement of £1,581,000 from administration to capital DEL; a reclassification of £26,600,000 from administration costs to programme costs; take up of non-voted DEL end year flexibility of £271,000 Consolidated Fund expenditure; the take up of DEL end year flexibility of £1,955,000 on legal aid fund expenditure.

The change in the Public Records Office resource DEL arises from:

> the take up of £2,542,000 administration costs from end year flexibility.

The change in the Lord Chancellor's Department capital DEL is the net effect of:

> a reclassification of £444,000 from capital to resource DEL utilising the 2½ per cent. capital to resource allowance; reclassification of £6,245,000 resources from resource to capital DEL.

The change in the Northern Ireland Court Service capital DEL is the net effect of:

> the take up of capital end year flexibility of £1,475,000; and a virement of £1,581,000 from administration to capital DEL.

The change in the Public Records Office capital DEL is the net effect of:

> take up of end year flexibility of £60,000 resources.

The increases will be offset by inter-departmental transfers, increases to Appropriations in Aid, take up of End Year Flexibility entitlements and a charge to the DEL Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Departmental Expenditure

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate the Department of Trade and Industry's DEL will be increased by £92,689,000 from £4,763,244,000 to £4,855,933,000 and the Administration Costs limit will be increased by £18,592,000 from £423,187,000 to £441,779,000.

Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital is as set out in the following table:

(xvii) transfer of £439,000 from the Cabinet Office in relation to Women and Equality as a result of Machinery of Government changes;

(xviii) a virement of £500,000 from programme to administration in respect of business information start-ups.

RfR2

(i) utilisation of £200,000 from the Departmental Unallocated Provision for OST initiatives;

(ii) utilisation of £2,515,000 from the unused balance of the Department's end-year flexibility entitlement for Knowledge Transfer;

2. There is also an increase in non-Voted expenditure on Enemy Property Claims liabilities of £5,000,000.

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from:

RfR1

(i) utilisation of £4,500,000 from the unused balance of the Department's end-year flexibility entitlement for the Small Business Service National Gateway Capital Modernisation Fund project;

(ii) take up of £3,000,000 from the business.gov Capital Modernisation Fund project;

(iii) utilisation of £8,000,000 and £26,000,000 from the unused balance of the Department's end-year flexibility entitlement to provide for increased expenditure and reduced receipts in relation to the Rolls Royce Trent 600 and 900 projects;

(iv) to increase the gross provision for grant in aid to Regional Development Agencies by £35,039,000 and increase appropriations in aid by an equivalent amount to reflect additional receipts from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Sizewell B Nuclear Power Station

The Minister for Energy and Construction (Mr Brian Wilson): In the statement made by the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, South (Nigel Griffiths) on 14 January 2003, Official Report, col. 547–50, he said that the Greenpeace protestors who entered the Sizewell nuclear power station had not penetrated any of the internal security barriers.

My hon. Friend's statement was made on the basis of the best information available at the time from the nuclear operating company, British Energy. However, it is now known that although initial reports did not indicate that any sensitive area had been breached at the time of the Greenpeace incursion, a subsequent inspection by the Office for Civil Nuclear Security has established that some of the intruders entered through a door, which amounted to a breach of the Sizewell inner security barrier. Further defences within the inner security barrier contained the intruders and I should stress that at no time were any sensitive areas of the plant breached. The incursion was accurately assessed at the time not to pose a security threat and the response was measured and appropriate.

The Director of Civil Nuclear Security has implemented a full investigation into the incursion, including this breach, with the full co-operation of the operating company. Immediate remedial action has been taken to prevent a recurrence of this breach of the inner security barrier and other lessons learned from the incident are being acted on appropriately.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Departmental Expenditure

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport DEL will be reduced by £965,000 from £1,330,773,000 to £1,329,808,000 and the Administration Costs limits will be reduced by £4,731,000 from £42,166,000 to £37,435,000.

Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted	Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted
-965	1,166,432	166,837	999,595	-	163,376	116,495	46,881

The £2,908,000 increase in the voted element of the resource DEL for RfRI arises from the recovery from sale proceeds of £223,000 for repairs to Apethorpe Hall; the transfer of £20,000 administration costs expenditure from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (RfR4) toward the administration costs of local public service agreements (PSAs); a transfer of £749,000 to the Home Office for the Queen's Golden Jubilee Award scheme plus an addition of £351,000 fully offset by a transfer of £1,100,000 from non-Voted resource DEL; a transfer of £1,000,000 to the Department of Trade and Industry for the costs of setting up OFCOM fully offset by a transfer of £1,000,000 from non-Voted resource DEL; and additional resources of £2,760,000 for the costs of the funeral for the late Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother, also fully offset by a reduction in non-Voted resource DEL

The £3,873,000 reduction in the non-voted element of the resource DEL for RfR1 arises from the transfer of £830,000 from the Departmental Unallocated Provision; the reimbursement of English Heritage of £223,000 for repairs to Apethorpe Hall; a reduction of £4,030,000 in non-Voted resource DEL cover for the Historic Royal Palaces deficit; the provision of additional resources of £14,000 to the Public Lending Right, of £674,000 to English Heritage, and £76,000 to the Broadcasting Standards Commission for the costs of paying accrued superannuation liability contributions in excess of pensions payments following their transfer into the Principal Civil Service Pension Scheme.

The £4,731,000 decrease in the Department's Administration Costs Limit arises from the transfer of £4,751,000 from administration costs to resource DEL as a result of the reclassification of the delivery of services of The Royal Parks; and a transfer of £20,000 administration costs expenditure from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (RfR4) toward the administration costs of local public service agreements (PSAs).

The Voted and non-Voted elements of Capital DEL are unchanged.

PRIME MINISTER

Departmental Expenditure

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Subject to parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Security and Intelligence Agencies DEL will be increased by £36,655,000 from £973,949,000 to £1,010,604,000 and the administration costs limits will be increased by £6,865,000 from £477,256,000 to £484,121,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

	Resources £	Capital £
Change	12,905,000	23,750,000
New DEL	846,819,000	163,403,000
Of which:
Voted	846,819,000	163,403,000
Non-voted	—	—

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

1. the take up of End of Year Flexibility (EYF) of £10,500,000;
2. a PES transfer of £120,000 from the MOD;
3. a PES transfer of £1,050,000 from the Home Office;
4. a transfer of £1,235,000 to Resource from Capital

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from:

1. the take up of End of Year Flexibility (EYF) of £24,600,000;
2. a PES transfer of £385,000 from the Cabinet Office;
3. a transfer of £1,235,000 from Capital to Resource.

SCOTLAND

Departmental Expenditure

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs Helen Liddell): Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Scotland Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) will be increased by £310,555,000 from £18,290,311,000 to £18,600,866,000. The Scotland Office administration costs limit is unchanged.

The DEL increase takes account of the following:

A reclassification into DEL of £189,603,000 for Edinburgh Royal Infirmary;

The take-up of End Year Flexibility (EYF) by the Scottish Executive amounting to £90,000,000;

An increase of £1,562,000 to meet the costs of the Lockerbie trial;

An increase of £1,156,000 for the Scottish Parliament elections;

A reclassification into AME of £5,400,000 for fire service pensions.

The DEL increase also includes the following transfers between the Scottish Executive and other Government departments, amounting to a net increase of £33,634,000. These are:

A transfer of £26,086,000 from the Department of Transport;

Net transfers of £4,337,000 from the Home Office;

Net transfers of £2,050,000 from the Department of Health;

Net transfers of £880,000 from the Department for Work and Pensions;

A transfer of £358,000 from the Northern Ireland Executive;

A transfer of £60,000 from the National Assembly for Wales; and

A transfer of £137,000 to the Department for Education and Skills.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Departmental Expenditure

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Home Office's Departmental Expenditure Limits (DEL) for 2002–03 will change as follows.

£'000

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted	Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted
947,615	10,378,398	8,937,731	1,440,667	21,112	1,099,814	928,938	170,876

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

(i) Claims on the DEL reserve:

Claims on the Treasury DEL reserve of £822,410,000 for RfR01 comprising £185,000,000 to subhead H1 for costs arising from the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND); £601,696,000 to subhead H2 to cover asylum support costs significantly in excess of budget allocation (£600,000,000) and funding from the Organised Crime Reserve for Project Reflex (£1,696,000); £25,000,000 to RfR01: subhead AN3 to increase resources for compensation payments and £7,014,000 for additional grant in aid to provide cover for non-recoverable VAT payments. The remaining £3,700,000 is in respect of the Criminal Records Bureau. The bulk of this claim, as last year, simply aligns the resource budget for IND more closely with the actual spend and reflects a long-planned in-year adjustment to the unrealistic budget level originally set in July 2000.

(ii) Criminal Records Bureau:

A reduction of £11,485,000 in RfR01: subhead E1 and a corresponding increase of £37,447,000 in RfR01: subhead E.5 consisting of a reduction in the forecast of receipts, as well as contributions totaling £10,200,000 from Department of Health and Department for Education and Skills. The £25,962,000 increase in the Home Office Admin Resource DEL is offset by additional resources of £3,700,000 from the Treasury Reserve and Admin savings of £22,262,000 from within the Department which will ensure that the Admin cost limit is not exceeded.

(iii) Transfers from Other Government Departments (OGDs) totaling £15,706,000 including:

Cabinet Office to RfFM: subhead C1 of £250,000 to provide the appropriate provision for the transfer of the CBRN (Chemical, Biological, Radiological & Nuclear) Team. Department of Culture, Media and Sport to RfR1: subhead G2 of £749,000 for the transfer of the Golden Jubilee Awards Team. Department for Education and Skills of £196,000 to RfR01: subhead J2 in respect of Children & Young peoples Boost (£95,000); subhead G3 for a contribution towards the Voluntary Sector Portal Project (£20,000) and subhead JT for a transfer from the Children's Fund relating to On Track Evaluation (£81,000). Department of Health to RfR1: subhead G3 of £62,000 for matched funded Intermediate Care Services Project. Department of Work and Pensions to RfR1: subhead AQ3 of £450,000 for Street Crime Initiative Funding to link street crime offenders into employment opportunities. Lord Chancellor's Department to RfR01: subhead C3 of £11,760,000 to provide the appropriate provision for payments from the Recovered Assets Fund. Northern Ireland Office to RfR1: subhead D3 of £4,000 for a contribution to GRECO. Office of National Statistics to RfR01: subhead B3 of £240,000 to provide the appropriate provision for NeSS project work—funding for CO4—Crime Data Extraction. Scottish Office to RfR1: subhead D3 for £13,000 for a contribution to GRECO. Welsh Office to RfR01: subhead A3 of £13,742,000 to provide the appropriate provision for the costs of centrally managed police projects.

(iv) Transfers to OGDs totaling £23,829,000 including:

Crown Prosecution Service of £1,200,000 to provide the appropriate provision to video suspects. Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs of £1,500,000 to provide the appropriate provision for Locks For Pensioners. £1,539,000 to Department for Education and Skills for Moorfoot MOTO (£201,000) transfer for a Match Funding Project (£1,113,000): Transfer for the Community Cohesion Pathfinder Programme—Community Champions (£225,000). £3,495,000 to the Department of Health from RfR01: subhead J2 for National Drug Treatment Monitoring System (£316,000), Drug Testing Treatment Orders (DTTO) (£60,000) and Crack Treatment Pilots (£150,000); from subhead AQ3 to increase the number of DTTO's in seven street crime areas (£540,000); from subhead D2 for Staff induction costs for DSPD unit at Broadmoor (£218,000); from subhead C3 to provide the appropriate provision for 'DAT Training on Treatment Commissioning' (£25,000), to provide the appropriate provision for 'Central drug treatment Fund' (£1,161,000), to provide appropriate provision for 'In House training for Drug Treatment Workers' (£100,000) and to provide the appropriate provision for 'Drug Related Deaths' (£925,000). £26,000 to the Department of Trade and Industry from RfR01: subhead B3 to provide the appropriate provision for Design Against Crime. £1,627,000 to the Department of Vehicle Licensing Agency from subhead B3 to provide the appropriate provision for Vehicle Crime. £110,000 to the Lord Chancellors Department from RfFM: subhead D1 for JT inspections cross cutting civil justice project. £34,000 to the Northern Ireland Office from RfR1: subhead G1 for the Golden Jubilee Awards. £8,693,000 to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister from RfR01: subhead G1 (£310,000) for the Golden Jubilee Awards, subhead G1 (£180,000) for the Community Cohesion Pathfinder Programme for staffing, subhead G1 (£380,000) for the Time Limited Development Fund, from subhead B1 (£6,104,000) to provide the appropriate provision for RCU tariff costs for the crime reduction teams, subhead C3 (£1,280,000) to provide the appropriate provision for 'Rough Sleepers Unit1 and subhead A2 (£439,000) to provide appropriate provision for Government Office involvement in Street Crime Initiative. £4,384,000 to the Scotland Office subhead H2 of (£4,350,000) for Local Authority Asylum Support Payments and subhead Clot (£34,000) for the Golden Jubilee Awards. £1,050,000 to the Security Intelligence Service from RfROT: subhead C2 to provide the appropriate provision for overseas drugs related assistance. £61,000 to the Wales Office from RfR01: subhead G1 (£34,000) for the Golden Jubilee Awards and subhead C3 (£27,000) to provide the appropriate provision for 'Iechyd Morghannwg DAT'. £110,000 to the Cabinet Office from RfR01: subhead D1 for exchange demonstrator work funded from CJIT.

(v) Transfers between RfR01 and RfR02 £265,000 from RfROI to RfR02 comprising:

£235,000 from RfR01: subhead H1 to RfR02: subhead A1 for costs associated with the Immigration Removal Centres at Haslar, Dover and Lindholme. £30,000 from RfR01: subhead F2 to RfR02: subhead C2 in respect of OASys OPOL project funding. £14,825,000 from RfR02 to RfROI comprising: £115,000 from RfR02: subhead CT to RfROI: subhead D1 representing a transfer of CJS Reserve £40,000 from RfR02: subhead C1 to RfROI: subhead F1 representing a transfer of funding for the OASys IT project £20,000 from RfR02: subhead C1 to RfROI: subhead J1 in respect of long term evaluation contracts £9,600,000 from RfR02: subhead A1 to RfROI: subhead A1 in respect of crime reduction £4,800,000 from RfR02: subhead A1 to RfROI: subhead D1 representing a transfer of CJS reserve, £250,000 from RfR02: subhead C2 to RfROI: subhead AL3 representing a transfer of funding for policing through the National Crime Squad.

(vi) Funding changes:

to provide additional resources of £14,326,000 in subhead A1, £200,000 in subhead A2 and additional income of £14,526,000 in subhead A5 in respect of additional funding from the Youth Justice Board; a reduction of £3,278,000 resources from subhead A1 and a matching reduction of £3,278,000 income from subhead A5 in RfR02 in respect of funding from DfES for prison education an increase of £1,240,000 income in subhead A5 in RfR02 in respect of additional funding from DfES for prison education an increase of £1,400,000 in RfR02: subhead A5 in respect of additional rental income from prison service property Lord Chancellor's Department to RfR01: subhead C5 of £11,760,000 receipts and a corresponding increase in subhead C3 to provide the appropriate provision for payments from the Recovered Assets Fund; HM Treasury to RfR01: subhead K5 of £2,341,000 receipts and a corresponding increase in subhead K1 in respect of the transfer of the lease of Allington Towers.

(vii) Exchange

Video-recorded Interviews

The Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety (Mr John Denham): The Home Office has today made available an additional £2 million for police authorities to provide facilities for video recording interviews with vulnerable witnesses. This funding will help to improve the service that the police can provide to some of the most vulnerable witnesses and victims of crime.

Funding will be distributed by competition and grants will be targeted to provide the greatest benefit to witnesses and to complement other justice initiatives. Bidding guidance and a timetable will be issued shortly.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH OFFICE

Israel (UK Defence Equipment)

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr Jack Straw): In my written reply to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr Campbell) on 15 April 2002, Official Report, col. 723W, I informed Parliament that we had questions about other possible breaches of the Israeli assurances about the use of UK-supplied equipment in the Occupied Territories (OTs) exported under previous Administrations. The Government has looked into the issue further and I am now able to inform Parliament of the outcome of our inquiries.

The only equipment that has been identified as being used by the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) in the OTs, and that can justifiably be regarded as constituting a breach of the assurances, is a combination of Puma and Nachpadon armoured personnel carriers (APCs). These are derivative APCs on a Centurion chassis, which therefore have a significant and recognisable UK content. Parliament was informed of this in Mr Bradshaw's reply to a parliamentary question from Mr Galloway on 11 March 2002.

In our view the Israeli assurances do not cover equipment consisting of components exported by the UK to a third country, which components were then incorporated in that country into products for onward export. The Foreign Secretary's announcement of 8 July 2002 set out how the Government will approach licence applications for goods where it is understood that the goods are to be incorporated into products for onward export.

We intend to inform the Israelis of the results of our inquiries. We shall re-emphasise our current concerns about exporting arms to Israel that might be used against Palestinian targets, and that our policy on assessing Israeli export applications has not changed: we shall continue to assess export licence applications for the proposed export of controlled goods to Israel on a case-by-case basis against the consolidated EU and national arms export licensing criteria.

Our staff will continue to monitor the deployment and the use of equipment by the IDF in the OTs during their regular tours of the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem; and will report to me any sightings of British-supplied equipment.

Departmental Expenditure

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) will be increased by £5,611,000 from £1,463,838,000 to £1,469,449,000 and the administration costs limits will be increased by £60,097,000 from £678,042,000 to £738,139,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted	Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted
82,706,000	1,401,303,000	1,250,326,000	150,977,000	-77,095,000	68,146,000	62,346,000	5,800,000

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from

i. A Public Expenditure Survey (PES) transfer to the Department of Transport of £50,000 in respect of the setting up of a Register of Shipping by the Maritime and Coastguard agency for certain Caribbean Overseas Territories.

ii. A PES transfer to the Ministry of Defence of £183,000 in respect of business rates applicable to the 'Old Admiralty Building—Citadel' formally paid by the FCO and now the responsibility of the MoD.

iii. Reclassification of £62,410,000 from Capital to Resource (Administration costs of £56,810,000, Grants of £5,600,000) to improve budgetary flexibility.

iv. A decrease of £11,750,000 in respect of an adjustment for Overseas Price Movements.

v. An increase in Admin costs of £1,630,000 in respect of increases to Consular services overseas.

vi. A transfer from BBC World Service Capital to BBC World Service Resource of £30,000,000 to facilitate effective management of BBC World Service budgets.

vii. A PES transfer from the Department of Trade and Industry of £100,000 in respect of Invest UK DTI funded overseas slots at the time of the Winter Supplementary Estimate, details of which were not published at the time.

viii. A PES transfer to the Department for International Development (DfID) and Ministry of Defence of £2,000,000 and £4,884,000 respectively in respect of the remainder required to fund planned Conflict Prevention (CP) programme activity to the end of the FY.

ix. A PES transfer from the CP Global Programme pool to DfID and the Ministry of Defence of £250,000 and £572,000 respectively in respect of baseline repatriation to Departments.

x. A PES transfer from DfID of £1,450,000 to fund payment to a Military Officer in Angola, á project management transfer and the FCO's one-third share of the existing CP Africa Pool Reserve.

[illegible] Take up of EYF if £11,531,000 from a combination of underspends on the 2001/02 CP DUP and DfID and FCO CP Programme underspends.

xii. A PES transfer to DfID of £5,000,000 for planned CP programme activities at the time of the Winter Supplementary Estimate, details of which were not published at the time.

xiii. A PES transfer to the Security and Intelligence Agencies of £225,000 for CP activities at the time of the Winter Supplementary Estimates, details of which were not published at the time.

xiv. An increase of £499,000 for additional security at Posts in the Middle East.

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from

i. A PES transfer from the Home Office of £515,000 and £264,000 to defray the extra costs to the FCO of setting up Visa regimes for Zimbabwe and Jamaica.

ii. Reclassification of £62,410,000 from Capital to Resource to improve budgetary flexibility.

iii. A decrease of £585,000 in respect of an adjustment for Overseas Price Movements.

iv. A transfer from BBC World Service Capital to BBC World Service Resource of £30,000,000 to facilitate effective management of BBC World Service budgets.

v. An increase of £5,121,000 for additional security at Posts in the Middle East.

vi. An increase of £10,000,000 to cover a shortfall in non-operating appropriation in aid in respect of asset recycling.

DEFENCE

Departmental Expenditure

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the Ministry of Defence Departmental Expenditure Limits will be increased by £1,552,201,000 from £24,984,813,000 to £26,537,014,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the table:

Resources				Capital
Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted	Change	New DEL	Of which: voted	Non voted
1,034,825	20,177,493	19,787,783	389,710	517,376	6,359,521	6,283,093	76,428

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

An increase of £500,000,000 as a result of the Comprehensive Spending Review 2002 outcome whereby the MOD was provided with a Sustainability Fund to enhance the Department's capability to sustain military operations.

A net reduction of £102,960,000 due to a transfer of £340,000,000 to capital to reflect compliance with the accounting policy change in FRS15, offset by a transfer from capital of £237,040,000 to reflect in-year Departmental re-allocations.

An addition of £21,233,000 towards the MOD's liability to British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.

An increase of £314,000 towards the purchase of two Landing Ship Dock (Auxiliary) vessels, offset by the repayment of an advance in 2001–02 of £1,000,000 towards the purchase of two RoRo ferries. This gives a net decrease of £686,000.

A transfer out of Resource DEL of £120,000 to the Single Intelligence Account relating to electricity charges on a shared site.

A transfer in of Resource DEL of £183,000 from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for the OAB Citadel costs.

An increase of £617,175,000 in the Request for Resource for Conflict Prevention to cover the net additional costs of military operations in Kosovo, Bosnia, the Gulf, Afghanistan and contingency planning for possible operations.

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from:

A net increase of £102,960,000 due to a transfer of £340,000,000 to capital from resource to reflect compliance with the accounting policy change in FRS15, offset by a transfer from capital to resource of £237,040,000 to reflect in-year Departmental re-allocations.

An increase of £48,909,000 for the purchase of two Landing Ship Dock (Auxiliary) vessels.

A reduction of £43,300,000 being the repayment of an advance in 2001–02 for the purchase of two RoRo ferries.

An increase of £1,600,000 from the Capital Modernisation Fund for the Drug Stopper Project.

A transfer in of Capital DEL of £475,000 from the Department of Health for the Diagnostic Treatment Centre at the Royal Haslar Hospital.

An increase of £406,732,000 in the Request for Resource for Conflict Prevention to cover the net additional costs of military operations in Kosovo, Bosnia, the Gulf, Afghanistan and contingency planning for possible operations.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Departmental Expenditure

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Subject to Parliamentary approval of any necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's Departmental Expenditure Limits for 2002–03 will change as follows.

(a) The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Main Programmes DEL will be increased by £68,963,000 from £5,432,646,000 to £5,501,609,000 and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister administration costs limit will be increased by £8,593,000 from £342,131,000 to £350,724,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the following table:

	Resources Change	New DEL	Capital Change	New DEL
Total DEL	+ 33,850	1,955,445	+ 35,113	3,546,164
Of which
Voted	+ 148.589	1,635,990	+ 55,852	1,492,405
Non voted	- 114,739	319,455	- 20,739	2,053,759

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

(i) The changes for Request for Resources 1 are as follows:

Take up of End Year Flexibility of £117,077,000 comprising £7,332,000 for Regional Development Agencies and £109,745,000 for Fire Service costs. A net transfer of £566,000 to non-voted provision consisting of £755,000 transferred from Housing research and publicity partially offset by £185,000 for the Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency and £4,000 for miscellaneous Fire Service expenditure. Take up from the Capital Modernisation Fund of £55,000 for the business regeneration of deprived areas. A technical increase of £156,000 to reflect a transfer from Department of Trade and Industry. A net increase of £1,543,000 arising from the following inter-departmental transfers: £1,280,000 from the Home Office for homelessness strategies, £221,000 from the Department of Trade and Industry for the Business Brokers project, £90,000 from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs for the Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency, £126,000 from the National Assembly for Wales for the Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency offset by receipts of the same value, and £48,000 to the Lord Chancellor's Department for costs of amending Section 26 of the Housing Act. A transfer of £51,800,000 from the Scottish Executive (£18,500,000), the Northern Ireland Executive (£10,000,000) and funds from fire authorities in England and Wales (£23,300,000), matched by equivalent expenditure, for costs of providing emergency fire cover. A transfer of £3,600,000 from Request for Resources 4 for the administration costs for the Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency. A transfer from non-voted capital provision of £25,245,000 to meet: Fire Service costs (£17,959,000), Jubilee fire service medals (£923,000) and Regional Chambers (£6,363,000).

(ii) The changes for Request for Resources 4 are as follows:

Take up of End Year Flexibility of £10,000,000 for administration costs. A net increase of £127,000 arising from machinery of government transfers transfer from the Cabinet office (£1,579,000) partially offset by a transfer to Department for Transport (£1,452,000). A decrease of £5,048,000 arising from other interdepartmental transfers to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (£6,604,000), the Department for Education and Skills (£240,000), the Department of Health (£180,000), the Department for Work and Pensions (£70,000), the Department for Culture, Media and Sport (£20,000), the Department for Transport (£75,000), partially offset by transfers from the Home Office (£1,309,000) and the Office of National Statistics (£832,000). A transfer of £3,600,000 to Request for Resources 1 for the Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency administration costs.

(iii) Provision within the non-Voted resource element of the DTLR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit will be decreased by £114,739,000 to reflect a transfer to the Local Government DEL (£10,062,000), a transfer to the Department for Works and Pensions in respect of Large Scale Voluntary Transfers (£105,243,000), partially offset by a net transfer from voted provision on Request for Resources 1 (£566,000)

(iv) As a result of the changes to Requests for Resources 1, and 4 the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister administration provision has been increased by £18,953,000 from £343,372,000 to £362,325,000.

The change in the capital element of the DEL arises from:

(v) The changes for Request for Resources 1 are as follows:

Take up of End Year Flexibility of £36,540,000 for the Regional Development Agencies. A transfer of £2,110,000 from Request for Resources 4 for the Rent Service Executive Agency (£1,570,000) and the Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency (£540,000). A transfer from non voted provision of £16,979,000 for the Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency (£2,464,000), for miscellaneous Fire Service costs (£11,515,000) and homelessness (£3,000,000).

(vi) The changes for Request for Resources 4 are as follows:,

A transfer of £2,333,000 from the Department for Transport for administration capital. A transfer of £2,110,000 to Request for Resources 1 for the Rent Service Executive Agency (£1,570,000) and the Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency (£540,000).

(vii) Provision within the non-Voted capital element of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit will be decreased by £20,739,000 in respect of a transfer to voted provision on Request for Resources 1 (£42,224,000), a transfer to Local Government DEL (£4,515,000), partially offset by a technical increase of £26,000,000 for the Urban Regeneration Agency.

(b) The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Local Government DEL will be increased by £25,000,000 from £37,684,963,000 to £37,709,963,000. Within the DEL change, the impact on resources and capital are as set out in the following table:

	Resources Change	New DEL	Capital Change	New DEL
Total DEL	+ 25,000	37,428,935	-	281,028
Of which
Voted	+ 25,000	37,336,082	-	273,028
Non Voted	-	92,853	-	8,000

The change in the resource element of the DEL arises from:

(i) The changes for Request for Resources 3 are as follows:

Take up of End Year Flexibility of £10,423,000 of which £5,614,000 has been converted from capital provision within the allowed flexibility to provide support for intervention in Hackney. A transfer of £14,577,000 from the non-voted element of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Main Programmes DEL to provide support for intervention in Hackney.

WALES

Departmental Estimates

The Secretary of State for Wales (Peter Hain): The Wales Departmental Expenditure Limit will be increased by £238,626,000 from £9,349,333,000 to £9,587,959,000. The increase is a result of:

(i) the take up of end year flexibility of £245,000,000 for the National Assembly for Wales

(ii) the take up of end year flexibility of £323,000 for the Office of the Secretary of State for Wales in respect of Administration Costs

(iii) the take up of £150,000 for the Office of the Secretary of State for Wales for the North Wales Child Abuse Inquiry

(iv) net transfers from the National Assembly for Wales to Other Government Departments of £6,847,000

These transfers are as follows:

(i) £ 13,742,000 to the Home Office for Police Funding

(ii) £27,000 from the Home Office for the Confiscated Assets Fund

(iii) £28,000 to the Department of Health for Post Graduate Training

(iv) £89,000 to the Department of Health for Joint Higher Training Committee

(v) £22,000 from the Department of Health for Prison Health Care

(vi) £60,000 to the Scottish Executive for Out of Area Treatments

(vii) £42,000 from the Northern Ireland Executive for Out of Area Treatments

(viii) £4,342,000 from the Department of Health for Out of Area Treatments

(ix) £172,000 from the Department of Health for High Security Psychiatric Services

(x) £1,819,000 from the Department of Health for Errw Vane Prescribing

(xi) £12,000 from the Department of Health for Dental SIFT

(xii) £10,000 to the Department of Health for the Mental Health Act Commission

(xiii) £280,000 to the Department of Health for the Nursing and Midwifery Council

(xiv) £540,000 from the Department of Health for Accelerated Discharge Measures

(xv) £573,000 from the Department for Education and Skills for Medical and Dental Bursaries

(xvi) £93,000 to the Department for Education and Skills for the International Education Programme

(xvii) £94,000 to the Department for Education and Skills for Students on Dance and Drama schemes

The Wales Office Administration Costs Limit will be increased by £473,000 from £2,830,000 to £3,303,000.

The increase in DEL will be offset by transfers from other Departments, from the Reserve or take up of end-year flexibility and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Ruddy Duck Control

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): The North American ruddy duck is an introduced non-native species. A native of North America, where it has a secure conservation status, it was introduced to wildfowl collections in the UK in the 1940s, but a small number escaped from captivity and began to breed in the wild. As the UK population of wild ruddy ducks has risen, so has the number of ruddy ducks on the European mainland. The ruddy duck has been proven to hybridise with the globally threatened white-headed duck in Spain. The West European population of white-headed ducks is estimated at around 2,300 birds and hybridisation is recognised as the most significant threat to the species' long-term survival.

In July 2002, my Department published the results of the ruddy duck control trial, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. The report indicates that eradication of ruddy ducks from the United Kingdom was feasible within ten years, and that shooting was the most effective means of control tested in the trial.

Defra sought advice from its statutory scientific advisors and consulted with the devolved administrations on the outcome of the trial, and the next steps to protect the white-headed duck from the threat of hybridisation. It took the views of landowners and non-governmental organisations, and on 27 February I met representatives of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, the Wildfowl and Wetlands Trust and the Wildlife Trusts.

On the basis of these discussions the Government agree in principle that eradication of the ruddy duck in United Kingdom is the preferred outcome. The UK holds by far the largest proportion of ruddy ducks in Europe, and without action in the UK, the survival of the white headed duck as a distinct species would be severely compromised. However, in confirming this decision, the Government have also concluded:

> that further research work into control techniques is still required. This will determine more efficient techniques of control, and further explore the use of alternative control measures, such as egg pricking; > that the protection provided by domestic legislation to protect the ruddy duck should be removed;
> that the UK cannot act alone in removing the threat posed by the ruddy duck. We will continue to work with our European partners to ensure that all appropriate action is taken to sustain the white headed duck.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH

Bermuda: Order in Council

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mike O'Brien): On 27 February, an Order in Council was made to amend the Constitution of Bermuda. This amendment, which has received widespread political support in Bermuda, will change the system of elections to Bermuda's House of Assembly from 20 dual-seat constituencies to 36 single-seat constituencies, as recommended by the Bermuda Constituency Boundaries Commission in its 2002 report.

The consultation process adopted in deciding upon this amendment has highlighted concerns in Bermuda that there should be a clear and generally acceptable procedure for considering future proposals for constitutional amendment. The Secretary of State wishes to ensure that, subject to the sovereign rights of Her Majesty, the process of considering such proposals is as transparent as possible, and that the citizens and political parties of Bermuda are consulted as widely as possible before changes are made. He has therefore asked the Governor to explore the issue locally to see whether interested parties in Bermuda can come forward with acceptable proposals for procedures to be followed in future, which can then be put to him for consideration. These proposals are to include the means by which the public is consulted over proposed constituency boundary changes when a future Constituency Boundaries Commission is undertaking its work. The Secretary of State understands that the Governor plans to canvass suggestions from individuals, political parties and organisations.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Terrorism (Civil Contingency Planning)

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): The Government moved to strengthen arrangements for emergency planning and civil protection immediately after the 2001 general election. In July 2001 a new Civil Contingencies Secretariat (CCS) was created within the Cabinet Office, bringing together the Home Office's former responsibilities for emergency planning with a new capability at the centre of Government to assess and respond to emergencies as they arise. In August 2001 the CCS published a comprehensive review of emergency planning arrangements in England and Wales.

The September 11 2001 attacks in New York and Washington, however, changed our understanding of the terrorist threat.

In the aftermath of those attacks, the UK Government instigated a comprehensive review of the UK's preparedness and contingency plans to deal with terrorist threats. This led to new organisational arrangements with all relevant Departments working together, co-ordinated at the centre with the Home Secretary in overall charge, and to the passing of the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security (ATCS) Act 2001.

Today the House will debate the continuance of Sections 21–23 of the ATCS Act which are measures designed to pre-empt a terrorist attack. This statement, which will be referred to in the debate, deals with the other side of preparedness which is the ability to respond to an incident if it occurs. The statement sets out improvements in contingency planning that have taken place and announces the next steps in improving our resilience, including plans for legislation.

IMPROVEMENTS TO CONTINGENCY PLANNING

Measures already put in place to improve preparedness to deal with terrorist attacks should they occur are:

Chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear (CBRN) threats

The Home Office leads on dealing with CBRN threats. The first responders, the emergency services, whose capability to cope with these threats is the key to minimising loss of life, have had major investment in equipment and training:

AMBULANCE AND A&E SERVICES

Under a £5 million programme, the Department of Health has provided 360 mobile decontamination units and 7,250 national specification Personal Protection Equipment (PPE) suits around the country, which will enable the Ambulance Service and A&E Departments to treat people contaminated with CBRN material.

POLICE

The CBRN Police Training Centre has been established at Winterbourne Gunner and has already delivered command training to at least four Commanders from each force.

The police now have over 2,350 officers trained and equipped in CBRN response, and this training roll-out is continuing.

FIRE SERVICE

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (HM Fire Service Inspectorate) has signed a Memorandum of Understanding with the Department of Health which provides for Fire Fighters to support the Ambulance Service by decontaminating people at a CBRN incident.

Fire brigades have all been involved in work to prepare for this role and an interim decontamination methodology has been disseminated to all brigades; £43 million from the Capital Modernisation Fund, plus an extra £13 million from ODPM has been provided for the Fire Service to provide a national mass decontamination capability. Procurement of equipment (response vehicles, portable contamination facilities and specialist protective clothing) is underway, supported by development of training.

HEALTH

The Department of Health, in conjunction with Health Departments in Devolved Administrations, is funding measures to counter bio-terrorism: A UK Reserve National Stock of vaccines and antibiotics suitable for the treatment of infectious diseases and specialist equipment has been built up over the past year and now stands ready for deployment. Guidance on handling infectious diseases was disseminated throughout the NHS in October 2001.

As the Minister of State for Health announced on 2 December 2002, 12 Regional Smallpox Response Groups are being established around the UK. Vaccine will be offered to volunteer healthcare personnel who will be able to react quickly and work safely with patients of actual or suspected smallpox. A similar group of specialist military personnel will also receive vaccination against smallpox. We have also identified reference laboratory centres capable of rapid diagnosis of the disease.

A total of £16 million was allocated by the Department of Health in 2001/02 to provide medical counter-measures against CBRN agents and a further £80 million has been allocated for 2002/03, including spending on extra vaccines and antibiotics.

CIVIL NUCLEAR INSTALLATIONS

Companies operating Civil Nuclear Installations have always been required to have in place robust, detailed and well-rehearsed plans for responding to radiological releases. These plans involve the emergency services and local authorities in the surrounding area and are regularly checked by the Nuclear industries Inspectorate.

The arrangements were significantly enhanced following the Chernobyl disaster in 1986, and have been thoroughly reviewed and further enhanced since 11 September 2001.

An improved fire-fighting capability means that fires can quickly be brought under control. Central stores of specialist equipment for use in mitigating the spread of radiation have also been established by the nuclear industry. Contingency plans were tested against the threat posed by a major incident at a live exercise in Bradwell on 10 May last year.

PROTOCOLS AND GUIDANCE

All the emergency services have specific protocols for dealing with chemical or biological attack. These are regularly practised and refined. On 3 February 2003 the Home Office published Strategic National Guidance on the Decontamination of People exposed to Chemical, Biological, Radiological or Nuclear Substances or Materials for use by emergency services and other responders.

NATIONAL CAPABILITY

The Government have in place a programme of work to enhance 11 key generic capabilities that will allow us to respond to the most demanding emergencies, however caused. The Civil Contingencies Secretariat manages this programme and drives the progress of Departments involved in delivering each of the capabilities, which are:

central response

local response

decontamination

site clearance

treatment of infectious diseases treatment of mass casualties

mass evacuation

identification and assessment warning, informing and alerting dealing with mass fatalities.

LOCAL AND REGIONAL CAPABILITY

The local response capability is one of the key building blocks of the UK's resilience. The Government maintain close contact with local responders, including the Local Authorities and the emergency services, through formal and informal channels.

Action has been taken to improve communications with local and regional responders through face to face briefings at senior level, presentations by the Civil Contingencies Secretariat at Emergency Planning College courses and a series of workshops in January and February 2003 in each of the Government Offices of the Regions to brief responders, including Emergency Planning Officers and the emergency services, on plans to enhance the regional resilience capability.

Local Authorities have been allocated a specific Civil Defence grant of £19 million for 2002–3 which is a third more than the previous year. The grant is central government's contribution to civil protection work undertaken by Local Authorities and is just part of what Local Authorities spend on resilience.

LONDON RESILIENCE

London has lived with the threat of terrorism for over 30 years. Operational responses are well co-ordinated, regularly practised and continually reviewed. Since September 11 2001, additional measures taken include:

In 2002–3, £49 million counter-terrorism funding to the Metropolitan police.

Detailed work by London Underground with the emergency services and Security Services to ensure systems are in place to deter or deal with an attack.

A new Cabinet sub-committee for London Resilience and the setting up of the London Resilience Team to review and plan London's preparedness. A new strategic emergency planning regime in the capital has been established, managed by the London Resilience Forum which Nick Raynsford, the Minister for London Resilience, chairs and within which a wide range of interests are represented including the Mayor.

Information is available through http://www.londonprepared.gov.uk.

HORIZON SCANNING

We are now better able to anticipate and prepare for the potential impact of terrorist threats through a new capability within the Cabinet Office to identify potential challenges to the smooth operation of Government or the life of the nation. This complements the work of the Joint Intelligence Committee which provides strategic assessments on domestic and overseas terrorist threats.

ORGANISATIONAL ARRANGEMENTS

Clear leads at Ministerial and Department level have been established and central resources provided to plan and coordinate contingency planning for terrorist threats:

John Denham was appointed Minister for CBRN coordination, reporting to myself, at the end of 2001. The Home Office is the lead Department in preparing and responding to public order and terrorist incidents.

Sir David Omand was appointed as Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator and Permanent Secretary to the Cabinet Office in July 2002 to enhance capacity at the centre to coordinate security, intelligence and contingency management.

The CCS was set up in June 2001 to improve the UK's resilience to disruptive challenge through working with others inside and outside Government on anticipation, preparation, prevention and resolution.

The CCS placed a paper in the Library on 23 July 2002 setting out the role of the lead Government Departments in planning for and managing crises. All Departments have a responsibility to plan, prepare, train and exercise for handling major incidents and emergencies in their areas of responsibility. The Devolved Administrations are responsible for elements of emergency planning in their own jurisdictions and are invited to attend meetings of appropriate Cabinet Office committees to ensure co-ordination across the UK.

We believe this arrangement of central co-ordination, accountable to Ministers, coupled with Departmental responsibility for delivery is the best resilience structure. It engages a wider pool of expertise, avoids the need for a huge new bureaucracy at the centre while at the same time has a clear chain of command.

Information for agencies and the public is available through www.ukresilience.info/ and http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk./

NEXT STEPS IN IMPROVING OUR RESILIENCE

Strengthening Regional resilience

We are improving our ability to co-ordinate planning for major emergencies at a regional level by recruiting resilience teams in each Regional Government Office. Teams will be in place by 1 April 2003. These will be dedicated units, similar to the London Resilience team but on a smaller scale, to enhance regional civil contingency planning, including dealing with terrorist threats and other major emergencies.

From April 2003, each Government Office, in addition to their regular contacts with emergency planning officers, will arrange an annual meeting to bring together senior CCS staff and local emergency planning staff. The Home Office will provide an input on counter-terrorism and CBRN consequence management to these meetings.

A larger role for the Reserves in home defence and security authorities if they are asked to do so.

The Volunteer Reserves are a capable, integrated and usable part of our resource for military operations of all types at home and abroad. The limited measures we are now implementing represent a highly effective way to build a new capability to meet some of the home defence risks which 11 September 2001 highlighted. By the end of 2003 there will be 14 Civil Contingency Reaction Forces (CCRFs), each comprising up to 500 volunteers drawn from existing Reservists. Each will be based on a Territorial Army infantry battalion. Army division and brigade headquarters will provide regional, planning, liaison and command and control capability for home defence operations. Brigades will work closely with the emergency services and local authorities to develop specific plans for the use of CCRFs in their areas.

Any military participation, including the deployment of Reserves, in the response to a counter-terrorist threat would be at the request of the Chief Constable in the Force area where the incident occurred and would be subject to Ministerial decision.

A CO-ORDINATED EXERCISE PROGRAMME

An important element of resilience is the confidence that plans will be effective on the day. A prioritised programme of exercises is being drawn up that will reflect and test effectively the lead Government responsibilities, the involvement of devolved administrations, regional and local authorities and other responders.

Under this new programme of co-ordinated exercises, it will be possible to test whether all key stakeholders are appropriately engaged and working together. Future planned exercises will cover a catastrophic incident in central London (this exercise will take place shortly), disruption to the national gas supply and flood defences. The programme is expected to cover the 11 key capabilities such as mass evacuation and decontamination.

PLANNED LEGISLATION

The Government are preparing new Civil Contingencies legislation—a step recommended by the local emergency planning community. We will issue proposals for a new Civil Contingencies Bill in the summer. The aim will be to > produce a single statutory and regulatory framework for dealing with all forms of disruptive challenge to modern society including those from terrorist attack.

The legislation will enhance the local response by providing clarity and certainty about roles and responsibilities. It will replace existing legislation, which in some cases dates back to the 1920s, with more modern equivalents. The justification for the legislation is the desirability of putting in place for the long term a solid administrative and legal structure within which emergency planning can develop. It is not driven by operational deficiencies in relation to the present counter-terrorist effort.

DEFENCE

QinetiQ (Long-term Partnering Agreement)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Dr. Lewis Moonie): I am pleased to announce that, after 12 months negotiations and restructuring work, the MOD has successfully concluded a long term partnering agreement (LTPA) with QinetiQ for the delivery of the MOD's Test and Evaluation requirements. MOD customers examined a number of options for the delivery of future test and evaluation services and concluded that a long term partnering agreement with QinetiQ was the approach most likely to maximise value for money and ensure the continuing success of these key capabilities.

The new contract, which will take effect from 1 April 2003, will replace the current short-term Facilities Management Contract, which was put in place at QinetiQ vesting and which is due to expire on 31 March.

The LTPA contract, which is worth up to £5.6 billion to QinetiQ over its 25 year life, will progressively introduce efficiency measures and innovation in order to reduce overall Test and Evaluation costs. The contract, which will be the subject of periodic review at agreed intervals, is expected to deliver savings to MOD of around £700 million (at current prices) over its lifetime.

The LTPA establishes a framework within which the MoD's relationship with its contractor can grow. QinetiQ will be given opportunities to develop further innovation and make proposals to achieve better value for money and, based on performance, there will be opportunities for business growth.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Town and Country Planning (Use Classes Order)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): In January 2002, the Government issued a consultation document on possible changes to the Town and Country Planning Use Classes Order. Responses were to be received by 24 April 2002. We received over 2000 responses, which the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has since been considering.

During the course of the Parliamentary debates that have taken place on the Licensing Bill, attention has been drawn to an issue on which we received many representations as part of the Use Classes review. There is widespread concern that the inclusion of pubs and bars with other uses such as restaurants and cafes in the A3 class is contributing to the increase in the number of licensed premises in some areas and that such changes in use do not require planning permission. I have considered these representations carefully and I am announcing today that it is our intention to change the Use Classes Order so as to put pubs and bars into a separate class. The effect of this change will be to require any proposal to change use of an existing building into a pub or bar to apply for planning permission.

I expect to make a full statement on the outcome of our consultation on proposals for changes to the Use Classes Order shortly.

Tall Buildings

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): This statement is to bring to the attention of the House the guidance note on tall buildings prepared jointly by English Heritage and the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment (CABE), published today.

The Government expect new development to be well-deisgned, safe and sustainable, whether it comprises a tall building or low-rise. It considers that all buildings should be designed with regard to their likely impact on their immediate surroundings and the wider environment. The policy is set out in PPG1 General Policy and Principles, and is supported by good practice guidance, By Design. In its response to last year's Select Committee inquiry on tall buildings, the Government encouraged English Heritage and CABE to finalise their draft guidance note Guidance on tall buildings, taking full account of the Committee's recommendations. The Government consider that such a note, in support of Government policy and existing good practice advice, will contribute to sound planning decisions on tall buildings.

The Government therefore welcome the publication of the joint guidance note. The Government consider that the good practice advice provided will be of value to local planning authorities in drawing up their planning policies for tall buildings, and capable of being material to the determination of planning applications.

I will place a copy of the document in the Library of the House of Commons shortly.

DEFENCE

Reservists

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Dr. Lewis Moonie): A new call-out order has been made under section 56 of the Reserve Forces Act 1996 so that reservists may continue to be called out to support operations in Sierra Leone and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. This order will take effect from 1 March 2003, the date the previous order expired. There are no plans to call reservists up compulsorily under this order, as it is expected that the small numbers needed will be met through volunteers for service in those countries.

DEFENCE

Research Acquisition Organisation

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Dr. Lewis Moonie): The defence research community has been subject to major change in recent years. The Public Private Partnership arrangements for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, which led to the formation of QinetiQ, and the establishment within the Ministry of Defence of the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory, coupled with a move towards increased competition in contracting for defence research has required a major change in the management of the defence research programme.

A review of science and technology in defence, commissioned in 2000 by the Ministry of Defence's Chief Scientific Adviser Sir Keith O'Nions, recommended the establishment of a new research management organisation to meet these challenges. This new organisation, called the Research Acquisition Organisation (RAO), comprising up to 80 technical and support staff, will be responsible for formulating a coherent research programme, drawing together the many requirements from across the Ministry of Defence, determining optimum procurement strategies and placing appropriate contracts.

The majority of staff working in this organisation are currently located in two Ministry of Defence buildings in Central London (Northumberland Avenue) although some Research Directors work from other defence sites across the country. This is clearly a sub-optimal solution if the organisation is to function at maximum effectiveness. Recruiting new staff has also been hampered by the lack of sufficient accommodation at a single site. There is therefore a strong business case for collocating all staff in the organisation in one location.

Following an extensive review, the existing Ministry of Defence site at Shrivenham has been identified as the most suitable to collocate the RAO, both from a cost effectiveness perspective but also driven by the requirement for the new organisation effectively to interface with its many customers. Close contact with the Defence Academy at Shrivenham will also be of mutual benefit. Consultation with the Trade Unions on this proposal has now been concluded and no concerns were raised. Ministers have therefore agreed that the move to Shrivenham should take place and it is our aim to commence the move by September this year and that full collocation will be completed by March 2004.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Local Authority Social Housing Grant

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): LASHG was an unfair funding mechanism that did not allocate funds to areas of greatest need, consistently under-spent nationally, and gave unfair advantage to debt-free local authorities.

As part of the measures outlined in "Sustainable Communities: building for the future", we have decided to abolish LASHG to allow a more strategic use of resources. The change is to take effect from 1 April 2003.

We understand the concerns that have been raised over the timing of this change, and recognise the difficulties this is causing for the planning of schemes coming forward over the next few months. However, it would be indefensible to retain the current arrangements, at a time when there are pressing housing priorities that are not getting sufficient funding.

We are also clear that there should be no hiatus in housing investment. We are therefore putting in place transitional arrangements to cover schemes that could have gone ahead in 2003–04 if we had continued with a £500 million provision for LASHG.

The transitional arrangements will be as follows:

> for debt-free authorities, provision will be increased from £175 million to £275 million; the money will be allocated by the Housing Corporation direct to the RSL.
> for with-debt authorities, revenue support of up to £11 million will be provided to compensate them for the loss of investment income (at an interest rate of 4 per cent.) they would have expected on repayments from the Housing Corporation for schemes supported by their own resources; this will fund up to a further £275million of investment in 2003–04; this money will be paid through a special grant under section 88b of the Local Government Finance Act 1988.

These arrangements will cover schemes which will have already started by 31 March 2003. We are also extending the deadline for submitting bids for new schemes to the Housing Corporation for 3 months to 30 June 2003, provided that schemes have planning permission, are approvable and are programmed to draw down the start-on-site tranche of grant by the end of January 2004. We do however need to ensure that the funding limits are not exceeded. If the total claims submitted by 30 June exceed the money available, the Housing Corporation will prioritise schemes with the Government Offices in terms of their contribution to the regional housing priorities. Transitional funding will therefore support investment in housing of up to £550 million. This is an increase of £50 million on the provision for LASHG in 2002–03, and is higher than in any previous year. It is fully in line with the measures we have set out in the Sustainable Communities Plan to increase substantially the resources made available for delivering sustainable communities for everyone.

Social Exclusions Unit Projects

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): With the Prime Minister's agreement, I have asked the Social Exclusion Unit to take on two new projects.

In the first, the Unit will work with other Government Departments to look at what more might be done to help people in the most deprived areas in England move into jobs.

The Unit will consider whether existing policies are being delivered as effectively as possible in these areas. They will look in particular at whether more might be done to promote two ways of entering work: leaving the informal economy for legitimate jobs and businesses; and moving into self-employment and enterprise.

I have also asked the Unit to work with other Government Departments to consider what more can be done to reduce social exclusion among adults with mental health problems.

The Unit will look at how to improve rates of employment for adults with mental health problems, through support both in taking up and in retaining work. The Unit will also consider how to promote greater social participation and better access to services for this group.

I have asked that the Unit report to Ministers on these two new topics early next year.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sex Offenders (Travel Ban)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Hilary Benn): The Government are committed to tackling the sexual exploitation of children wherever it occurs in the world. This includes where UK citizens go abroad with the intention of abusing children. We have already put in place a number of measures to deal with this problem but the Sexual Offences Bill currently before Parliament provides us with an opportunity to ensure that we are doing everything we can to deal with those who commit sexual offences overseas.

Under current legislation the courts do not have the power to stop an offender who has been convicted of sexual offences against children from travelling overseas. We believe this is wrong and that it should be addressed. We therefore intend to bring forward a Government Amendment to the Sexual Offences Bill that will introduce a new foreign travel banning order that will enable courts, in certain circumstances, to prohibit those convicted of a sexual offence against a child from travelling to specified countries. We hope to introduce this amendment by the end of March.

The new order would be a civil preventative order made following an application from a chief officer of police. It would apply to those convicted of a sexual offence against a child under 16 either in the UK or overseas. The order would be available where the court was satisfied that it was necessary to protect children overseas from serious sexual harm by the offender and that there are no other, equally effective means, to prevent such harm. The orders would last for up to six months renewable on further application from the police.

In addition to introducing the proposed foreign travel banning order, we will be consulting with interested parties on the arrangements for the notification of foreign travel by "registered" sex offenders. We are aware that this issue has generated considerable interest. We will consult quickly on this issue with a view to making the Government's intentions clear by the end of March. This will enable our intentions to be considered and debated fully during the passage of the Sexual Offences Bill through Parliament.

A paper with further details on the Government's proposals has been placed in the Library.

TREASURY

The Budget

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): I plan to deliver the Budget Statement on Wednesday 9 April 2003.

Written Ministerial Statements

DEFENCE

Armed Forces Pay Review Body

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): In line with the main Armed Forces' Pay Review Body (AFPRB) recommendations for Armed Forces' Pay announced on 7 February, the Review Body has recommended an interim pay increase of 3.2 per cent. for all regular and reserve defence medical services medical and dental officers. The Review Body also recommends an interim 3.2 per cent. increase to the Sustained Quality Payments, General Medical and General Dental Practitioner Trainer pay and to the value of Distinction Awards. The AFPRB will submit their final recommendations following the announcement of the Doctors' and Dentists' Review Body report later this year and further written and oral evidence from the Ministry of Defence, the British Medical Association and the British Dental Association.

The additional cost to the Defence Budget will be some £5 million. This will be met within existing Departmental expenditure limits.

The Review Body's interim recommendations are to be accepted in full, with implementation effective from 1 April 2003.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Remploy Ltd

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): Following the Mid-Term Quinquennial Review of Remploy Limited, the final report has been published. The report has been distributed to those people formally consulted during the process and copies have been placed in the Library. It is also available on the Jobcentre Plus website http://www.jobcentreplus.gov.uk/Aboutus/Publication in English and Welsh. Hard copies are also available in Welsh, Braille, audio and large print*. We have also agreed an additional £17m to enable Remploy to strengthen its balance sheet and maintain its manufacturing operations. The Mid-Term Quinquennial concluded that: Remploy has been, and remains, the principal delivery agent for the Government's WORKSTEP programme;

The current model of providing Remploy with external finance through an annual grant in aid is appropriate;

The Company's Corporate Plan provides the best option for taking its agenda forward;

The remit, whilst not clearly expressed, is within the parameters of the Government's Welfare to Work strategy; and Remploy's Non-Departmental Public Body status remains the most appropriate vehicle for Remploy to deliver Government policy, ensuring the necessary level of security for its disabled employees and allowing Remploy the freedom and flexibility to operate successfully in a commercial environment.

The recommendations of the Review are as follows:

A set of financing principles should underpin determination of the annual Remploy Financing Limit, together with a clearer framework for the relationship between Remploy and Government;

Remploy's remit needs to be clearly expressed and fully understood by all those involved in the management of Remploy both within the Company and within Government. This remit should be expressed in a new 'Main Agreement' between Remploy and Government; and Remploy's status as a Non-Departmental Public Body should be retained but more explicit governance arrangements need to be implemented to ensure greater clarity in the relationship between the Company and Government.

In addition, I have, on behalf of my Right hon Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, written to the Chairman of Remploy approving the 2002–03 Annual Performance Agreement between the Department and the Company. This agreement covers the year from 1 April 2002. It has been negotiated by the Chief Executive of Jobcentre Plus on behalf of my Right Hon Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. The targets are:

> the average number of progressions of disabled people will increase to 2,000, including a minimum of 1,400 to mainstream unsupported employment;

Remploy Ltd will maintain a total unit cost target (operating deficit per disabled worker) of £10,173;

> the Company will achieve Gross Margin of £53.7m;
> the Company will achieve employee development time of 5 per cent.

The text of the Annual Performance Agreement has been placed in the Library. Remploy published its Report and Accounts for 2001–02 in July 2002 and copies are available in the Library.

* Copies of this publication can be obtained from Disability Support Division, Level 3 East Wing, Rockingham House, Sheffield S1 4ER.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

European Structural and Cohesion Funds

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): My Department is today, in conjunction with Her Majesty's Treasury and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, making proposals for a new European regional policy, and launching a public consultation on the future of the European Structural and Cohesion Funds. The consultation will run until 4 July. I have deposited copies of the consultation document in the House of Commons Library. Electronic versions are available on our Departments' websites.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Right to Buy Scheme

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): The Housing (Right to Buy) (Limits on Discount) (Amendment) Order 2003, reducing the maximum discounts available under the Right to Buy scheme in 41 areas in London and the south of England, has today been laid before Parliament.

To coincide with the laying of the Order, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (ODPM) has today published a report Exploitation of the Right to Buy scheme by companies by Professor Colin Jones of Heriot-Watt University. The full text of the report is available on the ODPM website. http://www.housing.odpm.gov.uk/information/rtb/index.htm

Hard copies of the report have been placed in the Vote Office, Printed Paper Office and the Libraries of the House.

Written Ministerial Statements

Friday 7 March 2003

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Energy

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry: The current British Energy ("BE") Credit Facility Agreement (CFA) came into effect in September 2002 and expires on 9 March 2003.

In my statement to the House on 24 February, I confirmed that the Government would be prepared to continue to fund BE's operations while its restructuring plan was agreed and implemented, and that I was willing to extend the credit facility at a reduced level for a period after 9 March. In that statement, I also confirmed that I intended to apply for state aids approval from the European Commission for this continued financing as Restructuring Aid. This application is being sent to the Commission today.

Sufficient proceeds have been received from the sale of BE's stake in Bruce Power to enable BE to repay all outstanding amounts under the credit facility (amounting to about £215 million including interest and commission) to my Department today. On a contingency basis, I have decided with BE's agreement, to continue the credit facility, with the maximum amount available being reduced from £650 million to £200 million.

The credit facility will be extended to the earlier of 30 September 2004 or the date on which the restructuring plan becomes effective. The controls governing any drawings proposed by BE will remain in place. The credit facility will become repayable if certain milestones in the restructuring process are not achieved. We shall therefore continue to be ready with contingency plans for the administration of BE to ensure safety and security of supply.

Energy Advisory Panel

The Minister for Energy and Construction (Mr. Brian Wilson): As announced in the recently published Energy White Paper (Cm 5761) we propose to establish a Sustainable Energy Policy Advisory Board. Against this background we have reviewed the position of the Energy Advisory Panel.

The Panel has provided very valuable assistance in our analysis of energy policy issues since it was established in 1993. This assistance has included advising Ministers direct as well as Departments. I am particularly grateful for its recent expert help in advising us in relation to the analysis underlying the Energy White Paper.

The Sustainable Energy Policy Advisory Board will advise the new Ministerial Group which will oversee the delivery of the commitments in the White Paper. The Advisory Board will be made up of senior, independent experts. It will provide the Ministerial group with a source of well-informed, independent advice on the approach and work of the network of departmental policy units involved in delivering the white paper. We shall be appointing members to the Advisory Board in due course.

We therefore propose to wind up the existing Energy Advisory Panel and I am writing to the Panel members thanking them for their service.

TREASURY

Finance Bill

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): It is expected that the Finance Bill will be published on Wednesday 16 April. Explanatory notes on the Bill's clauses will be available in the Vote Office and the Libraries of both Houses on that day. Member of the public will be able to obtain copies of the Explanatory Notes from the Treasury; these will also be available on the Treasury's website www.hm-treasury.gov.uk

HOME DEPARTMENT

National Asylum Support Service

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): I have previously announced an independent review of the operations of the National Asylum Support Service (NASS). The independent Review has now been established with the following terms of reference:

> To review the organisation, management and staffing and expertise within NASS to identify changes necessary in the short to medium term to enable it consistently to achieve the appropriate standards of operational and administrative performance. Consideration of the staffing arrangements should include the balance between permanent, consultant and agency staff and the match between the skills of the staff and the job to be done, including the handling of complex and publicly sensitive projects and business. Consideration of the organisational arrangements should extend to relations with the remainder of IND, including whether tasks such as procurement should be centralised within IND and the linkage necessary between procurement and project terms.
> To submit a report, with recommendations, to the Minister of State responsible for immigration matters through the Director General of IND by the end of May 2003.

The independent Review will be conducted by Gill Noble, CB, formerly Director, Law and Order, Health and Local Government, HM Treasury, Ernie Finch, formerly of Marks and Spencer plc and Alan Barnish, retiring Chief Executive of Cambridgeshire County Council.

Written Answers to Questions

The following answers were received between 14 and 21 February 2003

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Afghanistan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proportion of her Department's annual budget for (a) 2001–02 and (b) 2002–03 was allocated to Afghanistan (i) as a proportion of the total annual budget and (ii) in pounds sterling. [97486]

Clare Short: In financial year 2001–02, DFID allocated £60 million to Afghanistan. This represents 1.9 per cent. of my Department's annual budget for that year.

In the current 2002–03 financial year, the allocation for Afghanistan has been increased to £70 million. This represents 2.1 per cent. of my Department's annual budget for the current year.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial resources have been allocated for the year 2003–04 (a) as a percentage of her Department's budget and (b) pounds sterling for Afghanistan. [97487]

Clare Short: My Department has allocated at least £200 million for Afghanistan over the five years 2002–03 to 2006–07. We are currently reviewing our country allocations for the 2003–04 Resource Allocation Round. These will be published in the 2003 DFID departmental report.

Animal Welfare

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to produce a statement of policy on animal welfare based on the report she commissioned entitled Human Development and Animal Welfare; and if she will make a statement. [97694]

Clare Short: We have used a commissioned study on Human Development and Animal Welfare to inform our thinking on animal welfare and livestock-dependent livelihoods. We have no plans to produce a statement of policy on animal welfare.

Health, Education and Water Provision

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of her Department's budget was spent on (a) health, (b) education and (c) water provision in each financial year 1998–99 to 2001–02. [97489]

Clare Short: In the last complete financial year the bilateral aid programme represented 52 per cent. of my Department's spending. The proportion of the bilateral programme allocable by sector spent on health, education and water from 1998–99 to 2001–02 was:

Percentage

	2001–02	2000–01	1999–2000	1998–99
Health and population	20	22	20	17
Education	12	17	14	18
Water and Sanitation	4	4	4	4

These figures represent expenditure on projects specific to these sectors but do not capture the full extent of our efforts in each policy area because they exclude multisector projects and programmes, strategic funding to civil society organisations and budget support and balance of payments. Also excluded are activities funded through multilateral channels.

Computer Crime

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft her Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside her Department. [97561]

Clare Short: The information is as follows:

1. No cases of either computer hacking or computer fraud were recorded in DFID during the period 2001–02.

2. Eight cases of computer theft were recorded during the same period. Seven of these involved the theft of laptop computers:

Three were taken from DFID premises

Two were lost in transit

Two were stolen in break-ins from private homes.

The eighth was a palmtop Personal Digital Assistant that was believed to have been taken from DFID premises.

3. There were no recorded incidents of DFID computer systems being illegally accessed by computer hackers either from within or from outside of the Department during the period 2001–02.

Departmental Consultations

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list consultations her Department has conducted since 1997; and when each consultation (a) opened and (b) closed. [97435]

Clare Short: We do not keep a record of all consultations held since 1997 and it would involve disproportionate cost to compile such a list. However, all current consultations are now featured on DFID's website (www.dfid.gov.uk), as well as being available in printed format.

Domestic Violence

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps she is taking to raise awareness of domestic violence in third world countries; and what developments are being made in providing services for victims. [97745]

Clare Short: Gender equality is an essential precondition for poverty eradication and upholding human rights. Addressing domestic violence is an important component of this work. My Department is making a substantial effort to raise awareness of this complex issue, through partnerships with many poor countries, and with the donor community, including the World Health Organisation, the International Labour Organisation and the UN Development Fund for Women. Support for legal literacy, and access to justice programmes, focus on women and address the root causes of disempowerment and vulnerability to violence—especially domestic, but also by police, and in prisons.

In working to meet our objective to increase women's personal security and reduce gender-based violence, we are supporting for example:

Reform and strengthening of criminal and civil law

Awareness-raising of women's rights among police and judiciary

Public information campaigns

Women's organisations

Improved knowledge and statistics

For illustration, DFID assistance is helping to establish the first family protection unit in the Arab world, providing £2 million over three years in Jordan. We are supporting work to sensitise the police in Bangladesh to violence against women, and counselling for the survivors of domestic violence (£4 million over five years). In Pakistan, we are assisting in the design of a comprehensive national strategy including awareness-raising through a national "zero tolerance" media campaign, and the building of referral systems to provide support and recourse for victims, and for community-based dispute resolution (£2 million over three years). In Uganda, we have supported pilot work to establish policy, procedures and practical measures at community level (£95,000). There are many other similar examples.

Iraq

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) what financial resources have been allocated for the establishment of safe havens in Iraq in the event of war; [97484]

(2) what financial resources have been allocated for the provision of clean water to Iraqi refugees in (a) Turkey, (b) Syria, (c) Jordan, (d) Saudi Arabia, (e) Kuwait and (f) Iran and their borders with Iraq in the event of war; [97492]

(3) what financial resources have been allocated for the provision [illegible] shelter for Iraqi civilian refugees in (a) Turkey, (b) Syria, (c) Jordan, (d) Saudi Arabia, (e) Kuwait and (f) Iran, and their borders with Iraq, in the event of war. [97536]

Clare Short: My Department does not pre-allocate financial resources for response to humanitarian crises before they happen. DFID provides a contingency reserve of £100 million which we will draw on for the Iraqi emergency.

DFID's funding for the UN and other humanitarian agencies includes provision for emergency preparedness for a variety of contingencies across the world. We are supplementing this funding with an additional £3.5 million contribution to support UN humanitarian contingency planning for Iraq, including the prepositioning of basic supplies by UN agencies including UNHCR. We also fund a programme of assistance to Iraqi Refugees in Iran, which is managed by AMAR Appeal, an NGO, and consists of the provision of emergency supplies and primary health care for refugees living both in and outside of official camps.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) what discussions she has had with Save the Children regarding research they have carried out on the impact of any impending war against Iraq on Iraqi children; and if she will make a statement; [97603]

(2) what discussions she has had to help ensure that Iraqi people receive aid in terms of food, water, clothing and accommodation in the event of a war against Iraq; and if she will make a statement; [97605]

(3) what discussions she has had with aid organisations regarding the possible impact of a war against Iraq on existing food aid deliveries; and if she will make a statement. [97602]

Clare Short: The Iraqi people, including the children who make up half of the population, are already vulnerable. The prevalence of low birth-weight babies has increased more than five times in the last 10 years. A sudden disruption to this already fragile situation, including to the UN Oil for Food programme on which 60 per cent. of Iraqi people are dependent, could lead to a spiralling human catastrophe.

My Department is holding regular discussions with the Ministry of Defence, the US, UN and others about ways to minimise the suffering of the Iraqi people. One key priority would be to re-establish the Oil For Food distribution network as quickly as possible if it is disrupted. We are also providing an additional £3.5 million funding for support to UN humanitarian contingency planning for Iraq, including the prepositioning of food and other essential supplies. My officials continue to discuss the humanitarian situation with NGOs, especially those who we are funding for ongoing humanitarian work in Iraq, including Save the Children.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with the United Nations regarding their estimates of the number of (a) children under five at risk of death, (b) mothers and children needing food and (c) people needing shelter in the event of a war in Iraq; and if she will make a statement. [97604]

Clare Short: My Department holds regular discussions with UN agencies about the humanitarian situation in Iraq and measures to respond to any crisis. United Nations planning estimates of the numbers who may be affected vary according to different scenarios of the extent and length of disruption to existing systems.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what extra money is being made available for helping Iraq after possible military intervention. [97847]

Clare Short: DFID provides a contingency reserve of £100 million which we will draw on for the Iraqi emergency.

Kyrgyzstan

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proportion of the UK aid budget was given to Kyrgyzstan in each of the last five years; and if she will make a statement. [97165]

Clare Short: Figures on the total UK bilateral programme spend within which Kyrgystan is included is shown in the table:

£ million

	Total UK programme	Spend Krygystan
1997–98	1,439	0.5
1998–99	1,382	0.5
1999–2000	1,655	1.2
2000–01	1,758	1.5
2001–02	1,954	1.8

In addition the following amounts of UK funds were channelled through multilateral organisations, on a calendar year basis, over the same period:

UK imputed multilateral shares

	£ million
1997	11.6
1999	2.8
2000	5.9

Laptops

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many laptop computers were used by (a) Ministers and special advisers and (b) officials in her Department in each year since 1995; how many were (i) lost and (ii) stolen; what their cost was; and if she will make a statement. [97502]

Clare Short: In September 2001 there was a change in the system used by my Department for recording the number of laptops in the temporary loan pool. All previous records have been destroyed. There are currently 134 laptop computers in the pool and they are available for use by Ministers, special advisers and officials in my Department.

The number of laptops purchased by DFID by financial year is as follows:

Financial year	Number of laptops purchased
1995–96	57
1996–97	185
1997–98	121
1998–99	125
1999–2000	148
2000–01	265
2002–03 (to date)	308

A total of 20 laptop computers were stolen during the 7-year period 1 April 1995 to 31 March 2002. None were lost. The breakdown by financial years with costs is as follows:

	Number of laptops	Value
1995–96	2	2,387.50
1996–97	2	1,986.00
1997–98	2	2,732.00
1998–99	Nil
1999–2000	3	4,420.00
2000–01	8	8,678.56
2001–02	3	3,497.25

Online Sales/Purchases

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what (a) products, (b) goods and (c) services were (i) bought and (ii) sold online by her Department in each of the last five years. [97463]

Clare Short: DFID purchases a small range of low value goods online, mainly IT peripherals, stationery, books and office equipment. Total expenditure records are not held centrally and could be produced only at disproportionate cost. DFID does not currently purchase services on-line.

DFID has started using the Government Procurement Card, which will increase our electronic purchasing. We do not sell products, goods, or services.

Overseas Assistance

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial resources from the UK Government have been (a) pledged and (b) transferred to (i) Afghanistan and (ii) Kosovo, broken down by (A) Government Department and (B) departmental budget heading. [98005]

Clare Short: In July 1999, DFID pledged £90 million in humanitarian assistance to Kosovo. This was followed by a further pledge of £29 million in November 1999. In February 2001, we pledged a further £6.95 million as budget support and £5 million as technical assistance for 2001.

Since these pledges were made, we have disbursed £108 million as humanitarian aid, £14 million as budgetary support and £8.6 million as technical assistance. In addition, we have contributed substantially through our share of the EC's development assistance to Kosovo, which has amounted to £122 million since 1999.

On Afghanistan, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave her at column 1W above.

We are unable to provide details of funding from other Government Departments, as this information is not held centrally.

Reproductive Health Services

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list her Department's bilateral funding commitments to reproductive health services in each country in 2001. [97672]

Clare Short: The following table shows DFID commitments, including multi year commitments, made under the bilateral programme, to reproductive health activities, including HIV/AIDS, in 2001–02:

Country	Commitments
Bangladesh	6,940,159
Belarus, Republic of	150,000

World Trade Organisation

Mr. John Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make it her policy to encourage the World Trade Organisation to (a) give a higher priority to and (b) treat with greater urgency issues brought by poor countries under special and differential treatment. [97960]

Clare Short: We are giving high priority to the issue of special and differential treatment for developing countries in the WTO. An effective system of special and differential treatment is a key element in ensuring that the current round of WTO negotiations is truly a development round. Special and differential treatment needs to ensure that the implementation of WTO rules and efforts to negotiate and implement future disciplines make sense from a development perspective.

DFID is working with other key partners such as the World bank in order to push this issue forward. As part of this on-going programme of work, DFID will be hosting a seminar on special and differential treatment on 7 March this year which will be attended by representatives of the WTO, UNCTAD, the World bank, and developing country Governments, as well as NGOs and academics working in the area.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Airport Policing

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why PSNI officers are not permanently stationed at Belfast City Airport; and if he will make a statement. [94450]

Jane Kennedy: The Police Service of Northern Ireland are not employed in an overt policing role at any airport in Northern Ireland, including Belfast City Airport. The provision of armed police at Belfast City Airport is currently being considered by Belfast City Airport.

Energy (Northern Ireland) Order 2003

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will confirm whether there will be a difference in the treatment of gas pipeline companies involved in gas transportation for Northern Ireland whose pipelines would be designated under the Energy (Northern Ireland) Order 2003. [98365]

Mr. Pearson: All discussions to date with interested parties regarding the postalisation of gas conveyance charges in Northern Ireland have been conducted in an open and transparent manner. All future issues pertaining to the designation of pipelines and the implementation of postalisation will be dealt with in the same manner. In implementing postalisation, the Department will of course comply with its legal obligations including those under Community Law such as Article 3, paragraph 1 of Directive 98/30EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 June 1998 concerning common rules for the internal market in natural gas, which requires Member States not to discriminate between natural gas undertakings such as pipeline operators as regards either rights or obligations.

Firefighters' Dispute

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the impact of the firefighters' dispute in Northern Ireland. [98332]

Mr. Browne: Throughout the periods of industrial action by the Fire Brigades Union, the emergency fire cover service provided by the armed forces, supported by the police service for Northern Ireland and the retained firefighters who were not on strike, was able to deal effectively with all major fire-related and road traffic incidents. The armed forces operated well within capacity and there were no major disruptions to transport or other essential public services as a result of the dispute.

Although there were a number of road traffic fatalities and two fire-related deaths during the strikes, there are no indications that any of these deaths could have been avoided had normal fire cover been available.

We have always maintained that the alternative fire arrangements provided by the armed forces cannot replicate the normal firefighting capability. I therefore welcome the Fire Brigades Union decision not to set any new strike dates and to again engage in a fresh round of negotiations at the National Joint Council under the auspices of ACAS, to find a negotiated and fair settlement to this dispute.

Fisheries

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money was made available through the 2002 Northern Ireland fishing vessel decommissioning scheme; how many applications were received; how many successful applicants decommissioned their vessels; how many successful applicants declined decommissioning; how much of the available funding is left; and if he will allocate remaining funds to the original bidders who were unsuccessful in their application to the scheme. [97571]

Mr. Pearson: The information is as follows: (1) Under the Fishing Vessel Decommissioning Scheme (Northern Ireland) 2001 £5 million was made available for vessel decommissioning; 66 applications were received; 27 successful applicants have decommissioned their vessels and a further two successful applicants have accepted the offer of decommissioning grant; six successful applicants have declined decommissioning grant; and £0.6million of available funding is left.

(2) I have recently announced a new decommissioning scheme, whose terms and conditions will take account of those applying elsewhere in the United Kingdom. It is not my intention at this time to make any further offers under the existing scheme.

Foundation Hospitals

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to accord foundation status to hospitals in Northern Ireland. [98333]

Mr. Browne: I have no plans at present to extend NHS Foundation Trusts to Northern Ireland.

Linguistic Diversity

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the draft linguistic diversity policy of the National Museums and Galleries of Northern Ireland was completed for submission to the Chief Executive. [98200]

Angela Smith: The Chief Executive of the National Museums and Galleries of Northern Ireland has been actively involved in the development of the draft linguistic diversity policy from an early stage. It is therefore the members of the Board of Trustees rather than the Chief Executive to whom the draft policy is submitted.

A first draft was prepared in 1999, but it soon became clear that more work was required, and the Trustees agreed to set up a small working group to take the matter forward. The outgoing Trustees did not have an opportunity to consider the next draft before the end of their term of office in June 2002. Since then, some further detailed work has been carried out, and it is hoped that the new Board will be able to consider and formally adopt the new draft shortly.

Nurse Recruitment

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on nurse recruitment in Northern Ireland during each of the last three years. [98334]

Mr. Browne: Recruitment of qualified nursing staff is a matter for HSS Trusts as employers. In recognition of recruitment difficulties, the number of pre-registration nurse training places was increased from 580 to 680 in 2001 and from 680 to 750 in 2002.

The number of qualified nurses and midwifes employed in the HPSS as at 31 December 2000, 2001 and 2002 was 13,607, 13,645 and 14,670 respectively.

There are currently 1,863 pre-registration nursing students with another 160 expected to commence training next month.

Public Liability Insurance

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the number of insurance underwriters prepared to quote for public liability insurance for charities working with children in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [98263]

Mr. Browne: There have been a number of reports within the Northern Ireland voluntary and community sector of significant increases in relation to public liability insurance costs. There have also been reports stating that organisations perceived by insurers to represent a greater risk, include groups involving children. I understand that there have been reports throughout the United Kingdom.

To date no assessment has been made of insurance brokers prepared to quote for charities working with children in Northern Ireland. Representatives from the voluntary and community sector are still gathering details of the extent of the problem faced by the sector as a whole in Northern Ireland. This information will be provided in due course to the Joint Government Voluntary and Community Sector Forum. The information will then be relayed to officials in Great Britain who are responsible for this matter on a UK wide basis.

Red Button Alert Device

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much was distributed through the Social Fund for the red button alert device scheme in Northern Ireland in each year since 2000; how many people have a red button alert device; what plans he has to increase free provision of the red button alert device for pensioners; and what plans he has to update the red button alert device technology. [98363]

Mr. Browne: Information is not available on the value of Social Fund payments which have been made in respect of the red button alert device. The Social Security Agency has specific arrangements in place with groups in the voluntary sector who represent pensioner interests to ensure that requests for help to purchase this particular device are dealt with promptly.

At this time there are no plans to increase free provision of the red button alert devices. As the device is not the responsibility of the Department we do not hold information regarding the updating of the technology.

Where the provision of the red button alert device forms part of an assessed care management package the cost may be funded from the relevant Health and Social Services Trust's budget.

PRIVY COUNCIL

Ministerial Cars

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Council (1) what progress has been made in the last three years in replacing (a) his and (b) his predecessor's ministerial car on a lower emission basis; and what type of (i) power unit and (ii) fuel each car used by him and his predecessor in the course of his ministerial duties used; [97016]

(2) at what annual rate he or his predecessor has replaced his ministerial car in the course of the last three years. [97018]

Mr. Robin Cook: The information requested is as follows:

		Present car		Previous car[1]
Minister	Date changed[2]	Power unit (litre)	Fuel used	Power unit (litre)	Fuel used
Robin Cook MP	22 October 2002	2.6	Unleaded	2.5	Unleaded
Ben Bradshaw MP	17 April 2002	2.0	Unleaded	1.8	Unleaded

[2] Only such change in the past three years.

Both past and present ministerial cars were leased under an agreement with the Government Car Service (GCS). The types of car provided followed the "Prime Minister's guidance on travel by Ministers".

GCS recognises that reducing vehicle omissions is a key transport issue and a Government priority. Against a baseline of 2002–03, GCS aims by 31 March 2006 to reduce road transport vehicle carbon dioxide emissions by at least 10 per cent. and to require at least 10 per cent. of fleet cars to be alternatively fuelled. Moreover, the Deputy Leader and I both endeavour to use public transport, cycle or walk, where value for money and time constraints permit.

CABINET OFFICE

Computer Crime

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft his Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside his Department. [97554]

Mr. Alexander: Within my Department and its Agencies during 2001–02 there have been no cases of computer hacking from (i) within or (ii) outside and no instances of fraudulent use of computers although there has been one theft in 2001–02.

Electricity

Norman Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what changes in unit payments for electricity have resulted from the switch by his Department to purchasing renewable energy which is exempt from the Climate Change Levy. [96398]

Mr. Alexander: The switch to purchasing Climate Change Levy exempt renewable energy has resulted in a 2.14 per cent. (average) increase in cost.

In view of the considerable contribution to the ENV (G) target and associated CO_2 savings, Cabinet Office agreed to pay the additional cost to secure a 12 month contract for the supply of electricity from entirely renewable sources to three buildings on its central London estate. This contract came into effect on 1 October 2002.

Entertainment Expenditure

Mr. Laws: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what reasons underlie the change in his Department's entertainment expenditure between 1998–99 and 2001–02; and if he will make a statement. [95433]

Mr. Alexander: The increase in entertainment expenditure between 1998–99 to 2001–02 is mainly a result of the Cabinet Office's widening span of responsibilities in recent years and Machinery of Government changes. There has been a corresponding rise in necessary entertainment expenditure by an increased staff resource. All expenditure is in accordance with published departmental guidance on financial procedures and propriety based on the principles set out in Government Accounting.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Court Video Links

Geraint Davies: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if she will provide additional funding to extend the use of live links to enable witnesses other than the defendant to give evidence through a live link in criminal proceedings. [97901]

Yvette Cooper: Video link equipment is used in the Crown and magistrates' courts for two purposes: to enable defendants held in custody to participate in pre-trial hearings without having to attend court; and to allow vulnerable or intimidated witnesses to give evidence from outside the courtroom.

All Crown Court centres have TV link equipment, which allows witnesses to give evidence from outside the courtroom but within the court building. 12 Crown Court centres have video conferencing facilities, which allow witnesses to give evidence from a remote location. In addition, equipment linking courtrooms with specific vulnerable and intimidated witness rooms will be installed in 29 Crown Court centres by the end of 2003. This equipment will also allow witnesses to give evidence from a remote location.

133 vulnerable and intimidated witness rooms had been installed in magistrates' courts by the end of September 2002. Work is currently under way to establish the number of additional video links that are required to meet current and future demand. The Court Service will then liaise with Criminal Justice System partners, including the Crown Prosecution Service and the Home Office, on how to take this forward.

Geraint Davies: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what measures her Department is putting in place to ensure that the waiting time for child witnesses is kept to a minimum where the use of a live link is required. [97902]

Yvette Cooper: Crown and magistrates' courts ensure that priority is given to cases involving children or other vulnerable or intimidated witnesses. Courts offer fixed dates for trial at the earliest possible opportunity, subject to the readiness and availability of those involved in the case. Additional video links are being installed in the Crown Courts during 2003. The provision of equipment in the magistrates' courts is now under review to ensure that current and future demand is met, as far as funding allows.

Capital Projects

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if she will place the evaluations for Capital Modernisation Fund projects in the Lord Chancellor's Department since 1998 in the Library; and if she will make a statement. [97031]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department received funding for three projects from the Capital Modernisation Fund for a range of initiatives contributing towards modernisation in the courts. As the projects have not concluded, a full evaluation report is not yet available.

Computer Crime

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft her Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside her Department. [97562]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The number of cases of computer hacking, fraud and theft recorded by my Department in 2001–02 is: computer (a) hacking—2; (b) fraud—0; (c) theft—25. Illegal access by computer hackers in 2001–02 (i) within the Department—1; (ii) outside the Department—1. Neither of the hacking incidents caused damage to the Departmental computer systems.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps her Department is taking to inform victims of domestic violence of their rights. [96736]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Government remain committed to tackling domestic violence. My Department's main responsibility is to make sure that victims of domestic violence have a swift and effective route to protection and perpetrators of violence are brought to justice.

We were involved in the production of the Law Society's "Family Law Protocol", which covers best practice in all aspects of private family law disputes, including domestic abuse. One of the many actions we are currently taking is to look at good examples of inter-agency working at local level, from which we shall produce a template of good practice.

I have set up a Domestic Violence Advisory Group that consists of people from voluntary organisations, lay magistrates, judges and police officers. We use these experts to make sure that our policies have a real impact in improving the lives of the families who suffer as a result of domestic violence.

The Community Legal Service (CLS) Just Ask! website provides on-line CLS leaflets and an up-to-date CLS Directory of legal suppliers, including solicitors, law centres and Citizens Advice Bureaux within England and Wales. The site also provides legal information in different languages and an Advice Search function so that users can search for legal information and advice from a selection of about 300 screened and approved sites. The Legal Services Commission produces a "Divorce and Separation" leaflet which gives information about further help and contacts. The LSC have plans to produce a new leaflet specifically covering domestic violence which they hope will be available in the summer.

Margaret Moran: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) when she plans to consult on new guidance in respect of child contact and domestic violence; [97741]

(2) when the second survey of guidelines on domestic violence and contact will be available; and if she will place a copy in the Library. [97740]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The report on the second survey to monitor the "Children Act Sub-Committee Guidelines for Good Practice on Parental Contact in Cases where there is Domestic Violence" will be available at the end of March 2003. A copy will be laid in the Library of both Houses. No other recent guidance in respect of child contact and domestic violence has been issued.

E-mail Addresses

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department by what e-mail address members of the public may contact (a) The Lord Chancellor and (b) each of the Ministers in her Department; and for each e-mail address if she will state (i) the date it became active and (ii) the number of e-mails received in each month since activation. [97452]

Yvette Cooper: Members of the public may contact the Lord Chancellor and each of the Ministers in his Department via the following e-mail addresses:

LordChancellor@lcdhq.gsi.gov.uk (this e-mail address became active on 6 January 1999);

Baroness.Scotland@lcdhq.gsi.gov.uk (active from 12 June 2001);

Rosie.Winterton@lcdhq.gsi.gov.uk (active from 12 June 2001);

Yvette.Cooper@lcdhq.gsi.gov.uk (active from 29 May 2002).

It has not proved possible, in the time available, to collate information on the volume of e-mails which have been received by each e-mail address since activation. However this information is being collated and I will write to the hon. Member with the information shortly.

External Consultancies

Mr. Laws: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much (a) his Department and (b) each agency and non-departmental public body spent on external consultancy in each year from 1995–96 to 2002–03 (planned); and if he will make a statement. [92236]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The information available (1995–96 to 2001–02) is provided in the table.

A record of planned expenditure for the current financial year is not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. Information relating to actual spend will be collated early in the next financial year.

The level of expenditure in recent years with external consultants is explained by a wide-ranging and fast paced programme of change, designed to modernise and increase efficiency, provide better customer service, and value for money.

Delivering such a programme has necessitated the use of external expertise to supplement internal resources.

Transsexual People

Lynne Jones: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the Government will make it their policy to use the powers under Section 10 and Schedule 2 to the Human Rights Act 1998 to bring UK legislation in line with the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Goodwin and I v UK (judgment of 11 July 2002); and if she will make a statement. [96888]

Ms Rosie Winterton: As I announced on 13 December and in my written ministerial statement on 16 December, Official Report, column 36WS, the Government are committed to legislating as soon as possible to give transsexual people their Convention rights. We have decided against using a Remedial Order under the Human Rights Act because the Convention issues go beyond identifying possible incompatibilities with current law. The necessary response is so wide-ranging that only a Bill would be appropriate. I have corresponded on this subject with the Joint Committee on Human Rights, which agrees that proceeding by way of a Bill is the only proper approach in the circumstances.

We are therefore taking forward work towards a draft Bill which we hope it will be possible to publish during the course of this session of Parliament.

Heritage and Antique Assets

Mr. Laws: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what sales of heritage assets and antique assets have been made by his Department since May 1997; if he will list such assets; and if he will estimate the total sales proceeds. [92369]

Yvette Cooper: The Department's current fixed asset register came into being in April 1999 and it confirms that no operational heritage or antique assets have been sold since that date. Prior to April 1999 we have no specific records on heritage or antique asset disposals. However, it has never been my department's policy to dispose of such assets.

Access to Justice (Homeless People)

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what action has been taken to improve legal access and representation to homeless people. [96738]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Through the ongoing development of the Community Legal Service (CLS), the Legal Services Commission (LSC) is working to improve access to justice in England and Wales for all. In addition to the £734 million spent in total last year on civil legal aid, the LSC has introduced a variety of initiatives to improve access to legal advice and meet the representation needs of the socially excluded including a number aimed specifically at those with housing problems, and the homeless. These include a pilot project funding duty schemes in the county courts to cover housing possession cases; and spending £2 million per year on a telephone advice pilot under which several housing advice services are providing legal help. We are also working to integrate the CLS into a number of cross Government initiatives on tackling social exclusion and working closely with other Departments to increase the number of quality marked outlets for CLS information. At a regional level, CLS Partnerships have also helped to improve access to legal help through grants from the Partnership Innovation Budget and joint work with Local Strategic Partnerships.

Legal Services (Consumer Choice)

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what progress has been made in increasing consumer choice in legal services. [96737]

Ms Rosie Winterton: In April 1998, the Institute of Legal Executives joined the Bar Council and the Law Society as an authorised body in its own right and as a fully fledged part of the legal profession, in November 1999, the Chartered Institute of Patent Agents was similarly designated. These developments represent a small but important increase in the number of people qualified to appear before the courts, widening the availability of legal services to the public. Reform of the law relating to conditional fees agreements has also allowed innovative products to be developed which have increased the funding options available to individuals with winnable cases.

The Government remains keen to remove restrictive practices not in the public interest. The removal of such practices could provide an incentive for lawyers, or other providers, to introduce innovative, high quality and affordable services to the public. In most cases, open and competitive markets are the best way to ensure that consumers get the best possible service, while continuing to protect consumers and ensuring probity. The Government has consulted on matters that fall to it following on from the Office of Fair Trading's report on competition in professions. We are currently considering the responses to that consultation.

Lord Chancellor (Income)

Norman Baker: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what the total income from public funds of the Lord Chancellor has been for each year from 1 May 1997, broken down by (a) salary and (b) expenses claimed. [96417]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Lord Chancellor's annual salary during the period in question and from the date shown in each case was as follows:

1 April 1997	140,665
1 December 1997	142,506
1 April 1998	148,850
1 December 1998	151,002
1 April 1999	160,011
1 April 2000	167,760
1 April 2001	173,875
1 April 2002	180,045

Under section 3 of the Ministerial and other Pensions and Salaries Act 1991 and the Ministerial and Other Salaries Order 1996 the Lord Chancellor's salary is set at £2,500 more than the salary of the Lord Chief Justice for England and Wales. In a recently published report the Senior Salaries Review Body (the SSRB) stated that it was proposing to review the relationship between judicial salaries and those of the Senior Civil Service. The Lord Chancellor has asked that this review be extended to cover the statutory relationship between his own salary and that of the Lord Chief Justice.

The Department's Ministers do not have personal expense accounts. Costs incurred by Ministers, in the course of their official duties, are met by the Department. Occasionally, Ministers pay such costs themselves and are then reimbursed, rather than having them billed direct to the Department. Since 1 May 1997, the Lord Chancellor has paid, and been reimbursed for, the following amounts. These costs were incurred in furtherance of departmental objectives including, for example, the provision of hospitality to overseas judges.

1998–99	149.71
1999–2000	1,113.49

Marriage and Relationship Support

Mr. Flook: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the Marriage and Relationship Support branch of the Department will include the use of pre and post marital psychometric inventories as part of the criteria for considering bids for LCD grants. [96499]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The criteria currently used for evaluating bids received in 2002 for funding in 2003–04 are derived from recommendations set out in the strategy document "Moving Forward Together", published by the Lord Chancellor's Advisory Group on Marriage and Relationship Support ("AGMARS") in April 2002: and also from wider Government objectives to support the family and children.

No decisions have yet been taken over the criteria which will be applied in the next MARS bid round, which is schedules from launch in Summer 2003. Inclusion of specific criteria in the next bid round will depend on the extent to which they can assist in achieving the strategic objectives of AGMARS and/or the wider Government family policy objectives.

Mr. Flook: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what proportion of, and how many, grants given by the Marriage and Relationship

Support branch of the Department in each year since 1997 [illegible]re to organisations that use psychometric testing [illegible]eir clients. [96500]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Information on the details of Marriage and Relationship Support ("MARS") grant funding since 1997 is not held centrally in sufficient detail to be able to provide a substantive response to this question. A number of relationship support service providers who have received—or are currently receiving—MARS funding from the Department use various models of psychometric testing as part of their couple support work.

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what recent assistance his Department has given to Relate to strengthen family relationships. [96735]

Ms Rosie Winterton: We have paid the following core and project funds to Relate, from the annual Marriage and Relationship Support grant fund, in the last three financial years:

£000

	Core	Project
2000–01	2,053	344
2002–03	2,104	102

All MARS funding made to Relate helps to deliver the overarching objective of strengthening adult couple relationships—a key element of strengthening family relationships more widely. Support for relationships can make a significant contribution to reducing relationship breakdown and its adverse impact, especially on children.

Public Guardianship Office

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many outstanding items of casework there were at the Public Guardianship Office in the last four quarters. [97142]

Ms Rosie Winterton: At the end of April 2002 there were 15,356 outstanding items of casework, at the end of July 15,580, at the end of October 6,510 and at the end of January 3,637.

Solicitors (Complaints)

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many complaints the Department received about the performance of solicitors in each of the last five years; and if she will make a statement. [97940]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I would refer my hon. Friend to my answers on 15 March 2002 to his earlier questions, Official Report, column 1282W. I also refer him to the statement that was made on 30 January 2003, Official Report, column 174W, informing the House that the Lord Chancellor had appointed Dr. Zahida Manzoor as Legal Services Ombudsman.

Special Advisers and Press Officers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many (a) special advisers and (b) press officers have been employed by his Department in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and at what cost in each year. [92432]

Ms Rosie Winterton: In relation to (a), I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Minister of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Alexander), on 31 January 2003, Official Report, column 1056W.

With regard to (b), the number of press officers employed by the Lord Chancellor's Department and Court Service since 1994 is as follows:

	Press Officers	Paybill (£)
1994–95 to 1998–99	3	not available
1999–2000	3	146,558
2000–01	5	152,840
2001–02	6	186,894
2002–03	10	not yet available

The number of press officers does not include the Director and Deputy Director of Communications who also include media work among their responsibilities.

The increase in numbers of press officers reflects the increasing workload of my Department, including extra responsibilities transferred to us from other Government Departments following machinery of Government changes.

Full annual paybill figures prior to 1999–2000 are not available because press office functions were incorporated into a new group in 1998 and the Department changed accounting systems.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Capital Projects

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will place the evaluations for Capital Modernisation Fund projects since 1998 in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [97028]

Mr. McCartney: The Capital Modernisation Fund provides capital funding for innovative projects which will deliver genuine improvements in public services. It is a requirement of receiving this funding that the Department has robust arrangements in place for the implementing, monitoring and final evaluation of these projects.

Round 1 provided resources to develop a sophisticated IT and call centre system to match jobseekers to employers, final evaluation reports for these were produced in July 2002 and have subsequently been placed in the Library.

Round 2 provided funding for an electronic claim form and telecentre costs to deliver the Minimum Income Guarantee. Initiatives within MIG are awaiting evaluation reports and will be placed in the Library in due course.

Round 3 provided funding for WORKSTEP, a project to provide support in work to disabled people facing complex barriers to working. This project is ongoing and due for completion in 2003–04.

Round 4 provided funding for three projects, Interactive e Services, Modernising Appeals and Transport and Worklessness. These projects are all in the very early stages and as such have not yet reached the evaluation process.

When the rounds are completed the Department is committed to placing the evaluation reports in the Library in due course.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the annual rate is at which his Department and its agencies renew their vehicle fleets, by (a) volume and (b) percentage for each (i) category of vehicle, (ii) type of power unit, and (iii) type of fuel. [97970]

Mr. McCartney: Petrol and Alternatively Fuelled vehicles are replaced when they have covered 80,000 miles, are four-years-old or when they become financially non viable to retain, which ever comes first.

Diesel vehicles are replaced when they have covered 100,000 miles, are four-years-old or when they become financially non viable to retain, whichever comes first.

The percentage of vehicle replaced each year depends on the size of the fleet that continually fluctuates in line with essential business needs.

There is a continual audit and review of fleet requirements based on the daily usage and mileage covered by all our vehicles. The overall size of the fleet has been reduced by 382 vehicles compared to the fleet of the former Department for Social Security and the former Employment Service in April 2001.

Entertainment Expenditure

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what his estimate is of the total spending of his Department on entertainment in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [92401]

Mr. McCartney: All expenditure on official entertainment is made in accordance with published departmental guidance on financial procedures and propriety, based on the principles set out in Government Accounting.

It is not possible to provide expenditure figures back to 1994–95 for the Department for Work and Pensions as it was only created with effect from 1 April 2001. The figures for 2001–02 and 2002–03, therefore, are the only expenditure figures relating to the Department for Work and Pensions.

In order to provide figures which are reasonably comparable, information for the earlier years has been provided by combining expenditure on "official hospitality" by the former Department of Social Security, and on "official entertainment" by the former Employment Service (ES) which, together with relatively small numbers of staff from the Employment Policy Divisions of the former Department for Education and Employment (DfEE), combined to form the new Department for Work and Pensions. However, information on entertainment expenditure by ES is only available from 1996–97 onwards, whereas expenditure by the former DfEE Policy Divisions is not separately identifiable.

Estimated expenditure on this basis is set out as follows:

	£	Department
1994–95	127,000	DSS
1995–96	100,000	DSS
1996–97	147,000	DSS and ES
1997–98	46,000	DSS and ES
1998–99	86,000	DSS and ES
1999–2000	327,000	DSS and ES
2000–01	127,000	DSS and ES
2001–02	155,000	DWP
2002–03	100,000	DWP (Estimated outturn)

Notes:

1. Figures rounded to the nearest £000.

2. Expenditure for the 2002–03 financial year represents estimated outturn.

New Deal

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he plans to adopt the definition of New Deal achievement proposed by the Select Committee on Work and Pensions at paragraph 55 of its Third Report of 2001–02; and if he will make a statement. [91614]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The sustainability of jobs is one of a number of key measures we already use to analyse the success of the New Deal programmes.

Up to September 2002, 313,700 New Deal clients had moved into jobs lasting 13 weeks or more. The programme is continuing to help significant numbers of disadvantaged young people into work. Many of these have moved into jobs more quickly and have stayed there longer than they would have done without the New Deal.

We are building on this success, developing further measures to help even more young people to move into sustained jobs. We have introduced initiatives such as progress2work and StepUP to provide more assistance for those who face the greatest barriers to work. We are piloting post employment mentoring support to increase job retention and we are testing tailored pathways to help young people use the New Deal Options more flexibly and move into sustained jobs.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) how many New Deal for Disabled People job brokers are active; and how many have stopped offering their services since the programme went nationwide; [96604]

(2) how much the New Deal for Disabled People job brokers receive for placing a disabled person into work for six months or more; [96605]

(3) what advice is available to New Deal for Disabled People job brokers on cost-effective ways to attract new clients. [96607]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: We believe that disabled people should be provided with the same opportunities as everyone else. New Deal for Disabled People enables those with a health condition or disability to find and move into work and to help themselves become, and remain, more independent.

A network of Job Brokers across Great Britain are providing support and services to people on incapacity benefits who want to participate. The aim is to achieve lasting paid employment for people with health conditions and disabilities.

There are currently 60 Job Brokers delivering New Deal for Disabled People. Of the 66 Job Brokers who were originally contracted, six have withdrawn from their contracts for a variety of reasons. Consequently, some of the existing Job Brokers have extended their provision so as to ensure national coverage.

Job Brokers have access to a variety of advice and support in marketing their services to new customers. In particular there is a Job Broker website which provides details of marketing tools and techniques and information on how best to maximise opportunities to place customers in work.

Job Brokers individually negotiate prices for successfully delivering the New Deal for Disabled People reflecting their operational processes, business assumptions and local labour market conditions. They receive a payment for customers who remain in work for 26 weeks out of 39 following a job entry. The average payment is £1,274.

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) received into the reasons why new deal participants eligible for new deal photocards failed to take up the scheme; if he will place it in the Library; and if he will make a statement; [94003]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 17 December 2002, Official Report, columns 773–74W, on New Deal photocards, by what means the reduced rail fare scheme is brought to the attention of New Deal participants at the initial interview with their personal adviser; what forms are required to be completed in order to apply for the photocard; and if the reduced fares applies to all rail travel or only to that connected with the New Deal. [94056]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Up to November 2002, over 129,000 photocards had been issued to New Deal participants, helping them reduce the cost of travelling to job interviews and getting to work in the early days of a new job. Take up of the scheme has risen greatly since its launch, with the number of photocards issued growing by more than a third on average each quarter.

New Deal personal advisers are responsible for ensuring that all eligible New Deal participants are aware of the reduced rail fares offer. They issue to the New Deal client, either with the first New Deal invitation letter or at the first Gateway interview: an Association of Train Operating Companies Fact Sheet; an application form; and the terms and conditions of the offer. The personal adviser will also inform the participant that two passport-sized photographs should be submitted with the completed application form, and that the photocard is valid for up to three calendar months (after which repeat applications can be made). Photocards should only be used for rail travel connected with the New Deal.

The Department has not commissioned any research on the take up of the New Deal Reduced Rail Fare Scheme.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Adjudication Panel

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the relevant qualifications are of Mr. Angus Andrew for holding the post of Chairman of the Adjudication Panel for England. [97228]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I have been asked to reply.

Chairmen of the Adjudication Panel are drawn from a pool of part-time Legal Members of the Adjudication Panel for England.

The qualification for appointment is a five-year general qualification as defined in section 71 of the Court and Legal Services Act 1990. Solicitors had to appear on the Roll of Solicitors in order to qualify.

Part-time Legal Members of the Adjudication Panel for England are appointed by the Lord Chancellor following open competition and after consultation with the Secretary of State. Mr Angus Andrew met the qualification, and was appointed on 12 February 2002.

HEALTH

Ambulance Service

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hoax calls the Ambulance Service has received in the last 12 months for which figures are available in (a) Greater London and (b) England. [97822]

Mr. Lammy: This information is not collected centrally.

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many ambulances are owned by TENYAS; and how many were fully operational in each of the past 12 months; [93781]

(2) (a) how many fully equipped ambulances there were in TENYAS, (b) how many ambulances there were in TENYAS per 1,000 of population and (c) what the average number of ambulances per 1,000 of population was for each ambulance service in the United Kingdom in each year since 1997. [93843]

Jacqui Smith: On average, Tyne, East and North Yorkshire Ambulance Service national health service trust (TENYAS) owns up to 100 accident and emergency vehicles, together with 15 rapid response vehicles. The number of vehicles owned by TENYAS fluctuates as new vehicles become available and others await different routes of disposal, either by being sent to auction, passed on to charities or in some cases being scrapped.

TENYAS has on average peak development of 72 fully equipped ambulances serving a population of two million. This represents on average one ambulance per head of 28,000 population. Information for the number of ambulances per 1,000 of population is not centrally available.

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what training is given to personnel manning first responder vehicles. [93844]

Mr. Lammy: It is the responsibility of each ambulance trust to provide training for personnel manning first responder vehicles.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answers of 6 February, refs 95639–95642, about 999 calls made to the London Ambulance Service about people needing emergency help in another part of the country, for what reasons callers are not told that (a) the London Ambulance Service has responsibility to pass on the details of the emergency to the ambulance service in the area concerned and (b) that this can and will be done. [97418]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 11 February 2003]: The 999 system is designed to put callers in touch with the emergency services locally. If an ambulance service receives a call that is outside their area then it is their responsibility to pass it on to the ambulance service in the appropriate area.

The London Ambulance Service (LAS) believes that it may cause unnecessary confusion if 999 callers are given details of the responsibility to pass on information to other ambulance services and that such an explanation of procedures could create delays in responding to emergency calls.

The LAS believes that an assurance that an ambulance is on its way is more important than knowing what its responsibilities are according to national control procedures. Therefore the LAS has no plans to begin informing callers of its responsibility to pass on details of an emergency to the ambulance service in the area concerned.

Age-related Macular Degeneration

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his estimate is of how many people were affected by age related macular degeneration in each of the last six years. [97860]

Mr. Lammy: The Department does not hold centrally details of the number of people with age related macular degeneration. However, a study sponsored by the Macular Disease Society in 2001 estimated that there were 182,000 people with age related macular degeneration with a best eye visual acuity below that judged appropriate for certification as blind or partially sighted.

Beta Interferon

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of how consultant (a) neurologists and (b) specialist nurses in post have coped with implementing the prescription plus monitoring scheme for beta interferons; and whether further resources will be made available to facilitate the scheme; [97146]

(2) by what date everyone with MS who is eligible for beta interferons will have received these drugs under the prescription plus monitoring scheme; and how many people potentially eligible for the drug have received it. [97145]

Mr. Lammy: We do not hold detailed information about the local implementation of the scheme, but a survey of strategic health authorities conducted last autumn showed that services were being developed to initiate treatment under the scheme. Funding is included in primary care trust general allocations, which on average are increasing by more than 9 per cent. in cash terms over each of the next three years.

It is the intention to complete recruitment of patients to the scheme within 18 months of the scheme being initiated by centres.

Capita

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many meetings (a) he, (b) Ministers of State, (c) Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, (d) special advisers, and (e) officials have had with Capita employees and members of the Capita board since May 2001; what was discussed at each meeting; who attended; and if he will make a statement. [95982]

Mr. Lammy: As with previous Administrations and in line with exemption 7 of the "Code of Practice on Access to Government Information", it is not this Government's normal practice to release details of specific meetings or their content, as some of these discussions may have taken place on a confidential basis.

All such contacts are conducted in accordance with the rules set out in the "Ministerial Code" the "Civil Service Code", and "Guidance for Civil Servants: Contacts with Lobbyists". Copies of these documents are available in the Library.

Capital Projects

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library the evaluations for the Capital Modernisation Fund projects relating to (a) modernising coronary heart disease, (b) A&E and primary modernisation, (c) action on cataracts, (d) meningitis vaccinations, (e) decontamination and (f) NHS LIFT PPPs; and if he will make a statement. [97023]

Jacqui Smith: Of the six Department of Health Treasury Capital Modernisation Fund (TCMF) projects that you have identified, only five are capital investment projects.

The meningitis vaccination programme, whilst financed by TCMF cash, consisted exclusively of vaccinations and we have no plans to evaluate it.

The Action on Cataracts project is complete and the "good practice" it generated and a full evaluation report is expected to be published on the "Action On" website at www.modern.nhs.uk/action-on later this year. Once it is available, a copy will also be placed in the Library.

The remaining projects are currently incomplete. Once they are complete, they will be subjected to thorough post project evaluation, to ensure that any lessons learned are applied to other projects.

Care Homes

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library a copy of the standard letter that was sent to care homes who failed to pass on the free nursing care payment onto residents; and how many have been sent. [97143]

Jacqui Smith: The Department has not issued a standard letter to care homes.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to lay the Statutory Instrument that amends the regulations to extend the time limit for staff who were employed in care homes immediately before April 2002 for obtaining checks from the Criminal Records Bureau. [97212]

Jacqui Smith: We are currently finalising the details of the changes to the regulations and we plan to lay the necessary statutory instrument shortly.

Child Protection

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the retention rates are for child protection social workers employed in each social services department in England in the last three years; and what this represents as a percentage of total staff in that area of work on the fully staffed pay rate. [95997]

Jacqui Smith: We do not hold central information on retention rates for social workers employed in each of the social services departments in England.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what extra training is to be implemented for social services departments child protection social workers in how to deal with abusive and intimidating parents and guardians of children deemed at risk. [96080]

Jacqui Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 7 January 2003, Official Report, column 175W.

The National Task Force on Violence Against Social Workers recommended in 2001 that employers urgently undertook an audit of their organisation's ability to deal with violence and abuse and then did a training needs analysis for their workforce. They were then asked to prepare and begin an action plan to effect planned developments.

Those social workers who are working with children and families should undertake the post-qualifying (PQ) child care award. This was created in 1999 to equip qualified social workers with the required level of knowledge, understanding and skills to carry out the full range of expectations and duties of contemporary children's personal social services. However, as part of the reform of social work education, the General Social Care Council (GSCC) is undertaking a review of the current framework for post-qualifying training for social work. This will include a review of the PQ child care award.

In addition to this, the prescribed curriculum of the new social work degree includes the national occupational standards for social work, which require students to demonstrate the management of risk to individuals, families, carers, groups and communities and to assess, minimise and manage risk to self and colleagues.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department has issued to local authority social services departments regarding the recruitment of child protection social workers from abroad; and if he will make a statement on the policy of recruiting social workers involved in child protection from abroad. [96089]

Jacqui Smith: Guidance has not been issued to local authority social services departments regarding the recruitment of social workers from abroad. Qualified social workers from abroad who wish to work in this country register with the General Social Care Council, who validate their qualification.

It is the responsibility of individual employing agencies to ensure that their recruitment policies and procedures comply with current legislation whether recruiting within England or abroad.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many child protection social workers recruited from abroad work in local authority social services departments in England. [96090]

Jacqui Smith: We do not hold data centrally on social workers recruited from abroad. Qualified social workers from abroad who wish to work in this country register with the General Social Care Council, who validate their qualification.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action has been taken to investigate claims during the Victoria Climbié Inquiry that unaccompanied child refugees were placed in bed and breakfast accommodation by Brent Social Services. [96113]

Jacqui Smith: Giving evidence on Friday 12 October 2001 to the Victoria Climbié Inquiry, Mr. Turner, QC for the London Borough of Brent, made clear that Brent Social Services had a clear policy of not placing unaccompanied children under the age of 16 in bed and breakfast accommodation. At that time, the local authority also undertook a check on the actual position and reported to the inquiry that no such children were placed in such accommodation.

The Social Services Inspectorate has, this month, confirmed with Brent that this continues to be the case in practice.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the compatibility of the confidentiality considerations contained in the Data Protection Act 1998 and the sharing of information about vulnerable children between agencies recommended by Lord Laming. [96035]

Jacqui Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, has said that we will consider Lord Laming's recommendations carefully and will publish a full response to the report in the spring.

Further, we plan to publish guidance to the national health service in September 2003 on patient confidentiality issues, including those relating to the Data Protection Act 1998.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to issue the guidance on information-sharing, as recommended in the Victoria Climbié Inquiry recommendation 16. [96633]

Jacqui Smith: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Health, has said that we will consider the report's recommendations carefully and will publish a full response in the Spring.

Independently of Lord Laming's recommendation, we plan to publish guidance to the National Health Service in September 2003 on patient confidentiality issues including those relating to Data Protection Act 1998.

Clinical Negligence White Paper

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the White Paper on Clinical Negligence Reform. [96062]

Mr. Lammy: The Chief Medical Officer, Professor Sir Liam Donaldson, is working up a comprehensive report for the Government outlining options for reforming the present system for handling clinical negligence claims, which aims to make the system fairer for all those who suffer injury through negligent National Health Service service. We hope to publish them shortly.

Clothing Provision (NHS Trusts)

Mr. Laxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how local NHS trusts assess the clothing needs of their long-term patients; and what procedures are in place to ensure these needs are met. [95301]

Mr. Lammy: Trusts have a duty to ensure patient privacy and dignity is upheld at all times. This includes having arrangements in place to meet the clothing needs of all patients.

Trusts are supported by the introduction of modern matrons—senior sisters and charge nurses who are easily identifiable to patients and who have the authority and support they need to make sure the fundamentals of care are right. Also, patient advice and liaison services are available in most trusts, to provide information and on the spot help for patients, their families and carers.

Commission for Patient and Public Involvement

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health to have its first meeting. [97306]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 13 February 2003]: It is for the chair of the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health to convene the first meeting of the Commission and to set the day and place.

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff formerly employed by community health councils will be employed within the new system of patient and public involvement. [97303]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 13 February 2003]: It is not possible to predict the number of community health council staff that will secure posts within the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health, supporting patients' forums or providing independent complaints advocacy support. These posts will be advertised and recruitment to them will be subject to open and fair competition. It is for the Commission to decide its staffing requirements.

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure there will be a smooth transition between the abolition of community health councils and their replacement. [97400]

Mr. Lammy: The Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health has said that it will be working towards achieving full coverage of patients' forums by the end of the year. Arrangements will be in place to ensure there is continuous support for patients through the transition.

The new system for patient and public involvement goes beyond patients' forums.

For example, independent complaints advocacy support for patients wanting to complain against the national health service will be available, patient advice and liaison services in trusts and primary care trusts routinely feed up patients views to trust boards, overview and scrutiny committees (OSC) have to be consulted where substantial variation and developments are planned and individuals or patient groups can approach their OSC directly where they have concerns.

In addition, the Commission will set up a national telephone help-line, which will help people access local support arrangements.

Laptops

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many laptop computers were used by (a) Ministers and special advisers and (b) officials in his Department in each year since 1995; how many were (i) lost and (ii) stolen; what their cost was; and if he will make a statement. [97499]

Mr. Lammy: The Department does not retain detailed, historical records of laptop ownership and is therefore not able to provide the information requested. Information is only available for the current financial year, 2002–2003.

Ministers have one laptop each. Special advisers have one laptop each and there are approximately 2000 laptops in use by officials of the Department; a number of which are shared or 'pooled' laptops, used by a number of staff.

The Department takes the protection of its assets very seriously and its security policy and procedures are under constant review to find ways to reduce losses.

Figures for the numbers and cost of laptop computers lost or stolen belonging to the Department or its Executive Agencies covering financial years' 1995—96 to 2002–2003 are shown in the table.

Financial year	Lost/stolen	Cost (£)
1995–96	12	27,035,90
1996–97	18	29,277,45
1997–98	23	43,098,68
1998–99	19	40,068,70
1999–2000	18	36,260.35
2000–01	23	46,917.62
2001–02	35	62,275.69
2002 to date	26	40,997.26
Total	174	325,931.65

Consultations

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list consultations his Department has conducted since 1997; and when each consultation (a) opened and (b) closed. [97426]

Mr. Lammy: The Cabinet Office Code of Practice on Written Consultations applies to all formal national public consultation documents issued by Departments from 1 January 2001. The information requested is not comprehensively available before July 2001. Information on formal written consultations undertaken by the Department since July 2001 has been placed in the Library.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact of the postponement of Criminal Record Bureau checks on domiciliary care staff and the implications it has for the Protection of Vulnerable Adults List; and what systems have been put in place to ensure vulnerable adults are protected from harm or abuse in their own home. [97208]

Jacqui Smith: From 1 April this year, for the first time we are introducing regulation to the domiciliary care sector that will bring into force new requirements for employers when checking the suitability of new employees. These new requirements will add significantly to the level of protection from abuse to vulnerable adults in their own homes.

The protection of vulnerable adults (PoVA) list will be implemented when we are confident that the CRB are able to cope with the demand. When PoVA checks are introduced they will further enhance the level of protection offered to the recipients of domiciliary care services.

Dentistry

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether current dental qualifications from (a) South Africa, (b) Australia and (c) New Zealand are recognised for registration as a UK dental surgeon. [96790]

Mr. Lammy: Dentists who qualified in these countries have to sit the General Dental Council's International Qualifying Examination, which was introduced in 2001, to be eligible for registration in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether dental qualifications achieved up to 1984 are recognised for registration as a UK dental surgeon; and if he will make a statement. [96791]

Mr. Lammy: Yes, provided the qualifications are included in section 15 of the Dentists Act 1984.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many vacancies for dental surgeons are estimated to exist. [96793]

Mr. Lammy: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Minister of State (Mr. Hutton) gave him on 8 January 2003, Official Report, column 276W.

In addition to this, there may also vacancies for dentists in dental practices providing general dental services. However, these are independently owned practices and we do not have numbers of such vacancies.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to improve the system of temporary registration as a dental surgeon; and if he will make a statement; [96794]

(2) how many opportunities for paid employment as a dental surgeon with temporary registration there are in (a) the UK and (b) London; and if he will make a statement. [96795]

Mr. Lammy: This information is not held centrally. The General Dental Council (GDC) approves temporary registrations when a dentist from overseas finds a post where there is appropriate supervision of his or her training and developmental needs. Currently such posts are only found in dental hospitals but the Department is exploring with the GDC and dental professional bodies whether temporary registrations could be approved for dentists wishing to train in the community dental services and in primary dental care practices.

Richard Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 19 December 2002, Official Report, column 1046W, what form the consultation exercise will take; if he will list consultees; when he expects the consultation to end; when in 2003 he expects to publish his draft legislation; and if he will make a statement. [96961]

Mr. Lammy: The form of consultation is laid down in paragraph 9 of schedule 3 to the Health Act, 1999 (c.8) and involves publishing a draft of the Order amending the Dentists Act, 1984. This paragraph also lays down who must be consulted. We aim to publish the consultation document in the summer, with a closing date three months later.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average ratio of NHS dentists to patients was in (a) 1997 and (b) 2000; and what the average is now in (i) England and (ii) North Yorkshire. [98051]

Mr. Lammy: The number of general dental service (GDS) patients registered per GDS dentist in England and North Yorkshire Health Authority at 30 September 1997, 2000 and 2002 is shown in the table.

General dental service: Number of patients registered per dentist[1] at 30 September 1997, 2000 and 2002
England and North Yorkshire Health Authority

At 30 September	England	North Yorkshire
1997[2]	1,599	1,608
2000	1,311	1,366
2002	1,276	1,263

Note:

1. Dentists counted more than one Health Authority have been counted only once, in the Health Authority where they carry out the majority of their treatment.

2. Registration data for this year is not comparable with later years due to the change in the registration period.

The number of patients that a GDS dentist sees is dependent on several factors including their amount of commitment to the GDS and the amount of treatment that their patients require.

A patient becomes registered with a GDS dentist when that dentist accepts the patient for treatment. Registrations lapse if patients do not return to their dentists within 15 months of their last visit. The number of patients registered per dentist will exclude patients who have not been to their GDS dentist within the past 15 months.

GDS dentists are required to provide a full range of National Health Service treatment to maintain the oral health of the patients that are registered with them for capitation (Children) or continuing care (adults).

The 1997 registration numbers are not comparable to those for 2000 and 2002 because of the reduction in the registration period to 15 months. Previously the period for adult registrations was 24 months and children's registrations lasted until the end of the next calendar year.

Registrations are included in the area of the dentist. The registration rates for some areas may be affected by some patients receiving their dental treatment in a different area from the one in which they live.

Patients wishing to register with a GDS dentist for tratment can obtain details of dentists accepting new patients in their area by contacting NHS Direct.

Patients do not need to be registered with a GDS dentist to get NHS dental treatment. The personal dental services and community dental services provide NHS dental treatment and some patients receive GDS dental treatment on an occasional basis.

Digital Hearing Aids

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how long it takes to train NHS staff to fit digital hearing aids. [97880]

Jacqui Smith: Current career grade staff working in national health service hearing aid services require approximately six days of additional training to allow them to fit digital hearing aids.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how long he estimates it will take to convert all analogue hearing aid users to digital. [97889]

Jacqui Smith: All National Health Service hearing aid services in England will be fitting digital aids by the end of March 2005. These will be provided as appropriate for all new patients and for existing hearing aid users upon review. For adults that review would not normally be less than three years from fitting of their last aid, unless their hearing has become significantlyworse in the interim. A shorter review period applies to children's services.

Domestic Violence

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what advice is given to paramedics and accident and emergency staff as to their responsibilities if they regard injured persons they attend as victims of domestic violence; [97171]

(2) what training is given to paramedics and ambulance personnel in dealing with people they perceive to be the victims of domestic violence and their responsibilities of (a) confidentiality and (b) to report the commission of crime. [97239]

Mr. Lammy [holding answers 11 February and 12 February 2003]: It is the responsibility of individual trusts to develop policies on dealing with people they perceive to be the victims of domestic violence.

To assist individual trusts, the Department published Domestic Violence: A Resource Manual for Health Professionals two years ago. This manual sets out to increase the knowledge and understanding of health care professionals including staff in accident and emergency and ambulance trusts about the nature of domestic violence and how it is likely to be evident in the patients they care for.

Donor Transplant Operations

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has sought on asystolic donor transplant operations and elective ventilation procedures. [97179]

Mr. Lammy: At the Transplant Summit in February 2001, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, announced draft Government plans to increase the rate of asystolic donor transplants. UK Transplant has been allocated extra funding to increase organ donation rates including developing more asystolic donor transplant programmes.

The Department currently considers the practice of elective ventilation to be unlawful.

EMI Patients

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many beds in (a) Sunderland Royal Hospital, (b) Hartlepool General Hospital and (c) Ryhope Hospital are accepted by EMI patients who could be cared for in the community; and if he will make a statement. [97161]

Jacqui Smith: The information requested is not held centrally.

Empty Properties

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for how long his properties known as Burntwood Villas and Myrtle Cottages in Burntwood Lane, Tooting, London SW17 have been empty; and if he will make a statement. [96612]

Mr. Lammy: The properties were transferred to the South West London and St Georges Mental Health National Health Service Trust in March 2002. Myrtle Cottages have been empty since the late 1970s and Burntwood Villa since 1998.

Burntwood Villa has been let to the Bendon Care Foundation for keyworker accommodation. The future use of Myrtle Cottages is under consideration by the NHS trust, Wansworth Primary Care Trust and the London Borough of Wandsworth as a potential site for general practitioner provision.

Enuresis

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what treatments for enuresis he proposes to cover in the National Service Framework for children; [97887]

(2) whether he proposes to include targets for combating enuresis in the NSF for children. [97886]

Jacqui Smith: An external working group to the national service framework covering healthy children and young people is taking forward work on standards for universal services that every child and young person needs to optimise health and well-being. Initial findings from this group have shown that these standards will be relevant to, although not specifically about, treatments or targets for the management of enuresis.

External Consultants

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money the NHS Modernisation Agency has spent on external consultants in the current financial year. [96885]

Mr. Lammy: In the current financial year, the Modernisation Agency has spent £1,752,000 on external consultants.

Fluoridation

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the percentage of the population affected by dental fluorosis in areas where the water supply is (a) fluoridated and (b) not-fluoridated. [94248]

Mr. Lammy: The report, "A Systematic Review of Water Fluoridation", published by the University of York in October 2000, estimated that the prevalence of dental fluorosis at a water fluoride level of 1.00 parts per million was 48 per cent. for all grades of fluorosis, including those which can only be identified by close professional examination and 12.5 per cent. for fluorosis of aesthetic concern.

It should be noted that these figures include all enamel marks, whether from fluoride or not. Information is not held centrally on the prevalence of dental fluorosis in areas where the water supply is not artificially fluoridated.

Former NHS Sites (Development)

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many affordable homes have been built on former NHS sites sold by his Department over the last six years to the private sector. [97920]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The Department does not keep records of the number of affordable houses that have been built on sites that it has sold.

Free Nursing Care

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people have been waiting (a) less than one month, (b) over one month and less than two months, (c) over two months and less than three months, (d) over three months and less than four months and (e) over four months for an assessment for free nursing care; [97793]

(2) how many people are awaiting an assessment for free nursing care and what proportion that represents of people who require an assessment for free nursing care. [97794]

Jacqui Smith [holding answers 13 February 2003]: The Department does not collect this information centrally.

General Practitioners

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS general practitioners there were in Shrewsbury and Atcham in each year since 1997. [96286]

Mr. Lammy: Information for individual constituencies is not available. The figures for Shropshire Health Authority are shown in the table.

All Practitioners (excluding GP retainers)[1] in Shropshire Health Authority as at 1 October 1997–99, 30 September 2000–01 and 31 March 2002

1997	260
1998	259
1999	268
2000	262
2002[2]	260

[1] All Practitioners (excluding GP retainers) include GMS Unrestricted Principals, PMS Contracted GPs, PMS Salaried GPs, Restricted Principals, Assistants, GP Registrars, Salaried Doctors (para. 52 SFA) and PMS Others. GP Retainers were first collected in 1999 and have been omitted for comparability purposes.

Health and Social Care Directorates

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate (a) the cost of establishing and abolishing the directorates of health and social care and (b) the budgets for the directorates in each year since they were established. [97815]

Mr. Lammy: For the financial year 2002–03, the revenue budget of the four Directorates of Health and Social Care (DsHSC) was £58.7 million, which represented the costs of the eight former regional offices of the NHS Executive rolled forward, after the transfer of certain functions to other parts of the Department. Expenditure against this budget is forecast to be £49 million.

Additionally, there were set-up costs of £2.4 million attributable to establishing and equipping the public health function in the nine government offices of the regions. The budget of the DsHSC for 2003–04 is £24.5 million, a saving of £34.2 million over 2002–03.

It is too early to assess the consequences of the proposed Departmental re-organisation.

Helplines

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many telephone helplines are sponsored by his Department; and which of these helplines are charged at (a) national rate, (b) premium rate and (c) local rate. [95716]

Mr. Lammy: The Department currently sponsors 40 helplines. Of those, 17 are freephone numbers, 14 are charged at local rate and nine are charged at national rate. None are charged at premium rate.

Hospitals

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which of the six key targets under the Better Hospital Food Programme will have been fully delivered by the end of December 2002 in each (a) region and (b) health authority. [96725]

Mr. Lammy: I refer the hon. Member to the response I gave on him 14 October 2002, Official Report, volume 390, columns 481–82W.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) of 22 January, Official Report, column 393W, on hospital hygiene, how long it took to produce the "Process Mapping the Housekeeper Service—A Toolkit for Change" guidance; and whether this superseded previous guidance on this issue. [96046]

Mr. Lammy: The guide, "Process Mapping the Housekeeper Service—A Toolkit for Change", was produced to assist trusts when introducing housekeeping services. It was developed in conjunction with the National Health Service over a period of time following publication of the NHS Plan and was launched by the Chief Nursing Officer, Sarah Mullally, in November 2002. The development included a period of feedback and consultation.

The toolkit is not prescriptive. Its aim is to help trusts examine their own service and develop local solutions. Information included about the withholding of payment or termination of contracts expands upon but does not supersede any previous guidance or local service level agreements. It makes clear that nurses have a major role to play in setting and monitoring standards of cleanliness at ward level.

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which hospitals he visited in 2002. [90039]

Mr. Lammy: In 2002, my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, had the opportunity to visit the following hospitals, some on more than one occasion.

Epsom General Hospital, Maidstone Hospital, St Thomas' Hospital (London), Liverpool Women's Hospital, Peterborough District Hospital, St Mary's Hospital (London), Worcester Royal Hospital, Ilkeston Community Hospital, King's College Hospital (London), The Whittington Hospital (London), Addenbrookes Hospital, St George's Hospital (London), The Royal Marsden Hospital, Alder Hey Children's Hospital, Medway Hospital, Barnet General Hospital (London), Chase Farm Hospital and Darlington Memorial Hospital.

Independent Complaints Advocacy Services

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has permanently to establish the Independent Complaints Advocacy Services once its pilot ends. [96719]

Mr. Lammy: An independent complaints advocacy service will be established. Decisions on the operational arrangements for this new service are being finalised. The Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health will be involved in providing advice and setting standards for independent complaints advocacy services.

Infectious Diseases (Home Treatment)

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the pilot project in Warwickshire to treat patients with infectious diseases in their own homes. [96513]

Mr. Lammy: The proposed pilot project in Warwickshire, led by the South Warwickshire General Hospitals National Health Service Trust, would treat selected patients who have presented at the hospital with infections of the skin, wound or bone. The service is for patients who would be in hospital only to receive intravenous antibiotic therapy. The hospital's clinical teams would still carefully manage the patients. Patients with highly contagious infections who require isolation in hospital will continue to be treated as inpatients.

This project is patient-centred and offers a choice to both patients and carers. The patient would have a reduced risk of hospital-acquired infection and conversely existing patients would not be exposed to the infection.

Inventures (Bidding Process)

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the report of the National Audit Office into the bidding process for Inventures will be completed; and whether it will be published in full. [97872]

Mr. Lammy: The National Audit Office (NAO) work on the bidding process should be completed in February 2003. A response will then be sent by the NAO to the Pears Group, the complainant.

In addition, the NAO will send an internal management report to the Department of Health, summarising their findings and conclusions. No decision has yet been taken as to whether the report will be published.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to finalise the details of the sale of Inventures to the Miller Group; and when he will publish the details. [97917]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The sale is expected to be finalised by September 2003, provided value for money is demonstrated.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those NHS properties which have so far been agreed as being included in the list of sites to be transferred from NHS Estates to the Miller Group. [97918]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 13 February 2003]: Details of the proposed contractual Joint Venture with the preferred partner are currently being finalised.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many properties being sold by NHS Estates to the Miller Group will be sold with planning permission. [97919]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 13 February 2003]: Details of which properties will be the subject of the proposed contractual Joint Venture between NHS Estates and Miller/Bank of Scotland are still being finalised.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the members of senior management and (b) the number of employees, who formerly worked for Inventures, whose employment has been transferred to the Miller Group Consortium. [97921]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The proposed contractual Joint Venture between NHS Estates and Miller/Bank of Scotland is still being progressed and no staff have been transferred.

Doctors

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many and what percentage of those entering medical training to qualify as doctors in each of the past 10 years were (a) men and (b) women; [97580]

(2) what percentage of those entering medical training were (a) men and (b) women in the last year for which figures are available. [97579]

Mr. Lammy: The information requested is shown in the table.

Number and gender of English medical school intake 1991–92 to 2001–02

Academic Year	Total	Male Number	Male Percentage	Female Number	Female Percentage
1991–92	3,191	1,615	50.6	1,576	49.4
1992–93	3,263	1,542	47.3	1,721	52.7
1993–94	3,374	1,654	49.0	1,720	51.0
1994–95	3,514	1,701	48.4	1,813	51.6
1995–96	3,486	1,777	51.0	1,709	49.0
1996–97	3,594	1,711	47.6	1,883	52.4
1997–98	3,749	1,697	45.3	2,052	54.7
1998–99	3,735	1,690	45.25	2,045	54.75
1999–2000	3,972	1,748	44.0	2,224	56.0
2000–01	4,300	1,826	42.5	2,474	57.5
2001–02	4,713	1,959	41.5	2,754	58.5

Intake to English medical schools has risen by 1,522 during the past 10 years to its current level of 4,713, an increase of 48 per cent.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what figures he has collated on how many qualified medical doctors cease to work in the profession (a) during the first five years after qualifying and (b) during the first 10 years after qualifying, broken down by gender; [97583]

(2) how many and what percentage of those who qualified as medical practitioners but who did not enter and work in the profession in the last year for which figures are available were (a) men and (b) women. [97584]

Mr. Lammy: We do not collect data on the number of medical graduates who do not enter the medical profession, nor do we collect data about the number of doctors who cease to work in the profession. However, the medical careers research group in the University of Oxford have undertaken cohort studies based on data collected by questionnaires sent to individual doctors emerging from United Kingdom medical schools.

Of a 25 per cent., sample survey of the qualifiers of 2000, the latest data available, only tworespondents did not start working as a pre-registration house officer. Both were female.

Data from 1996 qualifiers shows that, of those surveyed five years after qualification, 2.4 per cent., of men and 4.2 per cent, of women were not working in medicine.

Data from 1988 qualifiers shows that of those surveyed 10 years after qualification, 0.9 per cent., of men and 5.3 per cent., of women were not working in medicine.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many and what percentage of those entering medical education who completed their studies and qualify to practise in the last year for which figures are available were (a) men and (b) women. [97582]

Jacqui Smith: The latest figures from the Higher Education Funding Council for England show that at 31 July 2002, the number obtaining the first registerable medical qualification in England was 3,280; 1,467, or 45 per cent., of whom were male and 1,813, or 55 per cent., were female.

Mental Health (Older People)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the provision of mental health services for older people for the treatment of manic depression. [96635]

Jacqui Smith: The national service framework (NSF) for older people has a standard, a service model and milestones to monitor progress against for the provision of health and social care services for older people with mental health problems.

Implementation of the NSF will ensure that older people with mental health problems, including those with manic depression, will receive the care and treatment they need.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have been diagnosed with pre-senile dementia in each of the last five years, broken down by age at diagnosis. [96637]

Jacqui Smith: The Department does not routinely collect such information.

Hospital Waiting Lists/Times

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in the Mid-Essex Hospital Services NHS Trust area were waiting for in-patient treatment on the latest available date. [97827]

Mr. Lammy: There were 9,527 patients waiting for in-patient treatment at Mid-Essex Hospital Services National Health Service Trust at the end of December 2002.

Source:

KH07 return.

Mark Tami: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the current average waiting time is in England for operations on children to remove tonsils. [97105]

Jacqui Smith: Inpatient waiting time data is collected by specialty. The average waiting time for ear, nose and throat is 3.3 months. There is no data available centrally at procedure level or by age group.

NHS Trusts (Financial Performance)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether it is the Government's policy that strategic health authorities should (a) monitor the financial performance of trusts within their area and (b) collate estimates of the end-of-year financial outturn for each trust. [97945]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 13 February 2003]: It is the Government's policy that strategic health authorities should monitor the financial performance of national health service trusts within their area and collate estimates of the full year financial outturn for each NHS trust.

Online Sales/Purchases

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what (a) products, (b) goods and (c) services were (i) bought and (ii) sold online by his Department in each of the last five years. [97443]

Mr. Lammy: The Department has ordered its catering requirements online since 1998 and its travel arrangements online starting this financial year using its own Intranet.

The Department also uses web-enabled systems to place the advertisements under the European Union purchasing regulations and has pilot tested online tendering systems in collaboration with the Office of Government Commerce. It also uses the Government Procurement Card for low value purchases.

The Department has not used the Internet for any sales activity.

This answer does not include the national health service.

Operations

Mr. Mark Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) inpatients and (b) outpatient operations were cancelled in (i) Pilgrim hospital, Boston, Lincolnshire, (ii) Trent Regional Health Authority and (iii) England and Wales in 2002, expressed in a percentage of total operations and in numbers. [96582]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 11 February 2003]: Quarterly data are collected on the number of operations cancelled by the hospital for non-clinical reasons, for example, at the last minute (that is, on the day patients are due to arrive or after arrival in hospital or on the day of their operation) and on the day of surgery.

These data are available in the Library and on the Department's website at www.doh.gov.uk/hospitalactivity/data_requests.htm.

Information about cancellations in Pilgrim Hospital, Trent Regional Health Authority and England are shown in the table. Currently, figures are available for the first nine months of 2002 only.

	Number of last minute cancellations for non-clinical reasons			Number of cancellations as a percentage of elective admissions
	Q4 2001–02	Q1 2002–03	Q2 2002–03	Q4 2001–02	Q1 2002–03	Q2 2002–03
United Lincolnshire Hospitals NHS Trust[1]	159	170	179	1.1	1.2	1.2
Trent Strategic Health Authority[2]	n/a	607	568	n/a	1.0	0.9
England[3]	19,973	14,808	14,826	1.5	1.1	1.1

[1] Data is not published on the basis of individual hospitals. The figures are therefore provided for United Lincolnshire Hospitals NHS Trust, which manages the Pilgrim hospital.

[2] Trent Strategic Health Authority was created in April 2002. The former Trent Regional Office covered a different geographical area.

[3] For data on hospitals in Wales, please refer to the Welsh Assembly.

Data are not collected on the number of patients whose outpatient appointment has been cancelled by the hospital.

Overview and Scrutiny Committees

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Department of Health will be publishing guidelines for the establishment of overview and scrutiny committees. [96721]

Mr. Lammy: The Department will be publishing guidance shortly for local authority overview and scrutiny committees to assist them in scrutinising the national health service. The guidance is also to enable the NHS to meet its duties under the NHS scrutiny arrangements.

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the final guidance from his Department for local authority scrutiny committees on health issues will be published; and if he will make a statement. [97607]

Mr. Lammy: The Department will shortly be publishing guidance to assist local authority overview and scrutiny committees in scrutinising health.

Patient Forums

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the new patient forums to be established in all areas. [96722]

Mr. Lammy: The Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health is responsible for recruiting members, appointing staff and putting in place the infrastructure for patients' forums. This process will be well under way by the time Community Health Councils are abolished in September.

The Commission will be working towards the achievement of full coverage of forums by the end of the year.

Dr. Richard Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements he has made to cover the period between the abolition of community health councils and the formation of primary care trust patient forums. [96776]

Mr. Lammy: The Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health has said that it will be working towards achieving full coverage of patients' forums by the end of the year. Arrangements will be in place to ensure there is continuous support for patients through the transition.

The new system for patient and public involvement goes beyond patients' forums. For example, independent complaints advocacy support for patients wanting to complain against the national health service will be available, patient advice and liaison services in trusts and primary care trusts routinely feed up patients views to trust boards, overview and scrutiny committees (OSCs) have to be consulted where substantial variation and developments are planned and individuals or patient groups can approach their OSC directly where they have concerns.

In addition, the Commission will set up a national telephone help-line, which will help people access local support arrangements.

Community Pharmacies

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact of the deregulation of pharmacy contracts on smaller, non-supermarket pharmacies. [97399]

Mr. Lammy: We are considering the report from the Director General of Fair Trading and its findings and recommendation carefully.

Community pharmacists have an important part to play in our plans to drive up the quality of national health service services overall and to make the best use of skills of everybody working in the NHS. We are therefore considering the implications the report has for patients, for the profession and for the NHS as a whole.

We have invited views on the report and are meeting key interests to hear their reactions, in order to help inform the Government response, which my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, is co-ordinating.

Private Patient Debt

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total debt of private patients to NHS hospitals was in 2001–02 in (a) London and (b) England. [97259]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 12 February 2003]: National health service hospitals are encouraged to obtain deposits from private patients to lessen the risk that charges for treatment cannot be fully recovered.

The Department does not hold information centrally about the debt of private patients to NHS hospitals.

Procure 21

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans there are to bring Procure 21 into operation across the country; and if he will make a statement. [97597]

Mr. Lammy: Following interest from national health service trusts across the country, a selection process is underway to establish frameworks that will be available for all NHS organisations from summer 2003.

Public Appointments

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library a copy of the application pack for candidates for the post of Chair of the Commission for Public and Patient Involvement. [97244]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 12 February 2003]: Copies of the application pack for candidates for the post of Chair of the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health will be placed in the Library by Friday 14 February 2003.

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health where and when the Central Office for Research Ethics Committees advertised the posts of making public appointments when appointing (a) an adviser on training research ethics committees and (b) an adviser on accreditation of research ethics committees. [96549]

Mr. Lammy: All established, permanent positions at the Central Office for Research Ethics Committees (COREC) are filled following open advertisement and a rigorous selection process involving independent selectors. Additionally, fixed term contracts and secondments are used to involve individuals with particular expertise in specific time-limited projects.

The two positions are in the latter category, and are not public appointments. The recruitment of the particular individuals took into account their knowledge, experience, general personal abilities and standing in the field of research ethics committees, and took place with the knowledge of the Department.

Social Workers

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many cases of compensation have been awarded to former social workers in each of the last five years in the social services departments in (a) Haringey, (b) Ealing, (c) Brent and (d) Enfield; and for what amounts; [96105]

(2) how many social workers working with vulnerable children have been subject to disciplinary measures in each of the last five years in (a) Haringey Social Services, (b) Ealing Social Services, (c) Brent Social Services and (d) Enfield Social Services. [96041]

Jacqui Smith: It is the responsibility of the individual local authority, as the employer, to maintain records relating to their employment policies, procedures and actions in relation to disciplinary matters. The Department does not collect this data centrally.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many vacancies he estimates there are for social workers in (a) London, broken down by borough and (b) the UK; and if he will make a statement. [97586]

Jacqui Smith: We do not hold central information on vacancies in each local authority social services department in England for social workers.

A survey undertaken by the Employers Organisation found that, across all local authority social services departments in England as at 30 September 2001, around 10 per cent. of all field social worker posts were vacant.

Speech and Language Therapy

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of shortages of speech therapists in Essex; and if he will make a statement. [97181]

Mr. Lammy: Speech and language therapists have been recognised at a national level as a key work force priority for work force planning and development. Speech therapists have been targeted, along with other allied health professionals, for recruitment and retention. Work force development confederations have been made aware of the need to commission additional training places for this target group.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to (a) train and (b) recruit more speech therapists. [97183]

Mr. Lammy: We are committed to increasing the numbers of speech and language therapists employed in the national health service. Between September 1997 and 2001, the number of speech and language therapists employed in the NHS has increased by over 800, or 17 per cent.

"Delivering the NHS Plan", published in April 2002, includes the latest forecasts for growth in the NHS Workforce. By 2008, we expect the NHS to have a net increase over the September 2001 staff census of at least 30,000 therapists and scientists, including speech therapists.

The "NHS Plan" stated that by 2004, there would be an extra 4,450 therapists, including speech therapists and other key health professionals being trained each year over 1999 levels. By 2001–02 the number of students entering training each year to become a speech therapist had increased by 96, or 21 per cent., from 457 to 553. Latest figures suggest a further increase, to 601, in the current financial year.

A range of recruitment, retention and returner initiatives are in place to facilitate the NHS meeting the challenging targets set out in the "NHS Plan" and "Delivering the NHS Plan". The Department is working very closely with the Royal College of Speech and Language Therapy and has set up a working group to draw up a recruitment and retention strategy.

Mid Essex Hospital Trust (Staff Vacancies)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) nurse and (b) consultant vacancies there are at Broomfield hospital, Essex at the latest available date. [97825]

Mr. Lammy: The information requested is shown in the table. Vacancy information is not collected for specific hospitals; therefore, vacancy information is shown for Mid Essex Hospital Trust.

Department of Health Vacancies Survey, March 2002

Vacancies in NHS Trusts in England and Mid Essex Hospital Services NHS Trust, specified staff groups, three month vacancy rates, numbers and staff in post

Notes:

Three month vacancy:

1. Three month vacancy Information is as at 31 March 2002.
2. Three month vacancies are vacancies which Trusts are actively trying to fill, which had lasted for three months or more (whole-time equivalents).
3. Three month Vacancy Rates are three month vacancies expressed as a percentage of three month vacancies plus staff in post.
4. Three month Vacancy Rates for non-medical staff are calculated using staff in post from the Vacancy Survey, March 2002.
5. Three month Vacancy Rates for medical and dental staff are calculated using staff in post from the Consultant Census, March 2002.
6. Percentages are rounded to one decimal place.

Staff in post:

1. Staff in post data is from the Non-Medical Workforce Census, September 2001 and the Mini Consultant Census, March 2002
2. Staff in post data excludes staff employed by Health Authorities, as vacancy information was only collected from Trusts, PCTs and Special Health Authorities

General:

1. Vacancy and staff in post numbers are rounded to the nearest whole number
2. Calculating the vacancy rates using the above data may not equal the actual vacancy rates
3. Broomfield hospital is part of Mid Essex Hospital Services NHS Trust

Surgeons

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many surgeons have (a) left and (b) started working in the NHS in each of the last five years. [96114]

Mr. Lammy: Workforce data is collected through the annual Department of Health medical workforce census. The census is a snapshot of data as of 30 September in the appropriate year.

The information shown in the table shows the net increases in the number of consultants in the surgery group in each of the last five years. We do not collect data on the number of leavers and joiners in the National Health Service.

At March 2002 there were 4,969 consultants in surgery, an increase of 875 or 21.4 per cent., over 1997.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the (a) vacancy rates are and (b) rates 12 months ago were for surgeon positions in each hospital trust in England. [96115]

Mr. Lammy: Vacancy rates for 2001 and 2002 for the surgical specialties in each hospital trust in England have been placed in the Library.

Teenage Cancer Ward (Southend)

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for the building of a teenage cancer trust ward in Southend-on-Sea or the surrounding area. [96868]

Mr. Lammy: The South Essex Cancer Network and Southend Hospital National Heath Service Trust have no plans at the present time to build a teenage cancer trust ward in Southend-on-Sea or the surrounding area.

Underspends

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of his Department's budget remains uncommitted for the current financial year. [96886]

Mr. Lammy: There are no planned under-spends in 2002–03.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chemical and Biological Weapons Conventions

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the policy of the Government towards the chemical weapons and biological weapons conventions. [98069]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government's policy towards the Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC) and the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention (BWC) is to work towards their universal adoption and universal compliance with their obligations.

The United Kingdom abandoned its offensive chemical and biological weapons programmes in the 1950s. Subsequently we have played a leading role in the negotiations both of the BWC of 1975, for which we are a depositary government, and the CWC which entered into force in 1997. We are fully compliant with our obligations under both Conventions and continue to press for their full and effective implementation. To this end, both nationally and with our EU partners, we have conducted a series of demarches world-wide, with particular attention to regions of tension such as the Middle East.

The United Kingdom was instrumental in securing a successful outcome to the BWC Review Conference in November 2002, which saw agreement on a three year work programme of practical measures to deal with the BW threat. At the forthcoming CWC Review Conference (28 April-9 May 2003) the UK will be presenting a number of important technical and scientific papers. The strength of our political support and commitment to both Conventions, as well as the technical expertise we contribute, are second to none.

Afghanistan (Moazzam Begg)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the US Government to permit access by the Red Cross and by British diplomats to Moazzam Begg who is detained at Bagram Airbase in Afghanistan; when; and with what result. [97993]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has raised the case of Moazzam Begg with the US Secretary of State, Colin Powell, on a number of occasions, most recently on 23 January. Mr. Begg was transferred to Guantanamo Bay on 6 February. Officials have discussed access to Mr. Begg, most recently on 10 February, and expect to see him shortly.

We understand the Red Cross had access to Mr. Begg in Afghanistan. Previously they have had access to all the British detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

Africa

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implementation of the policies on Africa announced by the Prime Minister in September 2001. [91268]

Mr. Rammell: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made Africa a priority for this Government. Our aims in Africa are peace and security; ending inequality and poverty; social justice and human rights; and improved political and economic governance.

Last year at Kananaskis, the Prime Minister announced that the UK development programme for Africa will increase to 1 billion a year by 2006. Our development programme addresses the range of challenges faced by Africa and supports African governments' own efforts to achieve the internationally agreed Millennium Development Goals in Africa. For example, our work on health includes supporting the development of health systems, improving access to essential medicines and working towards eradicating polio. In education we are working with African governments to realise their aspirations of education for all.

The UK recognises that peace and security is a prerequisite for Africa's development. In April 2001, we established the Africa Conflict Prevention Pool, which brings together all relevant government ministries to identify ways to tackle violent conflict in Africa.

We continue to work with international financial institutions to ensure that the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative achieves its aim of freeing eligible African countries from unsustainable debt. In addition, the UK goes further than required under HIPC and gives 100 per cent. debt relief to countries once they qualify. For the 22 African countries that have reached 'decision point' all repayments on their debts (worth over £800 million) have ceased.

African commitment to progress is encapsulated in the New Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD) where African governments have made commitments to improve political and economic governance, solve conflicts and to move forward development. The UK was one of the prime movers behind the formulation of the G8 Africa Action Plan launched at Kananaskis last year in support of NEPAD.

Capital Projects

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place the evaluations for Capital Modernisation Fund projects in his Department since 1998 in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [97034]

Mr. Rammell: The FCO has received Capital Modernisation Funds for three projects: The "Internet" project, "Entry Clearance Modernisation" and "e-procurement". The first two projects are still under way. The e-procurement project has been completed, and an evaluation is in progress. Consequently, no evaluation reports are yet available.

Laptops

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many laptop computers were used by (a) Ministers and special advisers and (b) officials in his Department in each year since 1995; how many were (i) lost and (ii) stolen; what their cost was; and if he will make a statement. [97497]

Mr. Rammell: We do not have a central record of the numbers of laptops issued as budgets have been devolved to overseas posts and UK directorates. This information therefore would be available only at disproportionate cost.

No laptops have been reported lost or stolen in the past two years. We do not have earlier records.

Domestic Violence

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to raise awareness of domestic violence, with particular reference to (a) supporting efforts to curb domestic violence and (b) providing services for those victims, in foreign countries and in the Commonwealth. [97750]

Mr. Rammell: The FCO is supporting a number of projects in, for example, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Uganda, China and Brazil, to counter domestic violence. The UK promotes women's enjoyments of their rights and freedoms more generally by negotiating resolutions and other documents in international fora, by funding human rights work in favour of women.

Foreign Postings

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many of his Department's officials have been posted abroad in each region in each year since 1997. [96305]

Mr. Straw: The number of Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials who have been posted abroad since 1997 is listed as follows:

Region	1997	1998	1999	2000	2001	2002
Africa	233	292	264	250	121	127
Americas	235	288	328	290	102	128
Asia Pacific	503	473	532	517	245	202
European Union	239	293	298	274	143	138
Wider Europe	245	350	377	300	129	148
Middle East	141	157	239	172	81	87
Temp	29	27	33	37	33	24
Other	130	146	168	186	206	54

Note:

1. The figures above do not give an accurate picture, they simply state how many people were posted to that region during that year. At present the FCO has over 2,000 officers based abroad.
2. "Temp" refers to those officers who provide temporary cover at posts so are not based in one specific region.
3. "Other" refers to commands who cover various regions. We are unable to separate this figure by region without incurring disproportionate costs.
4. Post tour lengths vary from one year to five years depending on region so the figures should not be used for comparison purposes between regions.

Kashmir

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Indian Government on human rights abuses in Kashmir. [98011]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary most recently raised human rights in Kashmir with Yashwant Sinha, the Indian Foreign Minister, during his visit to India on 18–20 July 2002. I more recently discussed a wide range of human rights issues, including Kashmir with ID Swami, Indian Minister of State for Home Affairs during my visit to India on 17 October.

Kyrgyzstan

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with non-governmental organisations and international aid organisations regarding building relationships with Kyrgyzstan; and if he will make a statement. [97163]

Mr. MacShane: Officials from the British Embassy in Kazakhstan, which is also responsible for relations with Kyrgyzstan, meet with Kyrgyz NGOs on a regular basis. The Department for International Development office in Bishkek liaises with international aid organisations in Kyrgyzstan and provides technical assistance to programmes funded by, among others, the World bank.

DfID targets assistance in areas such as rural livelihoods, health, sanitation and water supply, tariff policy and social development.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions the European Union has had regarding developing relations with Kyrgyzstan; and if he will make a statement. [97164]

Mr. MacShane: The framework for relations between the EU and Kyrgyzstan is the EU-Kyrgyzstan Partnership and Co-operation Agreement (PCA). Officials from EU member states and Kyrgyzstan meet annually at a Co-operation Council and a Co-operation Committee in Brussels to discuss progress in relations. The Co-operation Committee last met in November 2002. In the course of developing the dialogue between the parties, the EU occasionally makes representations locally, most recently in late January. It also regularly makes statements at the OSCE Permanent Council in Vienna on bilateral issues and issues of concern. For example, the EU welcomed the recent consultative process of constitutional reform in Kyrgyzstan, but later expressed reservations about it.

The fourth Co-operation Council met in July 2002. The fourth Co-operation Committee will meet in March 2003, and a broad ranging agenda will cover economic issues, justice and home affairs, foreign policy, regional co-operation, democracy and human rights. The most recent statement on Kyrgyzstan at the OSCE Permanent Council was on 6 February.

Nepal

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) in what measures the Government is involved to strengthen Nepal's (a) military and (b) police capacity; [96668]

(2) in what initiatives the Government is involved to create a lasting peace in Nepal. [96667]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government welcomes the ceasefire agreed between the Government of Nepal and the Maoists on 29 January. We remain committed to working with the Nepalese, and our international partners, towards a lasting peace in Nepal and we continue to coordinate international efforts to help resolve the conflict in Nepal. This is largely being done through the International Support Group, a body formed as a result of the international conference hosted by the UK in London in June. Further to our £22 million bilateral development programme, we have a package of £6.7 million under our Global Conflict Prevention Pool. Projects funded from this pool are aimed at short-term development and reinforcing Nepal's development, military and police capacity.

An advisor from the Department for International Development is working with the Inspectorate General of Police in Nepal on reforms to modernise and enhance the professionalism of the police. This includes support to establish an Independent Police Service Commission, enhance police training and extend community policing.

For details of our military assistance to Nepal, I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 6 November 2003, Official Report, column 310W, to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge).

Consular Prison Visits

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what guidelines he has issued on how often representatives from British high commissions or British embassies visit British nationals serving prison sentences in foreign countries to check their health and prison conditions; and to whom reports of these visits are made. [97537]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In July 1992, the Consular Action Plan (CAP) was established to ensure the principles of the Citizen's Charter were introduced into consular work.

On prison visiting, the CAP sets the target time for the first contact to be made with the detainee within 24 hours of notification of arrest and the first visit within 48 hours of that notification. Thereafter, consular staff are advised to visit at "reasonable" intervals, depending on the circumstances and needs of the individual prisoner. In countries where prison conditions are harsh, efforts are made to ensure that detainees receive at least quarterly visits.

During consular visits, staff will:

ensure the person is not being subjected to degrading or inhumane treatment, or being discriminated against on grounds of nationality; gain an impression of the person's state of health to enable appropriate follow-up action to be taken with the prison authorities; give the person the opportunity to express any legitimate complaint about the conditions of imprisonment; facilitate, if necessary, contact between the detainee and a lawyer;

if appropriate, discuss arrangements for the person's return to the UK on release.

Reports of every prison visit are sent to the Consular Division of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in London. We pass on information about the visits to the next of kin. Unless the detainee has requested that we do not.

Turkish-Cypriot Community

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met representatives of the Turkish-Cypriot community in the UK; and what issues were discussed. [97776]

Mr. MacShane: Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials are in regular contact with representatives and members of both Turkish Cypriot and Greek Cypriot communities in the UK in order to discuss the full range of issues of interest to those communities.

The current UN talks process is naturally of particular concern. The Government continues to express its full support for the UN Secretary-General's 10 December proposals, which would provide for a settlement in the best interests of all Cypriots. We are urging all those involved to secure a settlement by 28 February, enabling referenda to be held on both sides of the island and a reunited Cyprus to sign the Treaty of Accession with the EU on 16 April.

I maintain a close interest in the settlement process and regularly meet interested parties in the UK. Most recently, I held a discussion with the Friends of Cyprus Group on the state of play in the settlement talks.

Western Sahara

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made concerning the referendum on the future of Western Sahara to (a) the Government of Morocco and (b) the United Nations; and if he will make a statement. [97509]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave her on 22 January, Official Report, column 358W.

The Secretary General (UNSG) reported to the United Nations Security Council on the situation concerning Western Sahara in advance of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) mandate renewal. His personal envoy (PE), James Baker has presented a proposal to the parties to the dispute for a political solution, as requested by Security Council Resolution 1429 of 30 July 2002. His proposals have not been published.

Our position remains that we fully support the UN process and the efforts of the UNSG and PE to find a political solution to this dispute that provides for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara (as UNSCR 1429 of 30 July 2002). We supported the extension of MINURSO's mandate until 31 March 2003 as requested by the UNSG to give the parties time to consider the latest proposals.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what special arrangements his Department is making to ensure that those teachers that hold British passports, and who are leaving Zimbabwe owing to political oppression, are categorised as skilled or semi-skilled workers rather than economic migrants when entering the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [97548]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: British citizens have the right of abode in the United Kingdom, and there is therefore no need for them to be categorised according to their skills. British passport-holders who have other categories of British nationality may enter the UK as visitors, but would need to seek prior entry clearance before coming to the UK for any other reason.

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what special arrangements his Department is making to ensure that those pensioners that hold British passports, and who are leaving Zimbabwe owing to political oppression, are given priority in entering the UK; what arrangements are being made to ensure their financial needs are met; and if he will make a statement. [97549]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: No special arrangements have been made for British pensioners who choose to leave Zimbabwe and return to the UK.

Any British citizen arriving in the UK from abroad may make an immediate claim for income-support, housing benefit, council tax benefits and jobseeker's allowance (income-based) subject to meeting certain criteria, including demonstrating that they are habitually resident in the UK. These benefits are only paid to people with close ties to the UK and an intention to settle here.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Child Abuse

Vera Baird: To ask the Solicitor General how many children were (a) killed and (b) non-accidentally injured while in the care of their parents or carers in (i) 2001 and (ii) 2002. [97118]

Jacqui Smith: I have been asked to reply.

Information detailing the number of children who were killed or suffered non-accidental injury while in the care of their parents or carers in 2001 and 2002 is not held centrally.

However, by revamping its database of serious cases, the Department of Health has a record of serious case notifications from 1 April 2002. A serious case notification concerns the death of, or serious injury to, a child where abuse and/or neglect may have been a factor. As at 11 February 2003, there have been 133 recorded serious case notifications to the database. Of these notifications, 103 were of deaths and 30 were of serious injuries.

Information detailing the number of children under 16-years-old, who are currently recorded as being victims of homicide, a category which covers murder, manslaughter and infanticide, over the last 10 years, classified by relationship of victim to principal suspect, has been placed in the Library.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Archaeological Sites (Cornwall)

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans she has to protect (a) underground, (b) overground and (c) underwater archaeological sites in Cornwall. [96584]

Dr. Howells: The remains of the past, whether above ground, underground or underwater are currently identified and protected by a framework of designation regimes. This includes the listing of buildings of special architectural and historic merit, the scheduling of ancient monuments and the designation of conservation areas and historic wreck sites. Separate systems also exist for the identification of historic parks, gardens and battlefields and for the inscription of World Heritage Sites.

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action she has taken regarding archaeological sites in Cornwall in the last five years. [96822]

Howells: During the last five years nearly 200 sites in Cornwall have been designated as Scheduled Ancient Monuments, ranging from prehistoric burial mounds to 19th century mining remains associated with the tin industry. A Scheduled Monument comprises of one or more individual archaeological items, and in the case of these Cornwall monuments, 572 separate archaeological items have been protected.

English Heritage has additionally undertaken evaluation work to identify nationally important 20th century military sites, industrial monuments and bridges in Cornwall, as well as throughout England. This work has contributed to our understanding of such archaeological sites and has identified sites for statutory designation in Cornwall. There has also been increasing involvement in more recent years with the World Heritage Site bid for Cornish Mining and a programme to protect nationally important mining remains within the selected bid areas is under way.

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on her policy on the protection of underwater wrecks that are of archaeological interest. [96586]

Dr. Howells: The Department's responsibility for underwater archaeology primarily extends to administering the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973 in England and designating wrecks off English waters under the Act. It is the Department's policy to protect the best examples of our underwater heritage while encouraging greater access to it. To achieve this, we seek to work constructively with both the archaeological and diving communities, and to encourage co-operation between the two groups.

Licensing Bill

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what impact assessment she has made of the effect of the proposals in the Licensing Bill on not for profit sports clubs; [97405]

(2) what assessment she has made of the likely additional cost on the voluntary sports club sector of being required to (a) obtain licences for club entertainment and (b) comply with the annual inspection fees as proposed in the Licensing Bill; [97403]

(3) what plans she has to assist voluntary sports clubs to meet with the costs imposed by the proposals within the Licensing Bill; [97401]

(4) for what reasons she will require clubs to apply for licences for club entertainment under the proposed Licensing and Entertainment Bill; and how many clubs will be required to obtain such a licence. [97404]

Dr. Howells: Voluntary or not for profit sports clubs do not enjoy any special status under current alcohol or entertainment licensing law. They may, however, operate as registered clubs under the Licensing Act 1964 and therefore enjoy a different status to those operating under justices' licences. Under the Licensing Bill the separate system for authorisations for qualifying clubs will continue through the new club premises certificate. The Regulatory Impact Assessment that accompanies the Bill states that there are currently just over 22,000 registered clubs.

Registered clubs are not currently completely exempt from the need for permission to have live entertainment. They need a certificate of suitability from the local authority and a special hours certificate from the magistrates if they currently wish to provide entertainment for extended hours.

Qualifying clubs will be required to obtain authorisation to provide regulated entertainment under the Bill, this is to ensure that the activity is carried on in accordance with the requirements necessary to promote the licensing objectives: the prevention of crime and disorder; public safety; the prevention of public nuisance; and the protection of children from harm.

The Government estimate that under the provisions of the Licensing Bill an application for a club premises certificate would cost between £100 and £500 with an annual charge of between £50 and £150 to maintain a revenue stream and cover continuing inspection and enforcement. It will cost no more, in terms of time or money, to apply for a certificate permitting the sale of alcohol and the provision of regulated entertainment than it would to apply for one permitting the sale of alcohol only. The Licensing Bill will not, therefore, impose additional costs for clubs. No specific impact assessment was carried out on not for profit sports clubs. The Regulatory Impact Assessment that accompanies the Bill estimates that voluntary associations and other non-profit making bodies would save around £150 million over the first 10 years of operation.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she intends to reply to the letter to her dated 20 December from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, with regard to Mr. G. Davies. [94698]

Tessa Jowell: I wrote to my right hon. Friend on 10 February 2003.

EU Intercultural Understanding

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will list the programmes and schemes funded by her Department aimed at enhancing inter-cultural understanding among EU member states. [97897]

Mr. Caborn: The Department does not contribute directly to any EU-funded programme or scheme aimed at enhancing inter-cultural understanding or co-operation among EU member states. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer holds responsibility for the United Kingdom's contribution to the EC Budget, and from this budget the following programmes are funded:

Culture 2000, which aims to foster and fund cooperation between artistic and cultural organisations and projects within the European Union and the Candidate Countries;

Media Plus, the aim of which is to strengthen the competitiveness of the European audiovisual industry by training of professionals, development of production projects, and distribution and promotion of cinematographic works and audiovisual programmes throughout the EU and candidate countries.

Departmental Budgets

Mr. Roger Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what the combined allocated budgets are for her Department's non-departmental public bodies in (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06; [97527]

(2) what the allocated budgets are for each of her Department's executive agencies in (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06. [97525]

Dr. Howells: Details of allocated budgets up to 2005–06 will be published in the spring 2003 departmental report. The information will include how budgets are allocated to deliver the Department's functions and objectives.

Tourism Industry

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans are in place to compensate for the fall in foreign visitors to the UK since (a) 11 September 2001 and (b) the Bali terrorist attacks. [97927]

Dr. Howells: In April 2002, the British Tourist Authority launched 'Only in Britain, Only in 2002', a campaign to promote Britain in our seven biggest overseas markets. It was funded by £20 million from the Government and over £5 million in cash contributions from the industry, and featured extensive television, radio and press advertising. In addition, BTA offices around the world continue to undertake a full range of marketing and promotional activities, including consumer, travel trade and press liaison work.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps have been taken to increase the numbers of North American tourists to the UK since September 2001. [97926]

Dr. Howells: In April 2002, the British Tourist Authority launched 'Only in Britain, Only in 2002', a campaign to promote Britain in our seven biggest overseas markets, including the USA and Canada. The BTA continues to build on positive campaign feedback in North America and undertakes a full range of marketing and promotional activities, including consumer, travel trade and press liaison work.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment she has made of the effect military action in Iraq will have on the UK tourism industry. [97932]

Dr. Howells: No decision has been taken on military action and it is not possible to make accurate predictions of any impact on the tourism industry. Some overseas visitors might be more reluctant to travel, but more British people might choose to holiday in the UK. We are working closely with the British Tourist Authority and the tourism industry to share information and to ensure that clear and consistent messages are provided to our potential overseas visitors.

Lake Windermere

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment she has made of the likely impact on sport and recreation of the introduction of a 10 mile per hour speed limit on Lake Windermere. [98074]

Mr. Caborn: This Department has made no such assessment. Sport England gave evidence to the inquiry into the Lake Windermere byelaws, stating that in their view a speed reduction would affect water sports, specifically water skiing.

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how the increase in participation targets set out in the Government's Game Plan will be affected by the speed limit restrictions for Lake Windermere. [98075]

Mr. Caborn: We do not expect the speed limit restrictions for Lake Windermere to have any significant effect on the increase in participation targets set out in Game Plan.

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what alternative venues have been sought by Sport England to accommodate those affected by the introduction of the Navigation Bye Law 1992 at Lake Windermere. [98077]

Mr. Caborn: During the inquiry into the implementation of the Navigation Bye Laws at Lake Windermere, Sport England along with the British Water Ski Federation considered the issue of the displacement of motorised water sports from the Lake. Sport England and the British Water Ski Federation continue to work together with those affected by the Byelaws to negotiate access to suitable areas of water for the continuation of these sports.

Neither the Government nor Sport England would seek to impose specific alternative venues on those affected by the Navigation Byelaws on Lake Windermere. We believe it is for individuals to find convenient sites that will enable them to pursue water skiing and the other motorised water sports that will be affected by the Byelaws.

Olympic Bid

Joyce Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment she has made of the consequences for the existing planned levels of public expenditure on investment in (a) Greater London and (b) each English region of an Olympic bid. [98158]

Tessa Jowell: We do not expect planned levels of public investment region by region to be affected in the course of any Olympic bid, the outcome of which would be known by July 2005.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what government funds have been spent on the proposed bid to hold the Olympics of 2012. [97929]

Tessa Jowell: In addition to normal running costs, my Department has incurred extra costs, currently forecast at £251,828 including VAT, relating to consideration of a bid to host the Olympic Games in London 2012.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport whether the proposed increase in council tax to fund the 2012 Olympic bid and event will apply only to residents of London. [97931]

Tessa Jowell: There are no plans to fund the bidding or staging of the 2012 Olympic Games through an increase in council tax for residents outside London.

Public Entertainment Outlets

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what requirement is made of public entertainment outlets to ensure that first aid treatment is available during opening hours; and if she will make a statement. [98007]

Dr. Howells: Public entertainment licensing law provides that the local authority may impose any terms, conditions or restrictions that they consider necessary to ensure the safety of people at the premises. A requirement for there to be first aid equipment on the premises and members of staff trained in its use is therefore common. The application of licence conditions does not in any way replace or reduce the underlying statutory duty of employers or self-employed persons to comply with the requirements of the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974 and any associated regulations and codes of practice. Employers and self-employed persons are required to assess the risks to their workers and any others (e.g. members of the public) who may be affected by their business so as to identify what measures are needed to avoid or control the risks. Accordingly, the businesses would ideally need to provide first aid equipment on their premises, in working order, and at least one member of staff trained in its use.

Regional Newspapers

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations she has received on the impact of the Communications Bill on regional newspapers. [98063]

Dr. Howells: We have received a number of representations on this subject, many from editors of newspapers owned by Johnston Press plc. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has also discussed the subject with newspaper proprietors and the Newspaper Society.

Terrestrial Television

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what her policy is on whether terrestrial television stations should be protected from ownership by corporations with a substantial stake in the national newspaper market. [97867]

Dr. Howells: Our policy is to prevent joint ownership of a substantial share of the newspaper market and a substantial part of Channel 3, the only commercial public service broadcaster that currently has universal access to a mass audience. We believe this would represent an unacceptable concentration of influence.

The Communications Bill is therefore retaining restrictions on newspaper proprietors holding Channel 3 licences. The rules in the Bill are as follows:

No one controlling more than 20 per cent. of the national newspaper market may hold any licence for Channel 3;

No one who runs a national newspaper with more than a 20 per cent. share of the total national market share may hold more than a 20 per cent. stake in any Channel 3 company;

No Channel 3 licence holder may be a participant with more than a 20 per cent. interest in a body which runs a national newspaper controlling 20 per cent. of the national market;

A company in which such a newspaper proprietor holds more than a 20 per cent. share cannot itself hold more than a 20 per cent. share in such a service.

There is also a parallel local rule so that:

> No one may own a Channel 3 licence if he runs local newspapers which together have more than 20 per cent. of the local market share in the coverage area of the service.

We believe that these new rules will allow more freedoms for Channel 3 whilst at the same time safeguarding against substantial joint ownership of the newspaper market and Channel 3. We believe that there are less grounds for concern about the cross-ownership of Channel 5 by a large newspaper group, as it has a relatively small audience, does not reach the whole UK population and has fewer public service commitments than ITV. Were the nature of the service to change, however, and its audience share increase under new ownership, it will be possible to alter the public service obligations of the Channel 5 licence, and to introduce a nominated news provider system.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what her Department is doing to encourage a pluralistic media culture, with particular reference to terrestrial television channels. [97868]

Dr. Howells: The Communications Bill ensures that rules will be retained to safeguard democratic debate at national, regional and local level. In particular, there will be limits on the joint-ownership of newspapers and ITV. Newspapers are the most editorially influential mass medium, and television is people's most trusted source of information. Joint-ownership of a substantial share of the newspaper market and a substantial part of Channel 3, the only commercial public service broadcaster that currently has universal access to a mass audience, would represent an unacceptable concentration of influence. Therefore, no one owning a regional Channel 3 licence may own more than 20 per cent. of the local/regional newspaper market in the same region.

We believe that there are less grounds for concern about the cross-ownership of Channel 5 by a large newspaper group, as it has a relatively small audience, does not reach the whole UK population and has fewer public service commitments than ITV. Were the nature of the service to change, however, and its audience share increase under new ownership, it will be possible to alter the public service obligations of the Channel 5 licence, and to introduce a nominated news provider system.

The existence of the BBC and Channel 4 will ensure that there are at least three separately controlled free-to-air public service TV broadcasters, in addition to the expanding range of digital channels.

There will also be a scheme to protect the range of voices that exist in the local media. Newspaper and television owners will be subject to local ownership rules that will ensure the existence of at least three local or regional commercial media voices (in TV, radio and newspapers) in most areas.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

Child Care

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister for Women what assessment she has made of access to child care for women. [97716]

Ms Hewitt: Various assessments have been made of access to child care for women. Access to child care was fully explored in the Repeat Study of Parents' Demand for Childcare, focusing on working mothers and non-working mothers (including single mothers). Aspects of access to child care investigated included the role of child care, child care arrangements and difficulties with child care. The issue of access to child care for parents, including mothers was investigated in the 'Fifth Survey of Parents of Three and Four Year Old Children and Their Use of Early Years Services'. The survey included the amount of information available to guide their choices, the quality of education provided by their main provider and the quality of nursery education and child care provided by local providers.

My Department has also included questions on child care in this year's Work-Life Balance surveys of employers and employees. We expect to have the findings this summer. The Women and Equality Unit have also commissioned research into women's decision-making about child care, in relation to participation in the labour market, involving minority ethnic women in particular. The findings of this research will also be available in the summer.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Broadband

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of broadband telecoms is controlled by BT outside cable franchise areas. [97235]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 11 February 2003]: According to the Oftel Internet and Broadband Brief for January 2003, cable television services were available to 13.3 million homes (over 53 per cent. of households in UK) at the end of December 2002. Broadband services are also available over ADSL, fixed wireless and satellite. These were available respectively to 63 per cent., 12 per cent. and 100 per cent. of UK households. BT's share of the total retail broadband market is some 22 per cent. We have made no specific analysis of the UK market without areas covered by cable television networks.

Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what regional boundaries are being used for the allocation of 3.4 GHz wireless broadband licences. [98168]

Mr. Timms: The Wireless Telegraphy (Public Fixed Wireless Access Licences), Regulations 2002 S.I. No. 1911, which came into force on 12 August 2002, provide for the award of 15 Public Fixed Wireless Access (PFWA) regional licences. There are seven metropolitan and seven provincial licence regions for Scotland Wales and England and one provincial licence for Northern Ireland.

The regions are:

Central Scotland (Metropolitan)
Greater London (Metropolitan) Midlands (Metropolitan)
Northern (Metropolitan)
Severnside (Metropolitan)
South Coast (Metropolitan)
Tyne-Tees (Metropolitan)
Midlands and Mid Wales (Provincial)
Northern Ireland (Provincial)
North of England (Provincial)
North West, Yorkshire and North Wales (Provincial) Scotland (Provincial) South East (Provincial)
Southern (Provincial)
South West and South Wales (Provincial)

I have placed a copy of the map and the post code details of these in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultation has taken place with the National Assembly for Wales on the allocation of 3.4 GHz wireless broadband licences. [98169]

Mr. Timms: Consultation on the allocation of 3.4 GHz public fixed wireless access (PFWA) licences began on 19 December 2000, when the Radiocommunications Agency ("RA"), on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry ("SoS"), published a consultative document entitled 3.4 and 10 GHz: Scenarios for Spectrum Packaging and Delivery ("the December Consultation Document"). This Consultation Document presented a number of scenarios for packaging and delivering licences to establish and use stations and apparatus for wireless telegraphy in the 3.4 GHz and 10 GHz bands for the provision of Fixed Wireless Access services ("FWA") (referred to in this paper as "spectrum licences", "licences" or "FWA licences").

Following a detailed review of the responses to the December Consultation Document and the completion of further technical studies in the 3.4 GHz and 10 GHz bands a further consultation document, "PFWA: Proposal by the RA to package and deliver licences at 3.4GHz", published in April 2002, set out the proposal to award spectrum licences for the 3.4 GHz band.

Both consultations were carried out nationally and all Government Departments and devolved Administrations were invited, along with industry and the public, to be involved and comment on the proposals. Among the many comments received and meetings held, RA received input and held discussions with officials of the National Assembly for Wales on numerous occasions.

Burma

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which UK banks have provided loans to the (a) regime in and (b) state owned industries in Burma, in the past two financial years. [97266]

Ms Hewitt: HMG's policy is not to encourage UK companies to trade or invest in Burma in view of the current political and human rights situation there. HMG does not have access to comprehensive information kept by UK banks in their overseas dealings. However we are not aware of any UK bank offering banking services in Burma.

Capita

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to his answer of 9 January 2003, Official Report, column 6W, on Capita, if he will give the (a) start and finish date, (b) value, (c) evaluation mechanism for successful delivery and (d) penalty charges for failure to deliver for each contract; whether penalty charges have been incurred; what the service level agreements were; what the contract numbers were; and if he will make a statement. [97338]

Ms Hewitt: This information is not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Coal Industry (Social Welfare Organisation)

Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made in providing funds for the Coal Industry Social Welfare Organisation to continue its work. [98167]

Mr. Wilson: The Department has offered to provide funding of £200,000 per year for three years for those of CISWO's activities which specifically relate to DTI responsibilities such as the management of Miners' Welfare trusts and an extensive property portfolio.

Computer Crime

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft her Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside her Department. [97563]

Ms Hewitt: The number of cases of computer hacking detected was zero in Financial Year 2001–02 and there were no recorded instances of DTI computer systems being accessed illegally from within or outside for the same period.

There were no recorded cases of computer fraud during Financial Year 2001–02.

The number of cases of computer theft detected was 31 in Financial Year 2001–02. Of these, 28 were perpetrated by insiders and the remainder by persons outside the Department. Some of these 31 instances involved departmental assets but others related to assets owned by PFI partners, contractor staff or individuals.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what value for money assessment she has made of expenditure by her Department and its agencies; and if she will make a statement; [95807]

(2) what assessment she has made of the value for money of expenditure on (a) ACAS, (b) the Patent Office and (c) British Trade International; and if she will make a statement. [95810]

Ms Hewitt: Value for money assessment of expenditure is determined by whether the Department meets its Public Service Agreement targets alongside specific operational targets for the central Department, its agencies and ACAS, which is a non-departmental public body. Achievement against these targets is published annually in the Department's annual expenditure plans report (EPR) and in individual agency's own annual reports and accounts. The Department's EPR for 2003–04 to 2004–05 is due to be published in April 2003. British Trade International produces a separate EPR which is also due to be published in April 2003. Major new proposals for expenditure are subject to appraisal as well as monitoring and evaluation. Evaluations are published on the DTI's website at www.dti.gov.uk/about/evaluation/

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what her estimate is of her Department's direct financial support for the construction industry in each year from 1990–91 to 2004–05 (planned); and if she will make a statement; [95813]

(2) what her estimate is of the cost to her Department of the Strategic Forum for Construction in 2002–03; and if she will make a statement. [95814]

Mr. Wilson: Over the period 1990–91 to 2000–01, responsibility for the construction industry rested with the former Department of the Environment and then the former Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. Expenditure over this period related to responsibilities which are now divided between the Department of Trade and Industry, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and British Trade International. The figures are:

Year	£ million
1990–91	20.0
1991–92	23.9
1992–93	25.3
1993–94	26.2
1994–95	26.9
1995–96	27.6
1996–97	27.5
1997–98	27.4
1998–99	28.3
1999–2000	25.4
2000–01	26.7

Figures for the following two years, covering the Department of Trade and Industry's expenditure only, are:

Year	£ million

Final allocations have not yet been made for 2003–04 or 2004–05; as the Secretary of State has announced, the Department is conducting a major review of all its business support, including that for the construction sector. However, we expect the budget for construction next year to be close to that for this year.

In addition to hosting and administering the meetings of the Strategic Forum for Construction during the development of its report, "Accelerating Change", the Department supported the Forum's work financially by funding the development, publication and launch of the report, the consultation process, which preceded it, and the dissemination of its conclusions. The Department's total expenditure in support of the Strategic Forum in 2002–03 is expected to be approximately £110,000.

Following the launch of "Accelerating Change" on 12 September 2002, day to day responsibility for the administration of the Strategic Forum passed from the Department to the construction industry. Officials and I in the Department continue to work closely with the Forum, its members and its new chairman, Peter Rogers. We will continue to identify areas where financial support from Government will allow the Forum to meet its aim of implementing the "Accelerating Change" proposals.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of expenditure on ACAS in each year from 1990–91 to 2004–05 (planned); and if she will make a statement. [95823]

Ms Hewitt: Information covering expenditure on ACAS is available in DTI's and prior to 1995 the Employment Department's expenditure plans. All documents are available in the Libraries of the House. The estimate for 2004–05 will be published shortly in my Department's expenditure plans report for 2003–04 to 2004–05.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of total spending on the Export Credits Guarantee Department in each year from 1990–91 to 2004–05 (planned); and if she will make a statement. [95829]

Ms Hewitt: The following table shows ECGD net operating income or expenditure (Column 1), voted payments or contributions on its trading operations (Column 2) and voted loan advances or income in respect of refinancing of loans underwritten (Column 3). Forecasts for 2004–05 have not been prepared at this stage.

Year	Net operating income (expenditure) Column 1	Trading operations—contribution to consolidated fund/ (voted payments) Column 2	Loan refinancing—(voted payments)/ repayments Column 3
1990–91	(649,500)	(504,631)	0
1992–93	570,100	(137,427)	0
1993–94	407,500	396,860	0
1994–95	208,200	149,612	0
1995–96	342,400	496,066	0

2002–03[1]	(58,700)	148,315	(557,000)
2003–04[1]	101,000	105,736	405,000

[1] Estimate

Departmental Initiatives

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) initiatives, (b) action programmes, (c) campaigns and (d) schemes are being run by her Department and its agencies; if she will list each of these with its annual cost; and if she will make a statement. [95816]

Ms Hewitt: The Department's annual expenditure plans report contains information on the Department's activities and expenditure, including summary information on the work of DTI's agencies. Last year's report was published in June 2002 (Cm 5416) and can be found in the Libraries of the House. Next year's, which will cover 2003–04 to 2005–06, is due to be published in April. In addition, each agency publishes more detailed information on its work in its own annual report and accounts.

Domestic Violence

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps she is taking to raise awareness in the workplace of domestic violence. [97753]

Alan Johnson: Often the workplace can be a place of safety for women. They may confide in their colleagues about their experiences. It is a place where others can notice what is going on, and where there is an opportunity to help women to access the support they can so desperately need.

The TUC has recently published a workplace guide. This sets out guidance on how to provide a workplace policy on domestic violence, why it is an issue that matters in the workplace, and useful information contacts.

Women's Aid, in association with Opportunity Now, are launching a Good Practice Guide for Employers on Domestic Violence on 2 April 2003.

The Women and Equality Unit has been closely involved with both these initiatives.

Electricity (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many clauses were (a) fully, (b) partially and (c) not debated during the Committee Stage of the Electricity (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill. [97994]

Mr. Wilson: The proceedings in Committee on 6 February, Official Report, columns 468–529, allowed the House to debate a number of amendments tabled by the hon. Member and the hon. Members for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) and Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell).

Power Station Emissions

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her assessment is of the effectiveness of emissions scrubbers in removing mercury pollutants from power station emissions. [97522]

Mr. Wilson: There are a number of factors which affect the effectiveness of scrubbers removing mercury emissions. Around 40–60 per cent. of the mercury produced during coal combustion is in the elemental vapour form and the type of wet scrubbers used on coal-fired plant (eg flue gas desulphurisation (FGD) used for sulphur dioxide control) are not effective in removing this form of mercury from the flue gas. Of the remaining mercury, which is in an oxidised form, wet emissions scrubbers have been shown to be effective. In summary, it is estimated that about 50 per cent. of mercury produced is removed by wet scrubbers. There is no information on dry scrubbers although there is research being carried out on this.

A study on the monitoring and control of trace elements from coal-fired power generation is about to be let within the DTI's Cleaner Coal Technology Programme and this will include mercury emissions, their measurement, and their effects, and will cover the emerging legislative and policy issues.

Fireworks Bill

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the Government's policy is on the Fireworks Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Hamilton South. [97653]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I announced that the Government will be supporting my hon. Friend's Bill on fireworks as published on 13 February, which will provide new powers to control the misuse of fireworks.

Fraud and Theft

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much money has been lost by her Department and its agencies and non-departmental public bodies through (a) fraud and (b) theft for each year since 1996–97. [92473]

Ms Hewitt: The estimated cost of theft and fraud to the Department and its agencies is as follows.

Theft	DTI (£)	Agencies (£)
1998	11,267	[1]—
1999	10,985	[1]—
2000	5,870	[1]—
2001	18,782	[1]—
2002	65,131	23,133

[1] Not available

Information on thefts and losses in agencies is not normally held centrally in the DTI and it was not possible to identify costs for years before 2002 without incurring disproportionate cost. The DTI does not hold information on thefts in NDPBs.

Heritage Assets

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what sales of heritage assets and antique assets have been made by her Department since May 1997; and if she will list such assets; and if she will estimate the total sales proceeds. [92399]

Ms Hewitt: The Department of Trade and Industry has not disposed of any heritage assets or antique assets since May 1997.

Manufacturing (Portsmouth)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many and what percentage of the work force in Portsmouth (a) were employed in 1997 and (b) are employed in the manufacturing industry; and if she will make a statement. [98098]

Alan Johnson: In 1997 it was estimated that some 13,400 people, 13.6 per cent. of the work force were employed in the manufacturing sector in Portsmouth.

In 2001, the latest date for which figures are available it was estimated that some 11,300 people, 11.4 per cent. of the work force were employed in the manufacturing sector in Portsmouth.

Ofgem

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the qualifications of the Ofgem Board with responsibility for environmental matters. [86190]

Mr. Wilson: The Gas and Electricity Markets Authority—the "board" for the Office of Gas and Electricity Markets—shares collective responsibility for decisions. I hope to make an announcement shortly of the results of an open competition to find an additional non-executive member of the Authority with particular environmental expertise.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her answer of 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 595W, if she will list the independent interview panel members, with their qualifications, for (a) recent appointments of non-executive members of the Ofgem Board and (b) the appointment of the Chair of Ofgem; and if she will list all the members of the interview panels for (i) the appointment of non-executive members of the Ofgem Board in each of the last three years and (ii) those members of the interview panel for the appointment of the Chair of Ofgem. [94528]

Mr. Wilson: The interview panels for the initial appointments of non-executive members to the Authority in 2000 comprised two senior civil servants, Anna Walker and Neil Hirst, and independent members John Shrigley (Civil Service Commissioner) and Philip Sellers (businessman and Chairman of the Audit Board for DTI). For subsequent non-executive appointments, Joan MacNaughton (Director General, Energy, DTI) replaced Anna Walker on the interview panel.

The 1998 interview panel for the post of Director General of Gas Supply and Director General of Electricity Supply (and Chairman-designate of the Gas and Electricity Markets Authority) comprised three senior civil servants, Jeffrey Preston, Anna Walker, and Paul Salvidge, and Sir Bryan Nicholson (Chairman of BUPA) and Don Cruickshank (then Director General of Telecommunications).

Online Sales/Purchases

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (a) products, (b) goods and (c) services were (i) bought and (ii) sold online by her Department in each of the last five years. [97459]

Ms Hewitt: This information is not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Petrol Stations

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many retail petrol filling stations there are in the UK; and how many there were in (a) 2000 and (b) 1997. [98046]

Mr. Wilson: The Institute of Petroleum's (IP) annual "Retail Survey 2001" has provided the following data on the number of retail petrol filling stations in the UK.

Number of retail petrol stations in the UK

End of 1997	End of 2000	End of 2002
14,824	13,043	Yet to be published

Post Office Services

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations she has received about the ease of access to information about the Post Office bank account. [97961]

Mr. Timms: DTI Ministers and officials regularly receive representations from a wide range of people and organisations about universal banking service, including the Post Office card account.

There will be post office access to a range of bank accounts. This will enable all those who wish to do so to continue to be able to collect their benefits in cash at post offices.

Our aim is that people should be able to choose the option that suits them best. Information about all the options is being supplied to benefit, pension and tax credit customers by the Department for Work and Pensions and the Inland Revenue. Post Office Ltd. will also be making its own material available to customers.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the provision of banking services by sub-post offices in North Yorkshire from 1 April. [98058]

Mr. Timms: Good progress continues to be made on universal banking services in advance of the migration of benefit payments to ACT. Post Office Ltd. currently provides information to customers on banking arrangements at Post Office branches. There will be post office access to a range of bank accounts. This will enable all those who wish to do so to continue to be able to collect their benefits in cash at post offices.

The Government and Post Office Ltd. are working together to ensure that frontline staff have all the information they need to answer any questions from customers about banking facilities in Post Office branches.

Post Office Ltd. has now sent three pieces of communication to all Post Office branches: a leaflet entitled "Your essential guide to your customers' banking options" to explain to sub-postmasters all the options available to customers; a customer child benefit leaflet for issue to customers; and a Banking Information Pack.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what promotion her Department has undertaken of the (a) Post Office Card Account and (b) high street banking options for receipt of benefits, pension payments and tax credits; and what discussions she has had on such promotion with the other Departments involved in the services covered by these methods. [97866]

Mr. Timms: There will be post office access to a range of bank accounts. This will enable all those who wish to do so to continue to be able to collect their benefits in cash at post offices. Information about all the options is being supplied to benefit, pension and tax credit customers by the Department for Work and Pensions and the Inland Revenue. Post Office Ltd. will also be making its own material available to customers.

Ministers and officials have regular contact with all the Departments involved.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions she has had with the Post Office to ensure that they will be able to cope with the effect on income of recipients choosing to pick up their benefits from cash machines or through banks without closures. [97865]

Mr. Timms: Ministers and officials have regular contact with Post Office Ltd. The Post Office's strategy is to respond to the Direct Payment with a range of banking and other services. How the migration of benefit payments affects the revenue of post offices will depend on a number of factors, not least how benefit recipients and other post office customers respond to change. In the meantime the Government have made a firm commitment to prevent avoidable rural closures, in the first instance to 2006; and we are investing very substantial sums in supporting the network through the challenges ahead—some £2 billion in total over the next five years.

A carefully planned programme of reductions in the number of urban post offices commenced recently.

Departmental Buildings

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether a building research establishment environmental assessment method document has been prepared for the refurbishment of (a) Elizabeth House, (b) 1 Victoria Street and (c) 10 Victoria Street. [96414]

Ms Hewitt: A BREEAM assessment was undertaken as part of the 1995–96 major refurbishment project at 1 Victoria Street; it achieved a "very good" rating. The extent of works, at 10 Victoria Street in 1996, and at Elizabeth House in 2002, was not regarded as substantial refurbishment and a BREEAM assessment was not deemed appropriate.

In 1999 the Department's Estates and Facilities Management Directorate was accredited to International Standard for Environmental Management System (ISO 14001), which provides the framework within which all the Department's refurbishment projects, including that at Elizabeth House, are now carried out.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans there are for an extension of the Renewables Obligation to include Coal Mine Methane. [95438]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 6 February 2003]: The Government consider that extending the Renewables Obligation to include Coal Mine Methane would not be consistent with the objectives of the Obligation, since Coal Mine Methane is, self-evidently, not a renewable.

However, we are very supportive of this industry and are keen to help it expand so that it can continue to reduce emissions throughout the UK. We have already demonstrated this support through our securing exemption from the Climate Change Levy for electricity generated from CMM in last year's budget, and this is currently being cleared with the European Commission.

Scottish Parliamentary Elections

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the estimated total cost is to the Post Office of providing free delivery of party election literature during the forthcoming Scottish Parliamentary elections. [95608]

Mr. Timms: Cost is a matter that falls within the day-to-day responsibility of Royal Mail Group plc and I have therefore asked the Chairman to reply direct to the hon. Member.

Selective Financial Assistance

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much selective financial assistance was given to companies outside the assisted areas in each year between 1989–90 and 2001–02; and what her estimate is for the current fiscal year (a) in cash terms and (b) at constant 2001–02 prices. [97242]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 12 February 2003]: Details of the Department's financial assistance to companies outside the assisted areas can be obtained in the annual Industrial Development Act reports which are available in the House of Commons Library. A number of national programmes have assisted companies both within and outside assisted areas but a breakdown of this expenditure could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Data for Scotland and Wales can be obtained from the Scottish Executive and the National Assembly for Wales respectively.

Supermarkets

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps the Director General of Fair Trading has taken, and what arrangements the Director General has in place, to monitor the compliance with and effectiveness of the Supermarket Code of Practice; whether the arrangements for monitoring have changed since the publication of the Government's strategy for Sustainable Farming and Food; and if she will make a statement. [97588]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 12 February 2003]: The Office of Fair Trading (OFT) visited relevant trade bodies to explain how the Code of Practice would work, and to encourage them to bring any problems to the attention of the OFT. The Code also provides for the independent dispute mediator to report annually to the Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT) on his or her activities, and to supply information requested by the DGFT concerning individual cases where he or she is considering taking action.

HOUSE OF COMMONS PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES (HANSARD) ● 2002-03

In the context of the Government's strategy on Sustainable Farming and Food, the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) has proposed that relevant trade bodies advise it at six-monthly intervals on the operation of the Code. The OFT will publish an annual report on how the Code has been working, particularly in relation to dispute resolution. The OFT will soon be beginning a review of the Code in preparation for its first annual report and will be contacting all interested trade bodies and the supermarkets to obtain views on the Code's operation.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the Supermarket Code of Practice on Supermarkets' Dealings with Suppliers applies to the supermarkets' trading relationships with farmers and others who supply the supermarkets indirectly through an intermediary; and if she will make a statement. [97589]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 12 February 2003]: The Code defines a supplier as any person actually or potentially carrying on business in the supply of groceries to any of the four supermarkets which have given statutory undertakings to abide by the Code, namely Asda, Tesco, Sainsburys and Safeway. This includes any supplier who acts as principal in providing groceries to supermarkets either direct or through an agent. However, this does not include suppliers that sell goods to an intermediary which then sells on to a supermarket.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many times the services of a mediator have been offered by supermarkets under paragraph 27 of the Code of Practice on Supermarkets' Dealings with Suppliers; and if she will make a statement; [97590]

(2) how many disputes the Director General of Fair Trading has been notified of under paragraph 28 of the Code of Practice on Supermarkets' Dealings with Suppliers; if she will place a copy of information that has been supplied to the Director General of Fair Trading in accordance with provisions of paragraphs 30*(a)* and 30*(b)* of the Code of Practice in the Library; and if she will make a statement. [97591]

Ms Hewitt [holding answers 12 February 2003]: The dispute resolution procedures, under paragraph 28 of the Code of Practice, have so far not been invoked. To date, the supermarkets have not been called upon to offer the services of a independent mediator.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many submissions were received by the Office of Fair Trading in connection with the Tesco acquisition of T&S; how many of these were from third parties raising concerns about the impact on their business as a result of the proposed acquisition; if she will place a copy of the submissions in the Library; and if she will make a statement. [97587]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 12 February 2003]: The Office of Fair Trading (OFT) received 83 submissions in connection with the proposed acquisition by Tesco PLC of T&S Stores PLC, of which 72 were from third parties raising concerns about possible impacts on their business. It is strict OFT policy to observe confidentiality in all aspects of its operation and, as part of this, the identity of those third parties making representations is not made public. It would not, therefore, be appropriate to place a copy of the submissions in the Library.

The OFT, as an independent competition authority, conducted an inquiry into the proposed merger, focusing on the effects of the merger on competition. It recommended that the merger should not be referred to the Competition Commission for an in-depth inquiry. In line with the Government's policy of accepting the advice of the OFT on merger references in all bar exceptional circumstances, on 17 December 2002 I announced that I would not make a reference in this case.

United Kingdom Accreditation Service

Mr. Mark Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the legal status is of the Memorandum of Understanding between her and the United Kingdom Accreditation Service. [97201]

Ms Hewitt: Article 15 of the Memorandum of Understanding with the United Kingdom Accreditation Service clearly states that this memorandum does not create any rights, liabilities or obligations which would have binding effect in law.

Mr. Mark Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what she is doing to encourage conformity assessment bodies to seek accreditation from the United Kingdom Accreditation Service, pursuant to Article 2 of the Memorandum of Understanding between her and the United Kingdom Accreditation Service, including those upon whose services the Government relies for (a) procurement and (b) regulatory purposes. [97202]

Ms Hewitt: It is DTI policy to encourage all conformity assessment bodies to seek accreditation from the United Kingdom Accreditation Service wherever it is an option notwithstanding that accreditation is a voluntary and market driven activity. It does this: by ensuring that UKAS is operating effectively in accordance with its obligations in the DTI/UKAS Memorandum of Understanding; by helping UKAS to promote the benefits of UKAS accreditation through its Accreditation Awareness Campaign; and through regular contact with the conformity assessment community and other Government Departments. In their contacts with other Government Departments and other parts of DTI, whenever there is a requirement for conformity assessment, my officials encourage their colleagues to rely upon UKAS accredited conformity assessment.

Mr. Mark Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the United Kingdom Accreditation Service is (a) a non-profit-distributing and (b) a non-profit making company. [97203]

Ms Hewitt: The United Kingdom Accreditation Service was established in 1995 as a private company limited by guarantee. While UKAS may make a profit, any that is made is not distributed but is channelled back into the company.

Mr. Mark Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps her Department takes to ensure that the United Kingdom Accreditation Service polices use of the national accreditation marks which feature the Royal Crown. [97204]

Ms Hewitt: The national accreditation marks are the property of my Department and are covered by a Licensing Agreement which licences the United Kingdom Accreditation Service to use the marks and to sub-licence them to accredited organisations. The Licensing Agreement requires UKAS to register the marks with the Trade Marks Registry and gives UKAS the responsibility for encouraging that the use of the national accreditation marks is in accordance with the requirements set down in the conditions for the use of national accreditation marks by UKAS and UKAS accredited organisations. UKAS assessors as part of the accreditation process ensure that the accredited bodies comply with the conditions and in turn, ensure that where such bodies confer the right to use the marks to their own customers, that the customers also comply. The obligations under the Licensing Agreement are also the subject of a periodic third-party audit. My officials are in regular contact with UKAS over a number of issues including the monitoring of the use of the marks as part of the oversight responsibilities of my Department.

Mr. Mark Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what financial support her Department provides to the United Kingdom Accreditation Service; and for what purpose. [97205]

Ms Hewitt: The United Kingdom Accreditation Service (UKAS) is a private company and its core services are self-financed through the charging of fees to its direct customers. However, my Department has a three-year contract with UKAS to enable it to represent the United Kingdom in the international accreditation fora (European Co-operation for Accreditation, International Accreditation Forum and International Laboratory Accreditation Co-operation) so that it can play a major influencing role in the development of accreditation internationally. In addition, since November 2000, my Department has supported a UKAS Accreditation Awareness Campaign to help raise awareness to business and to other parts of government of the benefits of using UKAS accredited services. This campaign meets our own policy objective of encouraging businesses to use accredited conformity assessment wherever it is an option. DTI support covers 50 per cent. of the cost of certain elements of the campaign and is agreed on an annual basis.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Lake Windermere

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what implications the introduction of the Navigation By Law 1992 for Lake Windermere has for (a) other national parks and (b) access for sport and recreation. [98076]

Alun Michael: The byelaws deal with the particular circumstances applying on Lake Windermere. Government policy on recreation in national parks is set out in Circular 12/96, which enjoins national park authorities to promote the widest range of recreational opportunities while fully respecting the special qualities of the parks. The circular acknowledges that the intrusive nature of some recreational activities may unacceptably affect other people's enjoyment of these nationally important areas. No particular opportunities should be excluded from the parks as a matter of principle.

The byelaws are expected to cause fast power boating to cease on Lake Windermere, together with associated activities, of which waterskiing is the most popular. On the other hand more people may be attracted to engage in other water-based recreational pursuits when what has been seen as a fundamental problem of incompatibility between power boating and lower key activities has been solved.

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what consultations the Lake District National Park Authority has undertaken with (a) local recreational users, (b) businesses and (c) lake users from outside the national park on proposals to introduce a speed limit on Lake Windermere; [98079]

(2) what estimate she has made of (a) job losses and (b) loss of revenue at Lake Windermere arising from the application of the Navigation (Amendment) (No 2) Bylaw 1992 in 2005. [98078]

Alun Michael: Wide consultation and a careful examination of the implications was undertaken. The Lake District National Park Authority consulted over 50 organisations representing recreational and business interests both locally and nationally, before advertising proposals locally. The authority then considered all representations in response to the advertisement before making the byelaws that will introduce a speed limit.

The implications of the byelaws were examined in detail in 1996 at a public local inquiry held by an independent inspector. The issues examined included potential job losses and loss of revenue. The inspector concluded that the strong need for the speed limit had to be balanced against the possibility of some limited economic disruption. He found the overall balance clearly in favour of confirmation of the byelaws. In February 2000, after further views had been invited, the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for the then Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions agreed with the inspector's conclusion. He observed that the tourist profile in the region might alter but that it was not clear whether this would result in a net economic loss or a gain.

The byelaws came into operation on 29 March 2000 and the Secretary of State has no role in their implementation. The five year lapse until the speed limit comes into effect in 2005 should allow businesses and people who engage in power boating and waterskiing to make alternative arrangements.

Sustainable Development

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will require Departments to produce (a) their own sustainable development strategies within a year and (b) annual reports showing what progress has been made in meeting sustainable development targets. [97270]

Mr. Meacher: Of the central Government Departments that report via the Sustainable Development in Government Initiative, three have formal sustainable strategies (Defra, DTI, DWP) 11 have policy statements or other arrangements to manage their sustainable development impacts (C&E, CO, CPS, DFID, DH, FCO, HMT, IR, LCD, MOD, ONS) four have strategies under development (DCMS, DFES, ECGD, HO). DfT and ODPM are considering their approaches in light of the Machinery of Government changes in May 2002. Where they are not doing so, we are encouraging them all to produce their own sustainable development strategies.

Progress by all Departments against cross-Government sustainable development targets is reported via the sustainable development in Government annual report. The first report was published in November 2002. Part A of the Framework for Sustainable Development on the Government Estate requires all Departments to identify their significant sustainable development impacts and review their public reporting arrangements. Departments are due to publish their revised reporting arrangements by April 2003.

Vehicle Emissions

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent estimate she has made of the impact on global warming of automotive emissions of one tonne to the atmosphere of (a) particulates, (b) fine particulates, (c) sulphur dioxide, (d) carbon dioxide, (e) benzene, (f) butadiene, (g) carbon monoxide and (h) oxides of nitrogen. [96834]

Mr. Meacher: The substances listed above all have some impact on global warming, but the effect is indirect in some cases. It is not possible to calculate the specific impact on global warming of one tonne of each of the above substances, as this amount is relatively small in comparison to emission values used for climate calculations.

(a) and (b) Large amounts of particles, known as aerosol, can either have a cooling effect on the climate by reflecting incoming solar radiation back out to space, or a warming effect, by absorbing radiation. Aerosols have a relatively short residence time in the atmosphere so their influence tends to be short-lived and regional in nature.

(c) Sulphur dioxide is an indirect greenhouse gas, as it takes part in atmospheric reactions that form products that effect the climate. These reactions include some that lead to the formation of sulphate aerosol, which tends to have a cooling effect on climate, and some leading to the formation of tropospheric ozone, which is a potent greenhouse gas.

(d) Carbon dioxide is the only direct greenhouse gas listed. It is the benchmark for determining the global warming potential (GWP) of other direct and indirect greenhouse gases and has a GWP of 1. Concentrations of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere are increasing at a rate unprecedented in at least the last 20,000 years.

(e) and (f) Benzene and butadiene are both Volatile Organic Compounds (VOCs). They take part in atmospheric reactions related to the formation of tropospheric ozone, and act to increase levels of this greenhouse gas in the atmosphere.

(g) and (h) Nitrogen oxides (NOx) and carbon monoxide (CO) are indirect greenhouse gases. They take part in reactions that enhance the formation of tropospheric ozone and influence the lifetime of methane—the second most potent direct greenhouse gas—and other greenhouse gases.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimate she has made of the external costs of automotive emissions of one tonne to the atmosphere of (a) particulates, (b) fine particulates, (c) sulphur dioxide, (d) carbon dioxide, (e) benzene, (f) 1, 3 butadiene, (g) carbon monoxide and (h) oxides of nitrogen. [97250]

Mr. Meacher: Considerable research is in hand to improve the scientific and economic understanding of the health and environmental damages of air pollution. This work will provide important evidence on which policies will be further developed.

The Air Quality Strategy sets standards and objectives for particulates (PM10), sulphur dioxide, benzene, 1,3 butadiene, carbon monoxide and nitrogen dioxide to be reached between 2003 and 2010. The Government have not published formal estimates of the air quality external costs per tonne of automotive emissions. The external costs of a tonne of emission from a vehicle will vary according to the pollutant in question, the type of vehicle and fuel used, where the vehicle is emitting as well as many other factors.

A Government Economic Service working paper has suggested a range from £35/tC to £140/tC (with a best estimate of £70t/C) as illustrative of the global damage cost of carbon emissions. It also suggested that these figures should be raised in real terms by £1t/C per annum as the costs of climate change are likely to increase over time. These values are currently under review following recent advances in the academic literature, and general developments in the UK Government economic appraisal guidance (such as the new Treasury Green Book).

Agricultural Holdings

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent estimate she has made of the (a) minimum income, (b) minimum standard man day and (c) minimum whole time equivalents required to maintain a viable agricultural holding across all sectors. [96960]

Mr. Morley: No specific estimates of this type have been made as the level of income and labour required to maintain a viable agricultural holding is a matter for the individual farmer. An assessment was made of current and future business prospects for farming in analysis produced to accompany the launch of 'The Strategy for Sustainable Farming and Food'. This can be found at htto://www.defra.gov.uk/farm/sustain/newstrategy/econ/section1.pdf

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what measures have been introduced by the Government to improve the welfare of animals, with particular reference to enforcement measures. [97129]

Mr. Morley: The Government recognise the need to ensure that existing animal welfare legislation is effectively enforced to ensure compliance with the standards. Co-ordination of enforcement across the different enforcement agencies, such as the state veterinary service and local authorities is a priority task. We have for some time been investing resource to ensure development of closer working relationships between relevant bodies, through for example, regular liaison meetings.

The issue of animal welfare enforcement is one of the key issues under consideration in the new Animal Welfare Bill which will consolidate and modernise domestic and captive animal welfare legislation.

Bees

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans her Department has to increase funding for programmes aimed at preventing the spread of bee diseases. [97545]

Mr. Morley: The Department has no plans to increase its level of expenditure on the programme of measures that are undertaken to protect bee health in England.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the health of the beekeeping industry in the UK. [97543]

Mr. Morley: Of the 44,000 beekeepers in the UK about 400 operate on a commercial basis. Since 1992, the greatest single challenge to beekeeping has been the need to control the parasitic mite, varroa, which was first detected in England in that year. With Government help, beekeepers generally have learned to apply good husbandry techniques to control this threat. The market for, and interest in, honey produced in the UK has received a boost as a result of the ban on imports of honey from China in early 2002.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the environmental role played by honey bees in pollinating (a) orchards and (b) agricultural crops. [97544]

Mr. Morley: In July 2001, the Department received from ADAS Consulting Ltd. an independent economic policy evaluation of our bee health programme. The ADAS researchers noted in their findings the public good dimensions of bee health, in particular the benefits to society arising from pollination services, including commercial crops, domestic and wild plants. They estimated the value of pollination of commercial crops at around £120 million, with orchards accounting for £79 million and agricultural crops £21 million of this total respectively.

Biodiesel

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessments she has made on the impact of changes in duty for biodiesel on British agriculture. [97392]

Mr. Meacher: Biodiesel could offer an opportunity for diversification of agricultural activities and the development of new markets. Following the introduction of the reduction in duty by 20 pence per litre, compared to ultra-low sulphur diesel, in July 2002, we have yet to see biodiesel produced from British-grown oilseed rape. The duty cut is, however, already bringing forward production of biodiesel from used vegetable oil and over 60 forecourts in the UK are already retailing biodiesel. To develop biodiesel production from feedstocks from British agriculture, the return to farmers will need to be sufficient to compete with established food and animal feed markets which currently offer higher prices.

Capita

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 9 January, Official Report, column 172W, on Capita, if he will list (a) each contract's number, (b) the value of each contract and (c) the length of each contract. [96756]

Mr. Blunkett [holding answer 11 February 2003]: Detailed contract information in the format requested is not readily available and due to commercial confidentiality I am unable to give the value for each individual contract. However, I am able to provide a total value for contracts placed, together with the length of each contract. This information is provided in the table.

Contract	Contract length
Designing and Managing Building Projects	[1]5 years
Environment/Space Planning	2 Years
Criminal Records Bureau	10 years
HMP Blakenhurst Bid	1 year
Recruitment	1 year
IND Recruitment	1 year
Recruitment of General Managers	1 year
Conferences and Training	1 year
Provision of Human Resources Staff	[1]1 year
Finance related work	[1]1 year
Management Recruitment Scheme	6 months
Civil Service Short Answer Test	6 months
Multi-Disciplinary Term Commission Contract	3 years
Consultancy Support	1 year
Production of Purchase Manual	4 months
Efficiency Review	3 months
Quantum Project	1 year
Total value	£405,110,501

[1] Contract for which Capita was not the prime contractor.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to her answer of 5 February, on Capita (ref 89967) if she will list for each of the contracts awarded by her Department to Capita since 1997 (a) the start and finish date of contract, (b) the value of contract, (c) the evaluation mechanism for successful delivery of contract, (d) the penalty charges for failure to deliver, (e) if penalty charges have been incurred, (f) the service level agreements and (g) the contract numbers; and if she will make a statement. [97473]

Alun Michael: Defra came into being on 8 June 2001. The information can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Foot and Mouth Disease

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many carcases were disposed of at Cleeve Farm, Westbury-on-Severn, Gloucestershire in the last five years. [96231]

Mr. Morley: According to our records, 2,725 carcases were disposed of at Cleeve Farm, Westbury-on-Severn on a series of pyres. This figure comprises 337 carcases originating from Cleeve Farm and 2,388 carcases subsequently brought onto the site for disposal, from surrounding farms.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether the burning of carcases of cattle over five years old on the Hemscott Hill site precludes its use for animal grazing this year; and if she will publish the risk assessment carried out into the site by Dr. Kirkup, the Regional Director of Public Health. [95274]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 10 February 2003]: Veterinary advice confirms that the burning of carcases of cattle over five years old at the Hemscott Hill mass pyre site does not preclude its use for animal grazing this year.

The ADAS environmental risk assessment and supporting material, together with a statement by the Regional Director of Public Health, North East, Dr. Kirkup, has been given to Castle Morpeth borough council, the Food Standards Agency and the local liaison committee. I am arranging for a copy of this material to be sent to the right hon. Member.

Cetaceans

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what plans the Government have to reduce the number of fishing nets which cause harm to dolphins; [96919]

(2) what steps the Government are taking to protect dolphins and porpoises in the British Isles. [96920]

Mr. Morley: Action to address the issue of dolphin and porpoise by-catch needs to be taken internationally, as fishing vessels from many countries are involved. We have been pressing for such action and have commissioned a programme of research and development to reinforce our arguments. Urgent action is needed in the pair trawl fishery for bass off South West England, in which the substantial bulk of vessels are from other member states. Our research programme identified a significant by-catch problem in this fishery and is now trialling a possible gear solution. This looks promising, and I am determined to achieve a solution by this or other means. The second urgent need is to deploy EU observers to identify and assess other problem fisheries. In recent weeks we have advanced the case for action by intervening at the January meeting of the Council of Agriculture and Fisheries Ministers, and I have since followed this up by writing to Commissioner Fischler. In addition, with the devolved Administrations, I will shortly be issuing a consultation document outlining a UK by-catch response strategy.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the use of fishing net-based detectors to prevent the accidental drowning of dolphins and porpoises. [96509]

Mr. Morley: The Sea Mammal Research Unit have undertaken trials on the use of detectors as part of their work on behalf of this Department into dolphin and porpoise by catch. To date, this research has demonstrated that detectors may have a role in monitoring the behaviour of dolphin and porpoises around fishing gear but that acoustic deterrent devices (known as pingers) and other gear adjustments have greater potential to prevent bycatch.

Computer Crime

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft her Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside her Department. [97558]

Alun Michael: The Department was formed on 9 June 2001 so figures reflect the period 9 June 2001 to 31 December 2002. Figures are not available prior to this date.

(a) During this period there were no cases of computer hacking detected.

(b) During this period there were no cases of computer fraud detected.

(c) The number of cases of computer theft detected was 27. It is not possible to provide accurate figures for whether these thefts were perpetrated by insiders or by persons outside the Department because some internal and police investigations did not provide conclusive evidence.

Departmental Budgets

Mr. Roger Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what the allocated budgets are for each of the internal directorates for her Department in (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06; [97523]

(2) what the allocated budgets are for each of her Department's executive agencies for (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06; [97526]

(3) what the combined allocated budgets are for her Department's non-departmental public bodies in (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06. [97528]

Alun Michael: Details of allocated budgets up to 2005–06 will be published in the spring 2003 departmental report. The information will include how budgets are allocated to deliver the Department's functions and objectives.

Entertainment

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her estimate is of the total spending of her Department on entertainment in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and if she will make a statement. [92389]

Alun Michael: The information for Defra is as follows:

2001–02: £239,000 (outturn)

2002–03: £384,000 (estimate)

It should be noted that Defra only came into being in 2001.

All expenditure on official entertainment is made in accordance with published departmental guidance on financial procedures and propriety, based on the principles set out in "Government Accounting".

Equine Welfare (Ragwort Control) Bill

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the Government's policy is on the Equine Welfare (Ragwort Control) Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). [97651]

Alun Michael: The Government will consider the Equine Welfare (Ragwort Control) Bill in accordance with the procedures established for dealing with Private Member's Bills. These procedures provide for a debate at the appropriate time and the Government's position will be made clear at that stage.

Defra is already taking steps to control the spread of Ragwort in accordance with the procedures set out in my response given to the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) on 7 November 2002, Official Report, columns 685–86W.

European Environment Agency

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what direct relations she has with the European Environment Agency; and in what circumstances. [97896]

Mr. Meacher: My officials are in regular contact with the agency through membership of the management board and co-operating with the agency as active participants in the European Environment Information and Observation Network (EIONET) as established under the founding Council Regulation (EEC) No. 1210/90 as amended by Council Regulation (EC) No. 933/1999.

My officials are also working closely with the EEA in their production of a state of the environment report for the forthcoming Kiev Conference. I personally met the last executive director on a number of occasions and have visited the agency in Copenhagen.

Flooding

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with the Environment Agency on new sources of income for flood defence from (a) councils and (b) households in flood-zone areas. [98067]

Mr. Morley: Discussions have been held with the Environment Agency on these and other issues raised in the current Flood and Coastal Defence Funding Review. I will make an announcement on the conclusions of the review as soon as possible.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much has been spent on flood defence work in Sussex in each of the last six years; and if she will list the location of the major projects. [97900]

Mr. Morley: Defra provides grant aid to the flood and coastal defence operating authorities—the Environment Agency (EA), local authorities and (in areas with special drainage needs) internal drainage boards. The EA is responsible for managing flood risk from designated main rivers and the sea and carries out the majority of publicly funded flood risk works. The table details EA expenditure on flood defence work in Sussex over the last six years:

£000

Financial year	Capital expenditure	Non-capital expenditure	Total
1996–97	4,289	1,175	5,464
1997–98	4,315	1,569	5,884
1998–99	3,856	1,185	5,041
1999–2000	3,456	2,021	5,477
2000–01	2,705	1,663	4,368
2001–02	4,134	2,242	6,376
2002–03[1]	9,532	2,094	11,626

[1] To December 2002

The major EA projects are as follows:

River Lavant Flood Alleviation Scheme (Chichester)

Bulverhythe Enhancement of Protection

Shoreham/Lancing Phase 2—Kingswalk

Felpham Sea Defences

Pevensey Bay Sea Defences

West Common Stream (Haywards Heath)

Seaford Beach Management

Shoreham/Lancing Phase 3

Medmerry continued maintenance

Storrington

Sovereign Harbour (Eastbourne)

Information on works promoted by the other operating authorities in the area is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs which local authorities have no plans to hold flood emergency exercises in accordance with her Department's high level targets. [89612]

Margaret Beckett: One of our high level targets requires the Environment Agency to arrange a programme of emergency exercises in conjunction with local authorities, emergency services and other partners. A national exercise, and an exercise in each agency region and local area, should be conducted at not more than three-yearly intervals. We are not aware of any local authorities that are not prepared to co-operate.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to her answer of 20 January, Official Report, column 10W, if she will provide a breakdown of expenditure in the years (a) 2000–01, (b) 2001–02 and (c) 2002–03 of the Environment Agency in England for managing flood risk from main rivers and the sea in respect of each project worth £1 million or more. [95082]

Margaret Beckett [holding answer 3 February 2003]: Defra provides grant aid as a percentage of eligible costs to the Environment Agency to assist with its capital works and related studies to manage flood risk. The agency does not maintain central records of expenditure in the form requested and therefore the information could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However a table showing agency capital projects costing in excess of £1 million on which grant has been claimed, has been placed in the Library of the House. This does not include expenditure ineligible for grant such as project management costs which can form between 15 per cent. and 25 per cent. of the total project cost. Nor does the list include projects pursued by the agency without Defra grant aid.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many letters (a) her Department and (b) the Environment Agency has received from (i) hon. Members and (ii) members of the public regarding the flooding in the Christmas 2002 and new year period 2003. [96124]

Mr. Morley: The Department has received 41 letters from hon. Members and 33 letters from members of the public. The Environment Agency has received 72 letters from hon. Members and 506 letters from members of the public.

Fly-tipping

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her Department's policy on fly-tipping on forest land is (a) generally and (b) where it is owned by the City of London Corporation; what her policy is in cases where it is her opinion that (i) a local authority and (ii) the Environment Agency should make greater efforts to remove fly-tipped rubbish from forest land; and if she will make a statement. [98163]

Mr. Meacher: Fly tipping is the same offence no matter where it occurs and the Government do not have different policies on clearing fly tipped waste from different types of land. Powers are provided to both local authorities and the Environment Agency under Section 59 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to allow them to clear fly tipped waste and to recover the costs of doing so from either the perpetrators of the crime or the occupants of the land unless they can demonstrate that they did not knowingly allow or permit the fly tipping to take place.

The circumstances in which (i) the local authority and (ii) the Environment Agency should clear the waste are set out in the fly tipping protocol which has been agreed between the Local Government Association and the agency. Under the protocol, local authorities deal with fly tipping of non-special waste, and the agency deals with fly tipping of special/ hazardous waste.

The Government are keen to do more to empower both local authorities and the agency to deal with fly tipping on all forms of land, since we recognise that it is a growing anti-social problem. We are currently considering bringing forward changes to legislation in consultation with other Government Departments, the local government associations and the agency.

Heathrow (Emissions)

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the annual emission was of (a) NOx, (b) SOx, (c) particulates and (d) CO_2 at London Heathrow Airport in the last year for which figures are available. [98009]

Alun Michael: The following table shows estimated emissions of NOx, SOx, particulates (PM_{10}), and CO_2 for London Heathrow Airport in 2000 (the latest year for which figures are available).

Estimated emissions for Heathrow Airport in 2000

	Tonnes
NOX (nitrogen dioxide)	8,949
SOX (sulphur dioxide)	414
CO_2 (carbon dioxide)	1,397,770
Particles (as PM_{10})	102

Source:

National Environment Technology Centre. These cover emissions from aircraft and airside vehicles within the perimeter of the airport. Emissions are calculated from aircraft movement data for the airport in 2000 and aircraft emission factors used in the 1998 Heathrow Inventory study. Aircraft emissions during complete take off and landing cycle up to1,000 m are allocated to the airport. Consequently a proportion of the emissions are emitted at some height and horizontal distance from the boundaries of the airport.

Hunting Bill

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what discussions she has had about re-housing hunt workers of hunts which fail to achieve registration under the Hunting Bill; [96860]

(2) what estimate she has made of the housing consequences of the Hunting Bill. [96859]

Alun Michael: It is not possible to predict the precise impact of the Hunting Bill on housing.

Where the activity is banned absolutely, as in the case of deer hunting and hare coursing, it would be prudent of employers and employees affected to plan for that eventuality and to seek out the available assistance.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) if she will make a statement on the human rights implications of the prohibition of hunting where there are subsisting contracts for providing hunting facilities; [96870]

(2) whether she has identified obstacles to certifying that the Hunting Bill does not conflict with human rights; and if she will make a statement; [96918]

(3) what representations she has received about the human rights implications of the Hunting Bill. [96869]

Alun Michael: The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has signed a statement, under section 19(1)(a) of the Human Rights Act 1998, that in her view the provisions of the Hunting Bill are compatible with the Convention rights on the basis that she was satisfied no obstacles prevented her from so doing.

It is the Government's view that the requirements of the Hunting Bill would, for the purposes of Article 1 of Protocol 1 to the European Convention on Human Rights, amount to an interference with the use and enjoyment of property rather than a deprivation of property, and that accordingly no compensation should be payable for any economic losses that may be suffered as a consequence of the Bill by the persons concerned.

There are numerous occasions where new legislation interferes with existing contractual rights without the individuals being compensated. In this respect the Government consider that persons entering contracts in connection with hunting with dogs have no legitimate expectation that any or all types of this activity would continue to be lawful. The contracting parties will have been aware for a considerable period of time of the intention of the Government to legislate on hunting with dogs, and the present Bill is the result of an extensive and well-publicised process of consultation over a long period.

The detailed reasons for this view are set out in a memorandum submitted by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on 31 January 2003 in response to a letter from the Chair of the Joint Committee on Human Rights to the Minister for Rural Affairs of 21 January 2003. The Committee indicated that, subject to this point, their provisional opinion was that the present Hunting Bill is compatible with the relevant human rights obligations.

Representations on the Hunting Bill which relate to human rights issues have been couched in general terms and have included the suggestion that the continuation of traditional forms of hunting is or should be protected by the European Convention on Human Rights. There have also been references to the rights protected by the United Kingdom's international commitments under the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development 1992, in particular Principle 22 which refers to the role indigenous people and their communities play in relation to environmental management and development. Other representations have argued that there is no right to be cruel.

Landfill

Mr. Robert Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when and how the Government informed the European Commission of its intention to postpone the attainment of the targets set out in Article 5.2 of the Council Directive 1999/31/EC on the landfill of waste. [89274]

Mr. Meacher: Under the terms of the Landfill Directive, those member states who are to make use of the derogation to postpone the attainment of the reductions in the landfill of biodegradable municipal waste targets by a period not exceeding four years shall inform the Commission in advance. The final decision on whether we will make use of the derogation will be taken the year before each target year (2005 for target year 2006, 2008 for 2009 and 2015 for 2016). If the decision is to make use of the derogation for that target year, then the Commission will be informed accordingly.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether her Department is preparing to implement the Landfill Directive by 2016. [96469]

Mr. Meacher: Yes, preparations are in hand to support our aim of meeting the Landfill Directive's final biodegradable municipal waste reduction target by 2016.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether the operator for the Wortley tip at the Cabbage Hill site in the Leeds, West constituency has submitted a conditioning plan to the Environmental Agency; and whether it has applied to operate as a hazardous waste site. [96964]

Mr. Meacher: No; the operator has not submitted a conditioning plan for this site and has therefore not applied to operate as a hazardous waste site.

A list of all those landfill operators who have submitted a conditioning plan to the Environment Agency is available on the agency website at www.environment-aqency.gov.uk .

Radioactive Material

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her policy is on the free release of radioactive material; what thresholds apply to such releases; and what quantities have been released in each year since 1997. [97714]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 13 February 2003]: Responsibility for the policy with respect to radioactivity in the environment rests with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

Under section 13 of the Radioactive Substances Act 1993 (RSA 93) the disposal of radioactive material requires authorization. The regulation of radioactive waste, under RSA 93, in England and Wales, is the responsibility of the Environment Agency and a system of "discharge authorizations" is used to control the nature and quantities of radioactive waste that may be discharged into the environment from any site. However, under the Radioactive Substances (Substances of Low Activity) Exemption Order 1986 solid radioactive waste that is substantially insoluble in water and that has activity of less than 0.4 Becquerel/gram is exempt from the controls under RSA 93, so-called "free release". As such waste is exempt from regulatory control, no centrally held records are kept of the quantities that have been released.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment has been conducted (a) by and (b) for her Department on the effectiveness of RIMNET 3; and if she will place copies of such research in the Library. [93273]

Mr. Meacher: The Radioactive Incident Monitoring Network (RIMNET) Phase 3 system is currently under development, as explained in my previous answer on 20 January 2003, Official Report, column 105W.

The specification for RIMNET 3 was based upon the proven functionality of the RIMNET Phase 2 system, which continues to meet maintenance contract targets in excess of 99 per cent. reliability. This is through in depth design features which provide the necessary levels of resilience, including backup facilities at a remote location. Remote in this sense, means far removed from the main facility, yet accessible to authorised users via modern electronic communications. Assessment of the effectiveness of the RIMNET 3 system will be undertaken during its development and the acceptance trials. RIMNET 3 is currently scheduled to come into full operation and take over from RIMNET 2 in early 2004.

Summaries of radiation monitoring data held on the RIMNET system are regularly sent to the House Library and are also published in departmental environmental statistical summaries.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the present discharge unit is for technetium-99; what the analysis of levels of discharge over the last 12 months shows; and what progress has been made in considering the Department's response to recommendations by the Environment Agency in respect of discharge limits. [96518]

Margaret Beckett: The present discharge limit for technetium-99 is 90 TBq/year. In the 12 month period to the end of November 2002, the most up-to-date information currently available, 84.3 TBq of technetium-99 were discharged.

On 11 December 2002 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and I (the two Ministers with joint responsibility under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993) announced that we saw no reason to direct the Environment Agency to take a different course to the one that the agency had identified in its proposed decision on technetium-99, published in September 2001. At the same time, I sought views on a proposal where I might direct the agency to consider the possibility of a moratorium on technetium-99 discharges pending introduction of TPP-based abatement technology. We are considering the representations received and hope to make a decision on the proposed direction shortly.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she expects the Government to publish national waste acceptance criteria. [96467]

Mr. Meacher: The Government will consult on the European Commission's obligatory waste acceptance criteria later this year as part of a wider consultation on amendments to the Landfill Regulations (England and Wales). (The waste acceptance criteria were introduced into the Landfill Directive by Decision C 20 E/171 of 28 January 2003 and must be transposed into UK legislation by 16 July 2004.) The amendments to the Landfill Regulations (England and Wales) introducing the waste acceptance criteria will be made following that consultation and before 16 July 2004.

Recycling

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the impact of recent changes to the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme on future waste awareness minimisation activities in England and Wales; and how this will impact on the UK's ability to meet the Landfill Directive targets. [97050]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 12 February 2003]: Changes to the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme (LTCS), which will introduce a new public expenditure scheme to replace some elements of the current scheme, will allow the Government to target funding better as a means of achieving specific sustainable waste management objectives. Initially, the aim will be to deliver the short to medium term measures set out in the Strategy Unit's report "Waste Not Want Not", to increase waste minimisation; boost recycling; develop new technologies; and improve information and awareness, data and the research base. Increasing performance in these areas, through changes to the LTCS, should improve the UK's capacity to meet its Landfill Directive targets.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the financial value of annual exports of materials for recycling, with particular reference to (a) green glass, (b) plastic, (c) steel and (d) short fibre from paper mills, was in each of the last three years; and what volume was exported in each case, broken down by destination of export. [96151]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 6 February 2003]: The Department does not record information on the financial value of exported recyclable materials.

H M Customs and Excise are responsible for export statistics. However the comcodes (this is the level at which traders declarations are made) which cover the materials requested, are not specific enough to uniquely identify them.

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the recycling records of local authorities in Somerset. [96497]

Mr. Meacher: We have set all local authorities statutory performance standards (or targets) for recycling for 2003–04 and 2005–06. The latest performance information for authorities in Somerset is given as follows:

Percentage

Authority	Recycling and composting rate 1998–99	Recycling and composting rate 1999–2000	Recycling and composting rate 2001–02	Statutory Performance Standard 2003–04	Statutory Performance Standard 2005–06

South Somerset District Council	11	10	10	22	33
Taunton Deane Borough Council	12	10	13	24	36
West Somerset District Council	8	9	11	16	24

Government have provided extra funding to help authorities meet these standards through successive increases in the EPCS spending block, which includes waste services, and through the National Waste Minimisation and Recycling Challenge Fund under which the following Somerset authorities made successful bids.

Authority	Category
Round 1
Somerset Waste Partnership	Partnership working between authorities
Bath and North East Somerset Council	Two bids under high performance, innovation and best practice
North Somerset Council	Help turn around low performance
Round 2
North Somerset Council	Help turn around low performance
Sedgemoor District Council	Developing community initiatives
South Somerset District Council	Partnership working between authorities
Bath and North East Somerset Council	High performance, innovation and best practice

It is too soon to tell whether individual authorities in Somerset or elsewhere, will meet the standards. In September 2002 I wrote to the leaders of 141 councils asking them to let me know how they intend to meet their 2003–04 Statutory Performance Standard for recycling and composting of household waste of which the following four were in Somerset:

Mendip District Council

Sedgemoor District Council

South Somerset District Council

Taunton Deane Borough Council.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the recycling records of local authorities in (a) West Sussex and (b) London. [96008]

Mr. Meacher: We have set all local authorities statutory performance standards (or targets) for recycling for 2003–04 and 2005–06. The latest performance information for authorities in London and West Sussex is given as follows:

Government have provided extra funding to help authorities meet these standards through successive increases in the EPCS spending block, which includes waste services, and through the National Waste Minimisation and Recycling Challenge Fund under which West Sussex made a successful bid for a project to raise the awareness of waste issues. A separate Capital Fund of £21.3 million was established for authorities across London.

West Sussex has also been successful in receiving approval for PFI funding for a recycling led waste project that aims to enable them to reach their target for 2005–06 of 36 per cent. and achieve long term recycling and composting levels comparable with the highest in Europe.

It is too soon to tell whether individual authorities in London and West Sussex or elsewhere, will meet the standards. In September 2002 I wrote to the leaders of 141 councils asking them to let me know how they intend to meet their 2003–04 Statutory Performance Standard for recycling and composting of household waste of which the following were in London and West Sussex:

Telephone Helplines

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many telephone helplines are sponsored by her Department; and which of these helplines are charged at (a) national rate, (b) premium rate and (c) local rate. [95710]

Alun Michael: Defra operates 13 helpline telephone numbers, of which two are free of charge, five are charged at local rate and the remainder are charged at national rate. Of these one is a central Defra helpline, seven are operated by Rural Payments Agency, one each by the British Cattle Movement Service, Pets Helpline, Animal Movements, Agricultural Wages Board and Environmental Impact Assessment.

A number of Defra telephone phone lines are published via the Department's website and in printed publications as contact points for enquiries on specific subjects. These services are not established or operated under the same criteria as the helplines referred to above.

Similar details for other agencies and non-departmental bodies sponsored by the Department could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Timber

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to her answer of 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 564W, on timber, if she will list (a) the local authorities who were putting or considering putting policies on timber procurement in place, (b) the respondents that did not specifically stipulate that timber should be sourced from both legal and sustainably managed sources and (c) the local authorities using other strategies. [96517]

Mr. Meacher: The following local authorities in England indicated in October 2002 that they were putting or considering putting policies on timber procurement in place: Basingstoke and Deane, Blackpool, Bolton, Broadland, Bury, Calderdale, Chelmsford, Cotswold, Derbyshire, Eastleigh, Epping Forest, Fareham, Harlow,Harrow, Hart, Kensington and Chelsea, Lewes, Liverpool, Malvern Hills, Newcastle under Lyme, North Shropshire, North Somerset, North Yorkshire, Purbeck, Reading, Redcar and Cleveland, Rochdale, Shepway, St. Albans, St. Edmundsbury, Tonbridge and Malling, West Lindsey, Wolverhampton.

It was not clear from the following authorities' replies whether their policies did in fact specifically stipulate that timber should be from both legal sources and sustainable sources: Braintree, Copeland, East Cambridgeshire, East Sussex, Gateshead, Gloucester City, Gosport, Hampshire, Kent, Lincolnshire, Manchester, New Forest, North Devon, Richmondshire, South Oxfordshire, Staffordshire CC, Stockport, Swindon, Tandridge, Tendring, Tunbridge Wells, Westminster and Wyre Forest.

The six authorities that reported using other strategies were: Buckinghamshire, Huntingdonshire, Melton, Norfolk, Northumberland and South Ribble.

Waste Disposal

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what percentage of municipal waste recovered in (a) 2005, (b) 2010 and (c) 2015 she expects to be (i) recycled, (ii) composted and (iii) incinerated. [96475]

Mr. Meacher: The Government have set the following targets for recycling and composting of municipal waste as set out in Waste Strategy 2000:

To recycle or compost at least 25 per cent. of household waste by 2005;

To recycle or compost at least 30 per cent. of household waste by 2010;

To recycle or compost at least 33 per cent. of household waste by 2015.

We have not set targets for waste incineration. We have, however, set the following waste recovery targets:

To recover value from 40 per cent. of household waste by 2005;

To recover value from 45 per cent. of household waste by 2010;

To recover value from 67 per cent. of household waste by 2015.

Wildlife Trade

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans the Government have to ban the trade in birds and animals taken from the wild except for scientific and conservation reasons. [97124]

Mr. Morley: We have no current plans to ban the trade in all birds and animals taken from the wild. International trade in birds and animals is subject to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES), which is implemented within the EU under Council Regulation (EC) No 338/97 and Commission Regulation (EC) No 1808/1. All commercial trade in those species listed as endangered is prohibited, while the trade in the other less vulnerable species is strictly regulated to ensure that it will not be detrimental to their wild populations.

Last month we began a public consultation exercise outlining proposals to strengthen the existing domestic controls over wildlife trade. This included increasing the penalties for certain offences to up to five years imprisonment, and strengthening the relevant powers of police officers and wildlife inspectors. Subject to the outcome of the consultation, we intend to introduce revised provisions as soon as possible thereafter.

Within Great Britain the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 prohibits the possession or control of any live or dead wild bird or animal listed on Schedule 5 of the Act, or any part of or anything derived from such a bird or animal. A licence can be issued derogating from this protection. The penalty for taking an animal or bird illegally is a maximum of £5,000 and/or six months custodial sentence.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Anti-social Behaviour

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) Anti-Social Behaviour Orders, (b) Parenting Orders and (c) Curfew Orders have been issued in the City of Portsmouth, South in the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [97278]

Mr. Denham: The table shows the number of notifications received by the Home Office of Anti-Social Behaviour Orders (ASBOs) issued within the Hampshire and Isle of Wight Magistrates' Courts Committee (MCCs) area (in which the City of Portsmouth is situated) and by local government authority up to 30 September 2002 (latest available).

We are aware that the numbers of ASBOs made nationally have been consistently under-reported in returns made by magistrates' courts, and are considering how reporting can be improved.

Youth Justice Board figures indicate that between January 2001 and September 2002, a total of 262 Parenting Orders were imposed in the Youth Offending Team (YOT) area of Wessex, which includes the City of Portsmouth.

Figures from the electronic monitoring contractors indicate that 104 Curfew Orders with electronic monitoring were imposed within Portsmouth, South during the period 2000–02. Of this total of 104 Curfew Orders, 12 were imposed on juveniles aged 10 to 15 years.

No applications have yet been received to establish a local child curfew scheme under section 14 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Some local authorities and police forces have considered the possibility, but concluded that other measures should be taken to tackle relevant local problems.

Table A: the number of ASBOs as notified to the Home Office, by Magistrates' Courts Committee and local authority area within England and Wales, April 1999 to September 2002

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been made in respect of individuals in (a) Hertsmere, (b) Hertfordshire and (c) the United Kingdom in each year since the orders came into being. [97002]

Mr. Denham: Anti-Social Behaviour Orders (ASBOs) were introduced from 1 April 1999. From this date up to 30 September 2002 (latest available) the total number of ASBOs issued within England and Wales, as reported to the Home Office, is 706. The table shows the number of notifications of ASBOs issued within the Hertfordshire Magistrates' Courts Committee (MCC) area, which includes Hertsmere, by local government authority up to 30 September 2002.

We are aware that the numbers of ASBOs made nationally have been consistently under reported in returns made by magistrates' courts and are considering how reporting can be improved.

Information for matters related to Scotland and Northern Ireland are for the Scottish Executive and the Northern Ireland Assembly respectively.

Burglaries (West Yorkshire)

Jon Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many burglaries were (a) reported and (b) solved in West Yorkshire in (i) 1997 and (ii) 2002. [96621]

Mr. Denham: Numbers of burglary offences recorded and associated detection rates in West Yorkshire are given in the table.

Year	Offences recorded	Detection rate—percentage
1997[1]	67,686	28
2001–02[2]	68,818	12

[1] Recorded on a calendar year basis

[2] Recorded on a financial year basis

There was a change in counting rules for recorded crime on 1 April 1998, which would have the tendency to increase the number of offences counted. Numbers of offences before and after this date are therefore not directly comparable.

There was also a change in counting rules for detections on 1 April 1999. The new instructions provide more precise and rigorous criteria for recording a detection, with the underlying emphasis on the successful result of a police investigation. Numbers of detections before and after this date are therefore not directly comparable.

Cannabis

Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to receive advice on the medicinal benefits and side-effects of cannabis; and when he will make a decision as to whether, and when, how and to whom, it will be legally available for therapeutic purposes. [97174]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: GW Pharmaceuticals have completed their advanced clinical trials into the development of a medical preparation of a cannabis-based drug and are preparing to submit a dossier of their findings to the Medicines Control Agency (MCA), an agency of the Department of Health, for evaluation in the near future.

This assessment by the MCA is one which all prospective new medicines have to go through and is designed to protect public health.

If approval of the safety, quality and effectiveness of the product is forthcoming, the Government will seek Parliament's agreement to make the necessary changes to the Misuse of Drugs Regulations 2001 to enable the prescription of cannabis-based medicine by doctors to their patients at the earliest opportunity. We recognize how eagerly awaited these changes are and intend to press ahead with them as quickly as possible.

Child Pornography

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he will take to require credit card companies to remove credit cards from those breaking their contract with such companies by viewing child pornography on the net. [97762]

Hilary Benn: Normally it will not be apparent from the information received by a card issuer that a transaction relates to illegal business. However, within the confines of banking law, where a card issuer is alerted to the fact that an offence has been committed by a cardholder, they will take appropriate action under the terms and conditions applying to the use of its card.

The Government do not at this time consider that removing all credit card, debit card, and other non card based forms of payment facilities from an individual convicted of such an offence is the most cost effective or practical way of combating illegal or child abuse images on line.

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he will take to require internet service providers to monitor their services to prevent viewing of child pornography on the net. [97763]

Hilary Benn: Under European e-commerce legislation, Internet Service Providers (ISPs) may not be held liable for unlawful material that they unknowingly transmit, store or host on behalf of their customers. There is also a requirement not to place general monitoring obligations on intermediary service providers, and as such there will be no legislative requirement for United Kingdom ISP's to undertake monitoring of their services for child pornography.

However, if an ISP is warned of illegal material on a website that they host but fails to take the appropriate action by removing or disabling access to the material in question, they will be liable for prosecution.

With regards to sites which host child pornography, the Government supports the work of the Internet Watch Foundation (IWF), an industry funded body which allows anyone to report the presence of images of child abuse anywhere in the world. The Foundation determines whether the reported website carries potentially illegal material and takes steps to have access denied to the site. The Foundation passes details of illegal material to the relevant law enforcement agencies to initiate action against the originators. If the originators are abroad, the Foundation passes the report to sister hotlines abroad and to the National Criminal Intelligence Services (NCIS) who liaise with enforcement agencies of the countries concerned.

The Government continues to seek to revise and improve the mechanisms and processes for the reporting and removing of illegal material hosted on the web, for example through the work of the Home Secretary's Task Force on Child Protection on the Internet.

The taskforce, established in March 2001, involves a partnership of child welfare organisations, the internet industry, government, the police and others working towards finding solutions to make the internet a safer place for children, and in January 2003 launched good practice models and guidance for the internet industry on a range of services including web based services dealing with adult content.

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he is taking to require internet service providers to end the use of privacy buttons on e-groups to enable better identification and prosecution of those using child pornography material on the Net. [97764]

Hilary Benn: E-Groups enable a great many people to communicate with others with similar interests conveniently and if necessary privately. It is true that this facility, like any other, can be misused, but to require that all e-groups be open would merely displace, not end, the exchange of indecent images of children, and lessen the scope for perfectly legitimate use.

The Government continues to seek to revise and improve the mechanisms and processes for the reporting and removing of illegal material hosted on the web, in particular through the work of the Home Secretary's Task Force on Child Protection on the Internet, which includes the police, the industry, child protection agencies, MPs and others.

Closed Circuit Television

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 9 January 2003, Official Report, column 310W, on Crime Reduction Partnerships, if he will list the location of the public area CCTV schemes funded through the Crime Reduction Programme Closed Circuit Television, and the grant made to each scheme. [97262]

Mr. Denham: Under the Crime Reduction Programme CCTV Initiative around £170 million will be spent between 1998 and 2003 funding 684 CCTV schemes. More than 550 of these schemes are already fully operational, with further schemes coming on line weekly.

Lists of the schemes funded, including location and grants made to each scheme can be found on the Crime Reduction website at: www.crimereduction.gov.uk/cctvminisite1.htm.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 9 January 2003, Official Report, column 310W, on crime reduction partnerships, how much money has been awarded to (a) each region and (b) each local authority area under the Crime Reduction Programme Closed Circuit Television Initiative. [97572]

Mr. Denham: Under the Crime Reduction Programme CCTV Initiative, around £170 million will be spent between 1998 and 2003 funding 684 CCTV schemes. More than 550 of these schemes are already fully operational, with further schemes coming on line weekly. The regional breakdown of funding is as follows:

East Midlands	17,169,228
London	35,410,898
North East	12,900,238
South East	15,328,266
South West	11,784,260

Wales	7,925,968
West Midlands	14,536,391
Yorkshire and Humberside	20,357,137
East	10,909,827
North West	22,804,606

Lists of the schemes funded, including location and grants made to each scheme and local authority, can be found on the Crime Reduction website at: www.crimereduction.gov.uk/cctvminisite1.htm

Community Support Officers

Mr. Bailey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of community support officers on the level of crime in the pilot areas. [97005]

Mr. Denham: Twenty seven police forces in England and Wales made successful bids last year for a share of the £19 million fund for the introduction of Community Support Officers (CSOs). Training programmes in each force will see more than 1,000 CSOs patrolling the streets by the end of March this year.

The money given to each police force includes an element for evaluation and forces are due to give us initial findings by the end of September. At this stage, it is premature for any meaningful analysis of their effect although there are already early indications of decreased crime in the areas where CSOs have been deployed.

Coniston Hotel

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what permission was granted by NASS to Accommodata to move into the Coniston Hotel on 5 February to begin preparations to receive asylum seekers; [97003]

(2) whether Accommodata has been given permission by NASS to refurbish the Coniston Hotel. [97004]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 10 February 2003]: The contract entered into between The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) and Accommodata is for 111 bedspaces at the hotel. Other accommodation at the hotel, including bedrooms which are not part of the NASS contract, will be available for use by the general public. The owner of the hotel does not need permission from NASS to refurbish his premises. Neither does Accommodata require permission from NASS to undertake work at the hotel.

Conviction Rates

Mark Tami: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the conviction rates were for each police force in (a) 1999, (b) 2000 and (c) 2001. [97108]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is contained in the table and relates to the number of defendants found guilty of all offences at all courts expressed as a proportion of defendants proceeded against at magistrates courts for all offences in each of the years, by police force area.

Correspondence

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Walthamstow will receive a reply to his letters to the Department of 14 February 2002, 21 May 2002, 29 August 2002 and 22 October 2002, regarding his constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Thankarajah (Home Office ref T1009737). [96562]

Beverley Hughes: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 14 February 2003.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letters dated 20 November 2002 and 4 January from the honourable Member for Altrincham and Sale West regarding the case of Mr. Christopher Rowley. [96613]

Hilary Benn: I replied to the hon. Member on 6 February 2003.

County Durham Police

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the budget of the County Durham Police was spent on pension funds in (a) 2000, (b) 2001 and (c) 2002 and is projected to be spent in 2003. [97159]

Mr. Denham: The Chief Constable informs me that the proportion of budget spent on police pensions and contributions towards civilian pensions is as follows:

(a) 14 per cent. in financial year 1999–2000; (b) 14 per cent. in 2000–01; (c) 15 per cent. in 2001–02; and 16 per cent. is estimated to be spent in 2002–03.

Credit Card Fraud

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent reports he has received about the trend in respect of credit card fraud; what he estimates its most recent annual level in the UK was; which new forms of such fraud are giving the authorities most cause for concern; what proposals and advice he is planning to help tackle the problem; and if he will make a statement. [97172]

Mr. Denham: The Government recognises that plastic card fraud in the UK has increased considerably over recent years. In the Home Office publication, "Crime in England and Wales, 2001–02: Supplementary Volume" published on 9 January 2003, it was shown that the police recorded 153,281 cheque and credit card offences in 2001–02. The Association for Payment Clearing Services (APACS) estimated the losses from cheque, debit and credit or charge card fraud in the 12 months to August 2002 at £429.4 million.

Skimming (electronically copying a card's magnetic stripe and using it to make an illegal copy of a genuine card) is a relatively new form of card fraud, which is giving the financial services sector and police cause for concern. Counterfeit card losses comprise over a third of total plastic card fraud losses.

The Government has committed £1.4 million over two years, in partnership with APACS, to piloting the Dedicated Cheque and Plastic Crime Unit (DCPCU). The Unit, which started work in April 2002, has enjoyed significant early success, recovering more than 3,000 cards and 468 cheques. This has led to 44 arrests and four convictions with potential savings of £5.3 million. A detailed evaluation of the DCPCU's performance will be used to inform decisions on the future of the Unit and to guide national policy for tackling organised and plastic card fraud.

The Home Office is also actively supporting the finance and retail industry in its implementation of the Chip and PIN programme. New technology will require UK credit and debit card transactions to be authorised by the customer keying in a four-digit PIN (personal identification number) rather than by signing a receipt. The banking industry expects that by 2005 the new technology will have eliminated over half of the predicted level of plastic card fraud. A public trial of the programme will take place in Northampton shortly and national roll-out will begin after the trial is complete.

The Government, working closely with stakeholders, launched its Safe Internet Shopping Campaign in 2001 to advise consumers on safe payment and give them directions to the Government's Consumer Gateway www.consumer.gov.uk which provides links to sources of detailed information.

The Government welcomes the involvement of the banking industry in actively seeking ways to prevent and detect crime such as plastic card fraud.

Crime (Humberside)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many and what proportion of prisoners in (a) Haltemprice and Howden, (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire and (c) England and Wales tested positive for drugs in each of the past five years. [97720]

Hilary Benn: The following tables detail the number and proportion of prisoners in the constituency of Haltemprice and Howden, the County of the East Riding of Yorkshire and in England and Wales who tested positive for drugs under the Prison Service random mandatory drug testing programme in each of the past five years.

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many crimes were committed by juvenile offenders in (a) Haltemprice and Howden, (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire and (c) the Humberside Police Authority area in each quarter since 1997; and how many cautions were issued; [97724]

(2) how many children in the East Riding of Yorkshire (a) were convicted, (b) were in local authority care, (c) received a reprimand, (d) received a final warning and (e) were found guilty, in each year since 1997. [97730]

Hilary Benn: The information contained in the table gives the number of children convicted of all offences, those given cautions, reprimands and final warnings and those in care in Humberside, 1997 to 2001.

The information collected centrally does not enable cases in the Haltemprice and Howden constituency to be identified nor cautions in the East Riding of Yorkshire. Neither is it possible to give the number of crimes committed by juveniles, only the number of juveniles who are found guilty of all offences.

Figures on children looked after by local councils were supplied by the Department of Health.

Statistics for 2002 will be published in the autumn.

Prisons (Drugs)

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answers of 28 January 2003, Official Report, columns 757–59W, what assessment he has made of (a) the adequacy of closed circuit television provision in visits areas of prisons and (b) their success in obstructing smuggling of drugs into prisons by visitors. [97995]

Hilary Benn: No specific research has been conducted by the Prison Service on the effectiveness of closed circuit television (CCTV). A CCTV good practice guide, drawing on the wider experience within the criminal justice system, has however been issued to prisons, against which individual establishments must review their procedures.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answers of 28 January 2003, Official Report, columns 757–59W, what importance he attaches to each of the routes he has identified by which drugs enter prisons. [97996]

Hilary Benn: Drug smuggling is by nature a covert activity. It is extremely difficult to quantify the frequency with which different routes are used. Routes vary depending on the nature of the individuals or prisons concerned. The Prison Service, however, believes that one of the most frequent routes is through social visits.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answers of 28 January 2003, Official Report, columns 757–59W, which measures to reduce the availability of drugs in prisons aim to disrupt attempts to smuggle drugs in by mail. [97997]

Hilary Benn: It would not be appropriate to disclose all the precise security measures in place to disrupt attempts to smuggle drugs. All social mail is opened and searched before being sent to the prisoner. X-ray machines and active drug dogs may be used in support of that process.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answers of 28 January 003, Official Report, column 757–59W, by what means he will assess the effectiveness of measures to reduce the availability of drugs in prisons. [97998]

Hilary Benn: Random mandatory drug testing (MDT) provides the best available measure of the effectiveness of policies to reduce the availability of drugs in prisons. Since the introduction of MDT the figure has reduced from 24.4 per cent. in 1996–97 to 11.6 per cent. in 2001–02. A wide-ranging programme of research is also under way to assess the effectiveness of supply reduction measures.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answers of 28 January 2003, Official Report, column 757–59W, how many attempts have been made to smuggle drugs into prisons by means of perimeter breach in the last year for which figures are available. [97999]

Hilary Benn: Any attempts to smuggle drugs into prisons are, by nature, covert activities which are extremely difficult to quantify. No such records are kept. Prisons take into account the geography of each site and adopt appropriate security measures to minimise the risk of smuggling via this route.

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of prison inmates in Britain are using drugs on a regular basis. [97595]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 12 February 2003]: The random mandatory drug testing (MDT) programme represents the best available measure of overall drug misuse in prisons in England and Wales. The percentage figure for prisoners who tested positive in 2001–02 was 11.6 per cent.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners over the age of 65 are (a) serving life sentences and (b) have special medical needs; and if he will make a statement. [97494]

Hilary Benn: The number of prisoners serving life sentences over the age of 65 on 30 November 2002 was 121.

A study of 203 sentenced male prisoners aged 60 and over in 15 establishments in England and Wales (about one-fifth of that total population) conducted in 1999–2000 reported that 85 per cent. had one or more major illnesses reported in their medical records and 83 per cent. reported at least one chronic illness or disability when interviewed. The most common illnesses were psychiatric, cardiovascular, musculoskeletal and respiratory. All prisons and their local national health service partners have completed joint prison health needs assessments, leading to the implementation of improvements to healthcare provision based on individual prison health plans.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those prisons which cater for young offenders; and how many (a) young offenders and (b) other prisoners are held in each prison. [97038]

Hilary Benn: The information requested is shown in the table. The term young offenders has been taken to refer to any prisoner aged under 21 years of age held in an establishment, whether or not they have been convicted of an offence.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average weekly number of offenders was (a) entering the prison system and (b) released from the prison system in each year since 1995. [98139]

Hilary Benn: The information is given in the following table:

The average weekly number of prisoners initially received and discharged

1995	2,420	1,600
1996	2,320	1,500

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the (a) total prison population and (b) number of people convicted of a criminal offence were in (i) 1980, (ii) 1985, (iii) 1990, (iv) 1995 and (v) 2000. [98140]

Hilary Benn: The information is given in the table:

	1980	1985	1990	1995	2000
Population in custody[1]	43,109	46,278	45,636	50,962	64,602

[1] Average population in custody including fine defaulters.

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) fathers and (b) mothers are in prison who are aged (i) under 18, (ii) 18 to 21, (iii) 21 to 31, and (iv) 31 to 41. [97268]

Hilary Benn: There is no routinely collected data on the number and age of fathers and mothers in prison. However, a Home Office study of a large sample of imprisoned women and mothers, published in 1997, found that 60 per cent. of female prisoners, sentenced and unsentenced, had dependent children under the age of 18. Another smaller but more recent study of women prisoners and their work in custody, published in 2000, found broadly similar results (out of a sample of 567 sentenced women, 66 per cent. had dependent children under the age of 18).

Directly equivalent information for male prisoners is not available. However, the 1991 England and Wales prison survey showed that 32 per cent. of male prisoners had dependent children who had been living with them just before they were imprisoned; the corresponding figure for female prisoners was 47 per cent.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the (a) capacity and (b) occupancy is of each prison. [96770]

Hilary Benn: The information requested is shown in the following table. The table shows the population and operational capacity of all establishments in England and Wales. Operational capacity is the total number of prisoners that an establishment can hold taking into account control, security and the proper operation of the planned regime.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons in England and Wales have been equipped with stair lifts to help elderly infirm people. [96019]

Hilary Benn: Prison Service establishments install stair lifts as operational needs dictate. Such installations are funded locally. This information is not therefore held centrally and could be collected at disproportionate cost.

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many pregnant women are held in prisons in (a) England and (b) Wales. [96851]

Hilary Benn: Statistics on the number of pregnant women held in prisons in England and Wales are not collected routinely. However, a one-off survey was conducted on 13 November 2002 and has recently been collated. At that time, there were 75 pregnant women held within the female prison estate.

Firearms

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps the Government is taking to control the number of guns arriving in the UK from Eastern Europe and the Balkans. [96903]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The Government is aware of the risk of illegal weapons being imported from Eastern Europe and the Balkans. Law enforcement agencies are continuing to monitor the situation carefully and are already involved in efforts to reduce the flow of firearms to this country. Those firearms which are smuggled and intended for criminal use in the United Kingdom are often connected with smuggling of other commodities, including drugs and this is another angle that is currently being addressed.

A conference on organised crime in the Balkans was held in London last November at which the matter of firearms trafficking was discussed. The Government is currently considering follow-up actions relating to tighter border controls, increasing police capacity, encouraging intelligence-led policing and improving international co-operation, which will help restrict smuggling.

Lancashire Constabulary

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the ethnic composition of the Lancashire Constabulary is. [97512]

Misuse of Drugs Advisory Council

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 5 December 2002, Official Report, column 973W, on the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs, what sub-committee meetings took place on (a) 1 November 2001 and (b) 15 January 2002; where each meeting took place; which members of the Council attended each meeting; which members of the Council attended the (i) meeting on 8 November 2001 and (ii) full meeting on 15 January 2002, and where they took place; which members of the Council were commissioned to produce the draft report on the classification of cannabis; and whether the Council took a vote on approving the draft report on the classification of cannabis. [96575]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Joint meetings of the technical sub-committee and the research sub-committee of the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs took place on 1 November 2001 and 15 January 2002. The meetings were held respectively at the main Home Office building, Queen Anne's Gate and St. Ermin's Hotel, Caxton street, London.

The members of the Council who attended the meetings are as listed.

The meetings of the Council which took place on 8 November 2001 and 15 January 2002 were held respectively in the main Home Office building, Queen Anne's Gate and St. Ermin's Hotel, Caxton street, London. The members of the Council who attended the meetings are as listed.

The report on the classification of cannabis was drafted by the chair of the Council, Professor Sir Michael Rawlins, with contributions from the chairs of the technical and research sub-committees, Professor David Nutt and Mrs. Kay Roberts. The report was approved by the full Council at its meeting on 15 January 2002. In accordance with normal Council procedures, no vote was taken.

Police Cars

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is on police cars displaying the Union Flag. [96661]

Mr. Denham: This is an operational matter for individual Chief Officers of police, although we are not aware of any force that has included the Union Flag as part of standard vehicle livery. There are no restrictions under the general law on the display of the Union Flag on land in England and Wales other than those imposed by the provisions of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 and the Trade Marks Act 1994, which relate to the reproduction of flags in trade marks.

Prison Programmes

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on prison rehabilitation programmes. [98141]

Hilary Benn: One of the principal objectives of the Prison Service is to reduce crime by providing constructive regimes which address offending behaviour, improve educational and work skills and promote law abiding behaviour in custody and after release. The Prison Service increasingly draws upon "What Works" research to develop a more evidence based approach to tackling offending behaviour and the factors that contribute to re-offending. The What Works in Prison Strategy, launched last year, provides a clear direction for the further development of constructive regimes to reduce the risk of re-offending. The strategy encompasses accredited offending behaviour programmes, drug treatment programmes, increased education provision and a custody to work strategy to improve resettlement outcomes. The Prison and Probation Services have been set the challenging but achievable target of reducing the level of reconvictions by fiver per cent. by 2004 compared to the predicted rate.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the budgets were for (a) offending behaviour programmes, (b) drug treatment and (c) basic skills education in prisons in each year between 1995 and 2002; and if he will make a statement on future spending plans. [98142]

Hilary Benn: (a) Offending Behaviour Programmes (OBPs).

In addition, in each year there is an element of baseline funding for OBPs which cannot be accurately disaggregated from establishment budgets. Future spending plans are to maintain investment at 2003–04 levels.

(b) Drug Interventions: Between 1995–96 and 2003–04, the Prison Service has been allocated £143 million for drug interventions. The respective annual allocations are shown in the table.

The Government's 2002 Spending Review has made provision for significant, additional funding for drugs misuse. In particular, investment in aftercare and throughcare links will help ensure that the gains made while prisoners are in custody will not be lost on their release. Provision is included to boost drug treatment in prisons.

(c) Education:

£ million

Year	Core funding
1995–96	37.0
1996–97	34.5
1997–98	36.2
1998–99	39.0
1999–2000	47.4
2000–01	50.9
2001–02	57.0
2003–04	85.0

From 2001–02, budgets for prison education have been ring-fenced and allocated by the Prisoners' Learning and Skills Unit, which reports to the Department for Education and the Home Office. The core budget rose from £57 million in 2001–02 to £66 million in 2002–03, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education (Charles Clarke) recently announced that it will rise to £85 million 2003–04, £110 million in 2004–05 and £125 million in 2005–06. Core funding buys teaching hours, induction and assessment sessions, Library services and education materials. While basic skills are a significant part of prisons' education provision, and each prison has basic skills targets, we cannot say exactly how much of overall education funding goes on basic skills.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners have participated in the Cognitive Self-Change Programme since its inception; and what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the programme; [98136]

(2) how many prisoners participated in the Enhanced Thinking Skills programme since its inception; and what plans there are to expand the programme. [98143]

Hilary Benn: One hundred and seventy-seven prisoners have participated in the Cognitive Self-Change programme since it was accredited in September 2000. Effectiveness is currently evaluated through reports on institutional behaviour, psychometric data, and risk assessments. Early provisional indications show reductions in hostility, aggression and impulsivity in prisoners undertaking the programme. Reconviction data will in due course also be used to evaluate effectiveness.

Since the inception of the Enhanced Thinking Skills (ETS) programme, 18,564 prisoners had participated up to 31 March 2002. This figures will increase by about 5,000 prisoners for 2002–03, and over 6,000 prisoners in subsequent years due to additional funding to increase delivery.

Annette Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff he employs to conduct research into projects, schemes, programmes or courses run for the Prison Service. [98195]

Hilary Benn: There are currently 18 members of staff employed to conduct research into projects, schemes, programmes or courses run for the Prison Service.

However, research may form part of the duties to be performed by members of staff other than these core 18 personnel.

Annette Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average length of time required was to research, evaluate and accredit a project or scheme being run for the Prison Service in the last three years. [98201]

Hilary Benn: The average length of time required was two years to adapt or develop Prison Service programmes to accreditation standard in the last three years. Time scales will vary depending on the complexity of the programme, the availability of research data and resources, and competing priorities.

Prisoners (Drug Treatment)

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the effect on drug users of RAPt in the prisons at which RAPt runs programmes. [97683]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 13 February 2003]: Initial research into reconviction rates of RAPt, Rehabilitation for Addicted Prisoners' Trust programme graduates is encouraging; it shows a 40 per cent. reconviction rate, compared to an expected 51 per cent.

Emerging findings suggest that, for graduates who receive secondary aftercare on release, reconviction rates can be as low as 30 per cent., compared to expected rate of 54 per cent.

Probation Service

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many probation staff left the Probation Service in England and Wales in each financial year since 1997–98, broken down by grade. [93301]

Hilary Benn: The information requested is as follows:

Number of leavers[1]—England and Wales

	1997	1998	1999	2000	[2]2001–02
Deputy chief officers	4	6	1	9	7
Assistant chief officers[3]	31	18	18	17	75
Senior probation officers	87	84	104	313	148
Probation officers[4]	485	465	612	593	417
Probation service officers[5]	169	210	233	290	[5]—
All other staff	760	729	596	429	1,266
Total	1,536	1,512	1,664	1,651	1,913

[1] Figures shown in headcount and were collected for calendar years only 1997–2000 inclusive.

[2] 1,200 staff moved to family court welfare in April 2001. Information on specific grades of these staff are unavailable and therefore have been taken from probation officers and all other staff.

[3] Includes area managers.

[4] Includes senior practitioners, trainee probation officers, temporary probation officers.

[5] PSOs included in other staff 2001–02 onwards.

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the forecast spending is on investment in the Probation Service from 2003 to 2008. [98188]

Hilary Benn: The summary budget for the National Probation Service is set out in the table.

£ million

	2002–03	2003–04
Probation Boards Revenue Grant	520.0	560.0
Hostels Revenue Grant	42.7	49.0
Probation Officer Training	42.0	53.0
Estates and Hostels Capital Programme	18.3	18.3
National Directorate Budgets	52.8	65.7
Total	675.8	746.0

The major items of capital investment are the £18.3 million on the commercial estate and hostels and investment in new information technology equipment.

Budgets for 2004–05 and 2005–06 have not yet been finalised. Budgets from 2005–06 onwards are subject to the next spending review.

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what forecast his Department has made of the number of probation officers required to manage the caseloads of non-custodial sentences; and if he will make a statement. [98189]

Hilary Benn: The most recent information regarding the current staff establishment of the National Probation Service is as follows:

	Number
Probation officers	7,506
Probation Services officers	3,566
Other staff	4,716

Source:

RDS Probation statistics 2001.

It is estimated that the provisions within the Criminal Justice Bill would require an additional 2,000 full-time equivalent probation officers and an additional 1,500 full-time equivalent Probation Services officers in the year of full implementation.

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many probation officers were employed by the National Probation Service in each year since 1990. [98191]

Hilary Benn: The information requested is as follows:

Numbers of probation officers[1,2]— England and Wales

	Probation officers	Probation service officers	Total
1990	6,909	1,791	8,700
1991	7,153	1,863	9,016

2001	7,506	3,566	11,072

[1] Numbers shown as whole time equivalents

Although the question specifically asks for the number of probation officers, the information on probation service officers has also been provided. There has been an increasing growth in the use of probation service officers to support the work undertaken by probation officers. In particular, the use of accredited programme has seen a number of low/medium risk offenders supervised as part of a group rather than on an individual basis as has occurred in the past. Probation service officers, who receive specific training to enable them to manage these programmes and supervise the offenders participating, run these accredited programmes.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many departmental minutes issued by his Department were outstanding on 30 November 2002 that referred to public-private partnerships, as included in Table B14 of the Consolidated Fund and National Loans Fund Accounts; and what their value was. [89423]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 13 January 2003]: The contingent liabilities associated with the Home Department's public-private partnerships at 30 November 2002 were as follows:

1. Her Majesty's Prison Service—The Crown acts as insurer of last resort in respect of contracts to design, construct, manage and finance new prisons. The liability runs for the construction period plus an operational period of 25 years in respect of each new prison. Amount: unquantifiable;

2. Police Information and Technology Unit—The Airwave Project with 02 (formerly the mobile communications arm of BT) for the Police Service. The estimated costs of termination range from £480 million to more than £700 million. There would also be additional costs associated with the introduction of an alternative to Airwave;

3. Home Office Pay and Pension Service—Covering the potential loss of Home Office funds transmitted using the contractor's equipment. The risk is small as the contract includes all the usual safeguards for the authorisation process required by the Bankers Automated Clearing System.

Potential, but unlikely, largest single risk £80 million; and

4. The Home Office contract with Sirius for providing computer services. The estimated costs of termination range from £14.14 million to £33.62 million.

Young Offenders

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has undertaken to assess the impact on re-offending rates of offenders who have completed the National Grid Transco Foundation in Reading young offender institution; and if he will make a statement. [98193]

Hilary Benn: The National Grid Transco Foundation supports the delivery of gas groundwork engineering training and forklift truck driving training for prisoners at Reading young offender institution. None of the nine prisoners who have completed the gas groundwork engineering training, and only six of more than 90 prisoners who have completed the forklift truck driving training, are reported as having re-offended since their release. The Prison Service is now working with the National Grid Transco Foundation to introduce the training at other establishments.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he will answer the question of 15 January 2003 from the hon. Member for Woking, concerning restraining orders for serial offenders; [95070]

(2) when he will answer the question of 15 January 2003 from the hon. Member for Woking, concerning travel restriction orders. [95071]

Hilary Benn: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 31 January 2003, Official Report, column 398W. I apologise for the delay in responding.

Retail Industry Crime

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 14 January 2003, Official Report, column 585W, on Retail Industry Crime, how many small retail businesses have (a) applied for and (b) received a grant from the Government to improve security on their property; and if he will list those consulted in the preparation of the new survey of crime affecting retail and manufacturing business. [97263]

Mr. Denham: Funding under the Small Retailers in Deprived Areas Initiative is allocated directly to regional Crime Reduction Directors, whose responsibility it is to distribute the money to Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships (CDRPs) covering the 10 per cent. most deprived wards in the region. Proposals invited from CDRPs have to meet the scheme's strict criteria, and are worked up in close conjunction with the regional Crime Reduction Director, who submits them to me for approval. All proposals submitted to me in the first two years of the initiative have been approved without exception.

Overall, in the first year of the initiative (2001–02), almost 3,000 small businesses benefited, while in the second year over 4,500 retailers and small businesses stand to benefit from this funding.

The Crime Against Business survey is funded jointly by the Home Office, Her Majesty's Treasury, and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's Neighbourhood Renewal Unit and the Small Business Service (an agency of the Department for Trade and Industry). The British Retail Consortium, British Chambers of Commerce, and the Confederation of British Industry (CBI) have also been consulted and closely involved in the survey. Representatives from all the above organisations, public and private, have participated from the outset as steering group members and tender panel representatives and have also had input into the survey methodology and questionnaire content.

The Association of Conveniences Stores, the Federation of Small Business and the British Shops and Stores Association have pledged their support for the survey.

Telephone interviews and postal questionnaires were piloted with members of the business community.

Road Traffic Offences

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many successful prosecutions there have been under the Road Traffic Act 1991 c40 section 3 in each year since 1991. [97168]

Hilary Benn: The information is given in the table.

The Government's response to the consultation exercise on road traffic penalties, setting out our final recommendations, was published on 24 July 2002. This report sets out our commitment to raising the penalty for causing death by dangerous driving and causing death by careless driving while under the influence of drink or drugs, from 10 years to 14 years imprisonment as soon as parliamentary timetable allows.

The Criminal Justice Bill will introduce new sentences for dangerous offenders that will ensure that offenders committing an offence under section 3 of the Road Traffic Act, who have also been assessed as dangerous, may remain in custody for as long as they are considered to pose a risk of harm to the public.

Sally Clark

Mr. George Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the procedures carried out by Home Office pathologists into the deaths of infants in suspicious circumstances following the Court of Appeal judgment on Sally Clark. [95588]

Mr. Denham: I commissioned an independent review of Forensic Pathology Services in England and Wales last year.

The review report recommended that:

1. the decline in numbers of forensic pathologists should be reversed through a sustained training programme;
2. improved administrative arrangements should be put in place, monitoring service levels and ensuring that standards are maintained; and
3. steps should be taken to ensure that there are improved facilities for the conduct of post-mortem examinations.

Now that the review has been discussed by the Policy Advisory Board for Forensic Pathology, it is under consideration by the Government.

Sex Tourism

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken to tackle sex tourism by British people, with particular reference to those who are known paedophiles; and if he will make a statement. [98103]

Hilary Benn: The Government are committed to eradicating the sexual exploitation of children, including where United Kingdom citizens go abroad to abuse children. We have already put in place a number of measures to deal with this problem:

> The Sex Offenders Act 1997 enables courts in the United Kingdom to deal with UK citizens who commit sex offences against children abroad. This provision is being re-enacted in the Sexual Offences Bill;
> Since June 2001, 'registered' sex offenders are required to notify the police if they intend to travel abroad for eight days or more, The police can, and do, pass this information to other jurisdictions where they believe the offender may commit offences overseas;
> We are proposing, as part of the Sexual Offences Bill, a new order that would require those who have committed sex offences overseas to register if they come to the UK (which will mean they will have to notify the police if they intend to travel abroad);
> The Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 makes it an offence for a person to conspire to commit an offence outside the UK, including sexual offences against children.

As my right hon. Friends the Home Secretary, the Prime Minister and Lord Falconer have recently made clear, we are looking further at the issue of sex tourism, including the number of days a sex offender 'registered' in the United Kingdom can travel overseas before he is required to notify the police. We are determined to ensure that effective arrangements are put in place to tackle this issue and we will address this in the Sexual Offences Bill.

However, legislation is not the only way of dealing with this problem. Sex tourism is one part of a wider set of issues in which poor people—particularly young women and children—are vulnerable to the interests of the sex industry, national and international trafficking and associated illegal activities. It is an international problem which requires internationally coordinated action. We are working with Governments, law enforcement agencies and non-governmental organisations (NGOs) to tackle this problem head on wherever it occurs.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department for International Development support projects in many parts of the world aimed at combating those who commit offences against children. Much of the focus of such projects is on reducing the vulnerability of young people being recruited into this industry. Across Government, we are supporting the efforts of regional and international agencies to combat trafficking, strengthen law enforcement and improve the mechanisms for prosecution of those who commit sex offences abroad.

The Government are actively involved in a number of projects to combat sexual exploitation, particularly in South East Asia.

> Through the International Labour Organisation we are funding a major programme in South East Asia to raise awareness, help women and children escape from sexual exploitation, and reintegrate them into their own or new communities.
> We are working with World Vision in Cambodia to run an information programme on the dangers of sexual exploitation aimed at children at risk, local authorities and the tourism industry.
> We are funding projects to help train the Cambodian police to detect and disrupt paedophile activity and to raise awareness of the issue among street children.
>
> We have worked to improve child protection and support in Thailand by bringing over expert trainers from the Northumberland police and The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (NSPCC).
> We have provided child protection equipment and training to the Thai Public Welfare Department.
> We have funded the translation and adaptation of End Child Prostitution Pornography and Trafficking (ECPAT's) "Guide to Protecting Children Online" for use in Thailand, Philippines, Indonesia and Japan.
> We have arranged for the National High Tech Crime Unit (NHTCU) to bring computer hardware and software to combat child abuse online and train officers from the Royal Thai police; and > there is also close and regular collaboration between officials in Bangkok and their Thai counterparts on the movements and activities of known United Kingdom paedophiles.

Teenage Drug Use (Leeds)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many teenagers he estimates have tried class A drugs in the (a) Leeds West constituency and (b) the city of Leeds in the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [96973]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Data on drug use by teenagers is not available at constituency or city level. The following table provides information about the percentage of 16–19 year olds who have ever tried a Class A drug in (a) Yorkshire and Humberside and (b) England and Wales reported as part of the British Crime Survey (BCS).

Percentage of 16–19 year olds who have ever tried a Class A drug

Percentage

	BCS 1998	BCS 2000	BCS 2001–02
Yorkshire and Humberside	27	17	10
England and Wales	16	14	11

It should not be concluded from any of these results that young people in Yorkshire and Humberside are any more or less likely to have ever tried a Class A drug. In 1998 and 2000 particularly the regional result is based on a very small sample (57 and 58 16–19 year olds respectively) which may not be representative of the population in this area.

For the same reason, the apparent dramatic decline in the percentage of 16–19 year olds having ever tried a Class A drug in the Yorkshire and Humberside region over the three surveys, should be treated with caution.

"The Drug use, smoking and drinking among young people in England in 2001 "survey estimates that 6 per cent. of school children aged between 11 and 15 years olds have tried a class A drug. No geographical breakdown is available for this age group.

Unsafe Convictions

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the inquiry chaired by Lord Steyn on the definition of unsafe conviction. [85439]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 9 December 2002]: We have confirmed with Lord Steyn that he has not chaired such an inquiry.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made with renewal of his Department's and its agencies' vehicle fleets on a lower emission basis, broken down by volume and percentage for each category of vehicle, type of power unit and type of fuel on an annual basis, over each of the past three years. [96587]

Hilary Benn: Home Office environmental policy on vehicle replacement states that wherever possible, vehicles purchased will encompass either dual fuel technology (for example Liquid Petroleum Gas (LPG)/petrol) or be high-pressure direct injection diesel with particulate filters. With the introduction of the new carbon dioxide (CO_2) based tax regime, CO_2 emissions are taken into consideration, particularly in cases where a diesel option cannot be specified, in the small car sector.

In 2000–01, 43 per cent. of new cars ordered were diesel powered. In 2001–02, 69 per cent. of all new cars ordered were either diesel or LPG fuelled, rising to 76 per cent. in 2002–03. The following table illustrates the trend towards the acquisition of more environmentally friendly vehicles during the last three years.

West Yorkshire Police

Jon Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the budget for West Yorkshire Police is spent on pension funds in 2002–03. [96622]

Mr. Denham: The Chief Constable informs me that the proportion of budget estimated to be spent on police pensions in 2002–03 is 15 per cent.

DEFENCE

Army (Gender and Culture Report)

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action is proposed as a result of the report "Gendered Bodies, Personnel Policies and the Culture of the British Army". [97343]

Angela Watkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the study undertaken for the Ministry of Defence to identify sexism in the army; who undertook the survey; what methodology was used; how many people were consulted and of what gender; and for what purpose the results of the survey will be used. [97175]

Dr. Moonie: The study into gender and culture in the contemporary British Army, "Gendered Bodies, Personnel Policies and the Culture of the British Army", is an independent report, completed at the University of Newcastle, into employment practices and policies within the Army.

The research was not commissioned by the Ministry of Defence, but was completed with the full co-operation of the Army and part-funded under the Joint Grant Scheme that encourages research relevant to the Department's long-term research programme.

To date, the Army and Ministry of Defence have examined a summary of the report. The full report will be examined closely in due course but there is no specific action intended as a result of this study at this time.

The Department certainly will not ignore the report's findings and, from what has been gleaned from the report summary so far, in many respects is moving in the direction suggested in the way women are recognised and treated.

The report's originators have agreed that I can place a copy of the report in the Library of the House.

Ammunition Exports

Richard Younger-Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what ammunition has been sent abroad for disposal under civilian contract since 1997; and to which countries they have been sent. [97287]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 10 February 2003]: Since 1997, surplus (5.56mm, 7.62mm and 0.303mm) small arms ammunition has been sold overseas. The countries it was sold to are the United States, Netherlands, Australia, Finland, Philippines, Canada and Latvia. Additionally, in 1999, 10,000 Self Loading Rifles (SLRs) with 7.62mm ammunition were sold to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which subsequently gifted them to the Government of Sierra Leone as part of a wider assistance package.

Anglo-French Collaboration

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the UK's military projects involving Anglo-French collaboration since 1980, and set out their current status. [97327]

Mr. Ingram: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Anti-rabies Testing

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what risk assessment was conducted before anti-rabies testing at Dundrennan Range; and what further assessment has since been made of the risks to (a) local people, (b) pets, and (c) other livestock arising from the testing. [88642]

Mr. Morley: I have been asked to reply.

The field trial was authorised by the ACP (Advisory Committee on Pesticides) who performed an independent evaluation of the risks of the trial, and stipulated certain conditions to further reduce such risks.

The Central Science Laboratory's (CSL) own risk assessment was that the risks to local people, pets and other livestock was extremely low. No poisoning incidents have occurred as a result of the trial, and the overall level of pesticide used at Dundrennan was between 10,000 and one million times less (per square kilometre) than the level used during certain agricultural practices.

Army Training

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which army initial training establishments were not visited in the context of the appraisal of initial training carried out by the Director of Operational Capability between 3rd October and 18th December 2002. [97903]

Mr. Ingram: The Director of Operational Capability did not visit the following Army non-officer initial training establishments:

Army Training Regiment—Winchester

Royal Military School of Music—Kneller Hall

Armour Centre—Bovington and Lulworth

Royal School of Military Engineering—Minley

Royal School of Signals—Blandford

School of Army Aviation—Middle Wallop

Defence Logistics Support Training Group—Deepcut, Kineton and Aldershot

Adjutant General's Corps Training Group—Worthy Down

Defence Animal Centre—Melton Mowbray

Royal Military Police Training School—Chichester

Capital Projects

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place the evaluations for Capital Modernisation Fund projects in his Department since 1998 in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [97033]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence has been involved in five Capital Modernisation Fund projects to date. Some are not yet complete. I will ensure that all evaluation reports, when completed, are placed in the Library of the House except where there are security or other confidentiality grounds for not doing so.

Civil Contingency Reaction Force

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the Territorial Army to have the capacity to sustain a command structure for a full time headquarters for the new Civil Contingency Reaction Force. [95181]

Mr. Ingram: The 14 Civil Contingencies Reaction Forces (CCRFs) are not grouped in a single formation with a separate headquarters. They form force elements which may be called on, alongside regular units, by the established chain of command (Ministry of Defence, Land Command, Divisional HQs and Regional Brigades) in the event of a request for military assistance by the civil authorities.

New Volunteer Reserve posts have been established at Brigade and Divisional level to reinforce existing command and control arrangements for all military assistance operations, whether or not CCRFs are involved.

Each CCRF is parented by a Territorial Army infantry battalion. Additional posts have been established within these battalions to support CCRF staff and training activities.

Recruitment for these new posts is in progress, with the aim of filling all posts by 31 December 2003.

Civilian Staff (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Kevin McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the (a) numerical and (b) percentage breakdown by perceived community origin are of his civilian staff employed in Northern Ireland. [97692]

Dr. Moonie: The numerical and percentage breakdown of the civilian staff employed by the Ministry of Defence in Northern Ireland as at 1 January 2003 is set out in the table below.

	Male		Female		Total
	Number	Percentage	Number	Percentage	Number	Percentage
Protestant	1,462	42.8	992	29.1	2,454	71.9
Roman Catholic	254	7.4	192	5.6	446	13.1
Others	344	10.1	170	5.0	514	15.0
Total	2,060	60.3	1,354	39.7	3,414

Laptops

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many laptop computers were used by (a) Ministers and special advisers and (b) officials in his Department in each year since 1995; how many were (i) lost and (ii) stolen; what their cost was; and if he will make a statement. [97503]

Dr. Moonie: Information regarding the number of laptop computers used within the Ministry of Defence in any given year is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost. The same applies to information regarding any items recorded as lost. With regard to the number of laptop computers suspected of being stolen, reported cases are recorded centrally on a summary basis only. Those records relate to items suspected of being stolen and so it cannot be assumed that theft actually applies in every case. Information regarding stolen laptop computers is only readily available from 1997–98 and is here related to cases where the value of suspected loss exceeds £1,000.

Year	Total	(£)
1997–98	18	38,010
1998–99	3	6,885
1999–00
2000–01	4	7,748
2001–02	12	31,530

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft his Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside his Department. [97556]

Dr. Moonie: The number of incidents affecting computer systems for the years 2001 and 2002 are summarised in the following table:

Incident Type	2001	2002
Computer Hacking Totals: of which:	12	7
Public website defacements	2	1
Internal incursions	10	6
Computer Fraud	4	0
Computer Theft	118	155

None of the instances of hacking had any operational impact, and despite widespread and frequent probes of Ministry of Defence firewalls connected to the Internet, there is no evidence of any successful incursion from an external source to any Departmental computer system.

In the case of computer fraud, all instances are cases where MOD computers have been used in support of fraudulent activities, rather than fraudulent use of a computer—based system.

Departmental Assets

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his estimate is of the total revenues from the disposal of defence assets from April 2001 to December 2002; and if he will make a statement. [95793]

Mr. Ingram: The total revenues from the disposal of defence assets from April 2001 to December 2002 is about £400 million. Information on asset disposals is published annually in the Consolidated Departmental Resource Accounts. The latest information (that for financial year 2001–02) is contained in HC 47 of 21 November 2002, copies of which are available in the Library of the House and on the Ministry of Defence website.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his estimate is of the value of the land and building assets of his Department in each year from 1990–91 to 2001–02; and if he will make a statement. [95796]

Dr. Moonie: We publish information on the value of Ministry of Defence land and building assets annually, and have done this since 1999–2000, in MOD's Consolidated Departmental Resource Accounts. These values are mainly based on the operational value of the estate to MOD and do not represent the market or sale value of the properties in question. For ease of reference, the figures are:

	£ billion
1999–2000	14.1
2000–01	14.4
2001–02	14.3

These are audited figures, which reflect the impact of indexation, additions, disposals and depreciation arising each year. Copies of the accounts have been placed in the Library of the House.

We also have (unaudited) estimates for:

	£ billion
1997–98[1]	13.4
1998–99	13.7

[1] The first year for which MOD-wide valuation information is available.

Departmental Consultations

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list consultations his Department has conducted since 1997; and when each consultation (a) opened and (b) closed. [97428]

Dr. Moonie: The Cabinet Office Code of Practice on Written Consultation applies to all formal national public consultation documents issued by Departments from 1 January 2001 and the information requested is not available before that date.

Since 1 January 2001, the following formal national public consultation documents have been issued by the Ministry of Defence:

	Consultation Period
Formal National Public Consultation	Date opened	Date closed
Future of the Defence Diversification Agency	1 February 2001	23 March 2001
Proposed introduction of the voluntary screening programme following health concerns in respect of depleted uranium	13 February 2001	9 March 2001
The Military Maritime Graves and the Protection of Military Remains Act 1986	14 February 2001	14 May 2001
Armed Forces pension scheme review	1 March 2001	31 July 2001
Joint compensation review	1 March 2001	31 July 2001
The 2nd consultation document on the introduction of a voluntary screening programme for depleted uranium	11 April 2001	4 July 2001
Ministry of Defence police quinquennial review	26 April 2001	18 December 2001

Further information on these public consultations can be found on the internet under http: //www .mod.uk/consultations.

Domestic Violence

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to (a) increase awareness of domestic violence and (b) provide services and support for the victims of domestic violence within the families of members of the military services. [97746]

Dr. Moonie: Domestic violence is a significant social issue and we recognise the need to ensure that it is dealt with effectively within the Armed Forces' community. Domestic violence by Service personnel is not tolerated under any circumstances, not least because of the detrimental impact that such incidents can have on morale, discipline and operational efficiency.

A tri-Service policy on domestic violence was issued in February 2002. The policy, which has now been implemented by the Services, sets out the roles and responsibilities of the chain of command and the welfare agencies in detecting and dealing with incidents of domestic violence and in providing confidential advice and support. The Services are proactive in increasing awareness about domestic violence to those in command and in publicising (via leaflets, posters and web sites) the services available to possible victims. There are many agencies, both military and civilian, that exist to provide support to victims. The confidential support lines that are operated by the three Services are able to signpost callers to these support agencies. In cases where immediate or imminent harm is suspected the incident is reported to the most readily available police force; primacy rests with the local Home Department Police Force in United Kingdom whereas cases arising overseas are dealt with by the Service police.

E-mail Addresses

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence by what e-mail address members of the public may contact (a) him and (b) each of the Ministers in his Department; and for each e-mail address if he will state (i) the date it became active and (ii) the number of e-mails received in each month since activation. [97448]

Dr. Moonie: Members of the public can contact all Defence Ministers via public@ministers.mod.uk. This email address has been active since 1998.

The table below details the number of emails recorded as received via this address since July 2000, from when these statistics have been collected:

2000	Number
July	311
August	2,872

Of the total number of e-mails set out above, over 85 per cent. are categorised as 'spam'; that is, offensive, or circulars, or otherwise not worthy of a response.

Experiments (Human Volunteers)

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many experiments sponsored by his Department have used human volunteers in each year since 1997; and if he will list them, broken down by recorded category. [93291]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 27 January 2003]: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Firefighters' Dispute

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the total cost incurred by his Department as a result of the fire strikes has been. [97807]

Mr. Ingram: It is not yet possible to give a reliable estimate of the total cost incurred by the Ministry of Defence as a result of the fire strikes. Costs incurred for the recent strike periods are still being processed through MOD's cost reporting system.

Gulf Deployment (Rules of Engagement)

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which instruments of international law have been considered during the drafting of the rules of engagement for Her Majesty's Armed Forces deploying to the Gulf. [98165]

Mr. Ingram: All rules of engagement are informed by the need to act in full conformity with international law, including Treaty obligations and relevant United Nations Security Council Resolutions.

HPM Electro-magnetic Pulse Weapon

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he or his officials have had with the US Government on the development of the HPM electro-magnetic pulse weapon. [97231]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 11 February 2003]: I am withholding the information requested under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information which relates to national security.

Iraq

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to protect UK troops against the potentially toxic environment of Iraq. [95914]

Dr. Moonie: Operational planning takes into account the risk of exposure of British troops to potentially toxic environments. Force protection measures include physical protection, medical countermeasures and dissemination of information on individual protective measures to be taken against specific identified threats.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he is planning to introduce the new chemical and biological weapon detection systems for possible operations in Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [97495]

Mr. Hoon: There are a number of new chemical and biological detection systems due to enter service soon and be available for possible military action in Iraq. I am withholding the details of these systems under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information which relates to national security.

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will take steps to establish the number of civilian casualties caused by British military action taken in enforcement of the Iraqi no-fly zones; and if he will make a statement. [97648]

Mr. Ingram: We conduct extensive analysis after every response made in self-defence by coalition aircraft patrolling the No Fly Zones.

Coalition aircrew only ever respond in self-defence against military targets. When attacks by Iraqi air defences force coalition aircraft to respond in this way we go to great lengths to ensure that the risk of civilian casualties is minimised. Targets are selected with extreme care and precision guided weapons are used.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans exist for the transport of military casualties back to the UK in the event of hostilities in Iraq; what aircraft will be used; and what the estimated journey time is. [97790]

Dr. Moonie: The transport of military casualties from theatres to the United Kingdom is a well planned and practised procedure. In the event of hostilities in Iraq, military casualties will be taken from Kuwait City International Airport to Cyprus in a military VC10 with a flight time of four hours. They will then be transferred from Cyprus to the United Kingdom by commercial aircraft again with a flight time of four hours.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on NATO policy in respect of Iraq. [98040]

Mr. Ingram: At the Prague Summit in November 2002, the NATO Allies committed themselves to take effective action to assist and support the efforts of the United Nations to ensure full and immediate compliance by Iraq, without conditions or restrictions, with UN Security Council Resolution 1441. This remains the NATO policy.

Land Sales (Ashford)

Matthew Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what land has been sold by his Department in the Ashford area in the last five years. [98172]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence has sold land in Ashford as follows:

A small part of Rowcroft Barracks was sold to Kent CC for the A20/A28 link road.

Parts of Rowcroft Barracks and Templer Barracks was sold for the Channel Tunnel Rail Link.

The remainder of Rowcroft and Templer Barracks was sold for development.

The former Oil Pipeline Agency site at Wye to the NE of Ashford was sold for development.

Merlin HC3 Helicopters

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why his Department has not deployed Merlin HC3 Helicopters to the Gulf. [98180]

Mr. Ingram: The Merlin HC3 is yet to achieve the required level of operational capability for it to be deployed to the Gulf region.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many times since 2001 he has taken flights on departmental duties in the UK; how many of these were (a) charter flights, (b) first or club-class and (c) by helicopter; and who accompanied him on each trip. [95391]

Dr. Moonie: Since 2001, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has taken 25 flights on Ministry of Defence duties within the United Kingdom, which are broken down as follows:

seven by RAF aircraft—accompanied by relevant Ministry of Defence officials, and on one occasion by his Parliamentary Private Secretary;

one by club-class return civil flight—accompanied by a Private Secretary; and 17 by Service helicopter—accompanied by relevant Ministry of Defence officials.

All travel is undertaken fully in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code and Travel by Ministers, copies of which are available in the Libraries of the House.

Operation Telic

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the LOA and LSSA as it applies to personnel serving on Operation Telic. [96940]

Mr. Ingram: Local Overseas Allowance (LOA) is not part of the military salary or a reward for overseas service, but a cost of living addition paid only in circumstances where personnel are likely to incur greater day-to-day expenditure overseas than they would in the United Kingdom. This is not generally the case for those deployed on operations.

Those personnel who are temporarily deployed away from their permanent, LOA earning, duty station, and no longer incurring the full range of additional costs associated with that station, still have on-going financial commitments overseas, and many have families who remain at the permanent duty station. Consequently, all Service personnel continue to receive the full LOA rate for the first 17 days of their deployment. Additionally, married accompanied personnel continue to receive their full LOA rate unless their accompanying spouse also leaves the permanent duty station for more than 17 days, at which point an abatement of approximately 35 per cent. is applied. Single or married unaccompanied personnel lose 20 per cent. of their full LOA rate after the first 17 days.

Personnel on Operation Telic who meet the eligibility criteria will receive Longer Separated Service Allowance (LSSA) or (for those serving in seagoing units) Longer Service at Sea Bonus (LSSB). These allowances compensate personnel, regardless of marital status, for the effects of separation from home life. They are paid at three rates dependent upon periods of accumulated separation. LSSA is paid for unbroken periods of separation of 10 days or more, while LSSB is paid continuously while in qualifying units. Bonuses are available for those who experience very high levels of accumulated separation and these will be increased to £1,250. In order to reduce the incidence of junior personnel experiencing more than one operational tour without compensation for separation, MOD will reduce the initial qualifying period for LSSA from 18 months' service to 12 months. We are also about to increase the higher rate of LSSB and to reduce the qualifying criteria for LSSB bonuses.

The decision to enhance these separation allowances reflects the Ministry of Defence's wish to target those on operations, particularly our most junior personnel. In view of the current operational deployment, it has been decided to introduce the changes with effect from 1 March 2003, following a recommendation by the Armed Forces' Pay Review Body.

Deepcut Barracks

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for how many days Private Steven MacNaughton was missing without leave from Deepcut Barracks from 7 November 2002; what disciplinary action was taken subsequently; and what reasons were given for his absence. [97831]

Dr. Moonie: The information requested is personal data protected by the Data Protection Act 1998, and cannot be released without the individual's consent. The information is also withheld in accordance with Exemption 12, privacy of an individual, of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

QinetiQ

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list, by site, his best current assessment of the land assets of QinetiQ. [98038]

Dr. Moonie: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 13 March 2002, Official Report, column 1165W, to the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) on the land assets of QinetiQ. Since that answer was given, an unconditional sale agreement has been exchanged for the Aquila site in Bromley, Kent and the sale is due to be completed on 17 March 2003. No other QinetiQ sites have been sold since the company was created in July 2001.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list each of the QinetiQ sites which have been sold since the creation of the company, indicating the value of the sale in each case. [98039]

Dr. Moonie: An unconditional sale agreement has been exchanged for the Aquila site in Bromley, Kent. The agreement is due to be completed on 17 March 2003. No other sites have been sold since the formation of QinetiQ. Details of the sale value of Aquila are currently considered commercially sensitive. I am therefore withholding that information under Exemption 13 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Royal Navy (Chilean Visits)

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what Royal Navy vessels have been visited by Chilean Government officials or Chilean armed forces personnel in the past year. [97193]

Mr. Ingram: During the past 12 months, we are aware of the following Royal Naval vessels having been visited by Chilean Government officials or senior Chilean armed forces personnel in either British or Chilean ports: HMS Leeds Castle; HMS St. Albans; RFA Grey Rover; HMS Sheffield; HMS Boxer and HMS Brave. Information on any visits that may have been paid in locations other than British or Chilean ports is not held centrally.

Service Personnel (Gulf)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements are in place for the accurate keeping of medical records of military personnel deployed to the middle east; and what progress has been made in introducing a Smart Military Dog-Tag. [93369]

Dr. Moonie: It is Ministry of Defence policy that all treatments and vaccinations given to armed forces personnel are to be recorded on their personal medical records. Service personnel are issued with form F Med 965, the Operational Medical Record, prior to deployment and any treatment or medication administered while they are deployed should be recorded on it. The information is transferred to their personal medical records on return to their home base. In addition, electronic medical record systems are used in theatre where practicable. Although the MOD continues to examine the possible use of "smart card" technology to store medical and other personal information, as yet there are no systems available that fully meet the requirements of the armed forces.

Munition Stocks

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the results of the Ministry of Defence's Stockpile Planning Guidance study. [97196]

Mr. Ingram: Specific information relating to planned munition stocks is withheld under Exemption 1 (Defence, Security and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. However, I can confirm that the Ministry of Defence's stockpile planning guidance is subject to annual review, and the latest review was completed in September 2002.

Vaccine Schedule (Gulf Deployment)

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to obtain informed consent for vaccination for troops deploying to the Gulf. [95928]

Dr. Moonie: It is Ministry of Defence policy that vaccinations can only be administered after an individual is found fit and suitable to receive it, and has given informed consent. The administering officer is required to obtain informed verbal consent following an explanation of the vaccination procedure and the risks and benefits of accepting vaccination.

Wheeled Support Vehicles

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to award a contract for the Wheeled Support Vehicles programme; and what delays there have been to the originally forecast in-service date. [97188]

Mr. Ingram: An announcement on the award of a contract is planned for late 2003. There has been no delay to the approved in-service date.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

"Opportunity and Excellence" White Paper

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the cost is of printing and collating his Department's White Paper on 14–19 year olds "Opportunity and Excellence"; what that cost would have been if it had been produced as a single document; and what the cost was of printing "The Future of Higher Education". [95134]

Mr. Stephen Twigg [holding answer 3 February 2003]: The recently produced policy document 14–19: opportunity and excellence was not classified as a White Paper. It was published in two parts, a main document and separate annexes, in order to make the document accessible to the wide range of audiences with an interest in 14–19 education and training. This allows the wider audience, such as parents and employers, with a more general interest in 14–19 reform, to order only the smaller main document, while practitioners, for example, can order the detailed annexes in addition. To reflect anticipated demand, we were able to print fewer copies of the annexes.

The main document and annexes were printed at a cost of £36,100. Summary versions and young people's versions were also printed, tailored in style andpresentation to different target audiences, and folders to allow collation of the different versions as required. The cost of producing these elements was £29,400, and collation costs were around £2,200.

It is not possible to estimate accurately the cost of producing a single document to the same timescales as the two volumes produced. It is likely that the cost would have been less than those incurred producing two documents, but this is offset against accessibility considerations and the lower quantity of annexes produced. Printing a larger 120 page document also requires different, more expensive, binding techniques. Collation costs would also have been incurred as different combinations of main document, summary and young people's version would have had to be collated fordistribution.

The cost of printing the main and summary versions of "The Future of Higher Education" was £67,625.

Beacon Schools

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on plans to extend and develop the Beacon schools initiative. [97150]

Mr. Miliband: For secondary schools the Beacon school initiative will be replaced by the Leading Edge Programme, which aims to extend active collaboration and develop cutting edge innovation to raise standards across the school system.

There will be no further expansion of a centrally funded Beacon school programme for primary, nursery and special schools. This is in line with the general wish of head teachers to reduce the proportion of funding delivered through ring-fenced grants and to devolve more funding decisions to local communities. Schools and LEAs will be able to broker and fund collaborative partnerships from within the substantial overall increase in resources provided as a result of the 2002 Spending Review. We are encouraging LEAs to fund this activity. My Department intends to explore arrangements for endorsing local programmes through a Beacon recognition scheme.

Computer Fraud

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many laptop computers were used by (a) Ministers and special advisers and (b) officials in his Department in each year since 1995; how many were (i) lost and (ii) stolen; what their cost was; and if he will make a statement. [97496]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The number of laptop computers in use in the Department for Education and Skills since 1995 is shown in the table.

Financial year	Ministers	Special advisors	Officials
1995–96	—	—	11
1996–97	—	—	375
1997–98	—	—	690
1998–99	—	—	1,172
1999–2000	3	1	1,586
2000–01	3	2	1,940
2001–02	3	1	2,105
2002–03	3	1	1,861

The following tables detail the equipment stolen and lost from the Department for Education and Skills since 1 May 1997 along with the approximate value of the stolen equipment. Information is not available for earlier years.

Stolen

Financial year	Number of laptops	Approximate value per item (£)	Total approximate value (£)
1997–98	5	1,000	5,000
1998–99	7	1,000	7,000
1999–2000	5	1,000	5,000
2000–01	2	1,000	2,000
2001–02	3	1,000	3,000
2002–03	9	1,000	9,000

Lost

Financial year	Number of laptops	Approximate value per item (£)	Total approximate value (£)
1997–98	12	1,000	12,000
1998–99	11	1,000	11,000
1999–2000	11	1,000	11,000

	Lost
Financial year	Number of laptops	Approximate value per item (£)	Total approximate value (£)
2000–01	10	1,000	10,000
2001–02	8	1,000	8,000
2002–03	53	1,000	53,000

Notes:

Electronic secutity tags are fitted to all portable IT equipment held in London. The tags raise an alarm at Reception if an unauthorised person attempts to remove the kit. The level of theft outside London is so low that it is not justified to extend tagging to the Darlington, Runcorn and Sheffield sites of the Department.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft his Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside his Department. [97557]

Mr. Charles Clarke: During the financial year 2001–02 there have been:

(a) no detected cases of computer hacking, either by insiders or by persons outside of the Department;

(b) no cases of computer fraud; and

(c) three cases of theft of IT equipment by persons outside the Department for Education and Skills.

Degree Courses

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what research he has conducted into the factors determining the choice of degree course by students; and if he will place the results in the Library. [97109]

Margaret Hodge: The department and other organisations have published a number of research reports that have investigated students' choice of course among other issues. These include:

Connor, H. et al (2001) "Social Class and Higher Education: Issues Affecting Participation by Lower Social Class Groups" DfEE Research Report No. 246

UCAS (2002) "Paving the Way Project Report".

Davies, P. et al (2002) "For me or not for me—that is the question. A study of mature students' decision-making and higher education" DfES Research Report 297.

This research finds that most students choose their course because they are interested in the subject. The expected employment prospects associated with the course is also an important consideration to many students. The mode of delivery and timetabling of the course influences many mature students' choice.

The most important reason for choosing an institution is that it offers the right subject. The location of the institution is also important, often for financial reasons.

Departmental Consultations

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list consultations his Department has conducted since it was established; and when each consultation (a) opened and (b) closed. [97430]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: A list of the public consultations undertaken by my Department since it was established on the 8 June 2001 is in the following table. Information includes the opening and closing dates of each consultation as requested.

Departmental Projects

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the special units, task forces, and other permanent and temporary bodies appointed by the Secretary of State since 1997 to (a) administer and (b) advise on Departmental projects and functions; and if he will list the external appointees on these bodies, their annual remuneration and their declared political interest. [89310]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: A list of the special units, task forces, and other permanent and temporary bodies appointed by the Secretary of State that are currently in existence are shown in the following list:

Advisory Group on Music and Dance Scheme

Chief Education Officers Reference Group

Connexions Service: Education Welfare Group

Connexions Service: 14–19 Steering Group

Dance and Drama Awards Annual Review Group

Funders' Forum

Investors in Children Development Group

Literacy and Numeracy Reference Group

Local Education Authority New Models External Reference Group

MI Across Partners Working Group

National Education Research Forum

National Steering Group for SEN Regional Co-ordination Projects

School Libraries Working Group

The (School) Workforce Agreement Monitoring Group

The additional information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, officials in the Department for Education and Skills will collect information on appointees and remuneration in the future.

Deprivation (Funding)

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what mechanism he has established to ensure that funding for deprivation via local education authorities reaches children for whom it is intended. [96999]

Mr. Miliband: Local education authorities' funding formulae for maintained schools normally include a factor which allocates funding according to social deprivation. From 2003, the rules relating to this are being amended to ensure that such a factor always exists. The amount to be distributed is for local decision, but we are encouraging each authority to discuss this issue with its schools forum, with a view to aligning the amounts received by the LEA on the basis of social deprivation with the amounts distributed, and in ways which accurately reflect schools' needs.

Deprivation Indices

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the deprivation indices for shire counties. [96997]

Mr. Miliband: The table lists for all counties the deprivation indicators used in the formula for Education Formula Spending Share. The indicators are: proportion of children for whom English is an additional language (EAL); proportion of children in low achieving ethnic groups; proportion of children of families in receipt of working families tax credit (WFTC); and proportion of children of low birth weight.

Education/Commerce Links

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what initiatives are being undertaken by his Department to develop links between higher education colleges and commerce; and if he will make a statement. [96660]

Margaret Hodge: In order to improve our economic competitiveness, we need to create effective and sustained links between higher education institutions and business. The task for Government is to provide the framework for this to happen and for universities and higher education colleges, businesses and individuals to develop these opportunities. As set out in the recent White Paper, 'The future of higher education' the Government are taking a number of steps to build constructive links between higher education institutions and business.

The effective transfer of knowledge and skills is key to our future success. Through recent initiatives we have already helped institutions to improve knowledge transfer, and this has been shown in indicators such as the number of spin-off companies created, the number of patents filed and the proportion of universities employing specialised staff to support commercial work. We announced in "Investing in Innovation", the Government's strategy for science, engineering and technology, published in July 2002 that the Higher Education Innovation Fund (HEIF) would draw together support for reach out from HE to business and become a permanent third stream of funding worth £90 million a year in 2005–06. As announced in 'the future of higher education' we are providing additional HEIF funding to establish a network of up to 20 Knowledge Exchanges. These will exemplify collaboration with employers, be focused on serving the local and regional economy and form part of a wider network with the New Technology Institutes that will help local companies to use advanced technology.

The Foundation Degree which was introduced in 2001 gave employers a greater role in shaping vocational courses to meet their need for associate professional skills. A major expansion of this work focused degree announced in the HE strategy will further encourage partnership arrangements between employers and higher education institutions in course design, development and implementation. The emergence of new Sector Skills Councils will enable stronger alliances to develop between business in their sectors and the relevant departments in higher education institutions both to develop and market courses and involve employers in the delivery of learning.

However, we also need to ensure that all graduates have the skills to equip them to work in a fast changing work environment. We will continue to sponsor work already under way by HEFCE to integrate the skills and attributes which employers need, into higher education courses.

The Government have commissioned Richard Lambert to carry out an independent review of how, over the coming decade, business can better draw on universities to the mutual advantage of both sectors. We look forward to the findings of the review later this year.

Education Maintenance Allowance

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills which local education authorities are piloting the education maintenance allowance scheme. [95650]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 7 February 2003]: The Education Maintenance Allowance (EMA) scheme is currently being piloted in 56 local education authorities, covering approximately one third of the country. These pilot areas are:

Barking and Dagenham
Barnsley
Birmingham
Bolton
Bradford
Brent
Camden
Cornwall
Coventry
Doncaster
Ealing
East Lancashire[1]
Gateshead
Greenwich
Hackney
Halton
Hammersmith and Fulham
Haringey
Hartlepool
Islington
Kingston upon Hull
Knowsley
Lambeth
Leeds
Leicester City
Lewisham
Liverpool
Luton
Manchester
Middlesbrough
Newham
North East Lincolnshire
North Tyneside
Northumberland
Nottingham
Oldham
Salford

Sheffield
South Tyneside
Southampton
Southwark
St. Helens
Stoke on Trent
Suffolk
Sunderland
Tameside
Tower Hamlets
Wakefield
Walsall
Waltham Forest
Wandsworth
Wigan
Wirral
Wolverhampton
Worcestershire

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of education maintenance allowances is channelled through local education authorities. [96996]

Margaret Hodge: Under the current pilot scheme 100 per cent. of Education Maintenance Allowance is channelled through local education authorities.

Examination Marking

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the (a) criterion-referenced examination marking procedure and (b) norm-referenced examination marking procedure. [97151]

Mr. Miliband: Mike Tomlinson's final report on the inquiry into A level standards found strong support for criterion referenced assessment. The most important thing for any system of examination and assessment is that it produces consistent and accurate grading over time.

Foreign Students

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the number of non-UK, EU resident students who will apply to English universities in (a) 2006, (b) 2007, (c) 2008, (d) 2009 and (e) 2010. [97255]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 11 February 2003]: Projections of applicants to English universities are not available centrally. The Department does, however, project the number of students, EU resident or otherwise, that attend English universities.

The projected number of non-UK, EU resident students attending English institutions from 2003–04 to 2005–06 is shown in the table. These are not very reliable figures because they are based on a number of assumptions, so should be treated with caution. Detailed projections for later years are not available.

Further and Higher Education Colleges

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the colleges of further and higher education in England and Wales indicating the (a) capacity limit figures for each college and (b) actual numbers of (i) full-time and (ii) part-time students for each academic year since 1997–98. [96658]

Margaret Hodge: The Learning and Skills Council (LSC) does not collect capacity information in this form.

The LSC publication 'Summary Statistics' available on the LSC website (http://www.lscdata.gov.uk/data/summarystatistics.html) provides student numbers in further education colleges in England for the most recent year 1999–2000. Prior to the LSC, the Further Education Funding Council (FEFC) published 'Performance Indicators' which provides student numbers in further education colleges in England for the years 1997–98 and 1998–99, this information is also available on the LSC website (http://www.lscdata.gov.uk/data/performanceindicators.html).

Further Education Colleges

Stephen Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to increase the quality of tuition in further education colleges. [95897]

Margaret Hodge: A new Standards Unit within DfES was established in January 2003 to drive the Government's strategy for reforming further education and training—'Success for All'. The Unit will identify, develop and disseminate good practice to improve teaching standards in priority curriculum areas and develop associated teacher training and support. The Unit will also improve standards of teaching and learning and will improve further education teacher training, recruitment and retention and establish a new leadership college for the sector.

Stephen Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to improve (a) teaching standards and (b) results in further education colleges. [95961]

Margaret Hodge: Our comprehensive invest and reform strategy for further education and training "Success for All" was published on 19 November. "Success for All" will dramatically improve teaching standards and results in colleges.

We will invest an additional £1.2 billion in colleges over the next three years. The Learning and Skills Council will undertake Strategic Area Reviews to improve the effectiveness of the network of post-16 provision and will introduce three year funding agreements for colleges based on tough new results targets.

A new Standards Unit within the Department for Education and Skills was set up in January 2003. The Standards Unit will improve standards of teaching and learning and will improve further education teacher training, recruitment and retention and establish a new Leadership College for the sector.

Government Offices for the Regions

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what funds his Department has allocated to the Government Offices for the Regions in (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06, (i) in cash terms and (ii) on a full resource budgeting basis. [96282]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In 2003–04 my Department has allocated £16.8 million to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister towards the funding of Government Offices. For 2004–05 and 2005–06 the funding for Government Offices is included in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's 2002 Spending Review settlement.

I have also agreed to provide an additional £1.4 million in 2003–04, £1.5 million in 2004–05, and £1.7 million in 2005–06 from my Department's 2002 Spending Review settlement, towards the central costs of the Regional Coordination Unit and Government Offices.

These figures are on a resource accounting basis; budgets are no longer allocated on a cash basis.

Graduate Debt

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what measures he is taking to reduce the burden of debt on graduates. [97413]

Margaret Hodge: The Government will continue to meet the costs of fees up to £1,100 for those students whose family income falls below £20,000, and a proportion of that for those whose family income is between £20,000 and £30,000. In addition, from 2004, we are introducing new grants of £1,000 a year, which we intend to go in full to around 30 per cent. of students.

From 2006, under the new Graduate Contribution Scheme, no student or parent will have to pay any fees up-front: students will make repayments after they graduate, and only once they are earning above a certain level. Moreover, from 2005 we are raising the repayment threshold from £10,000 to £15,000. That means that the burden of repayments will be eased, by £450 a year. Graduates will have the option of making extra payments, if they wish to pay off their debt more quickly.

Graduate Earnings

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the average gross earnings per year of students (a) immediately following graduation, (b) five years after graduation, (c) 10 years after graduation, (d) 20 years after graduation and (e) 25 years after graduation for each university and higher education institution. [94701]

Margaret Hodge: Information on annual graduate earnings over a lifetime is not available in the requested format, and estimated lifetime profiles at particular points in time are constrained by limitations of existing datasets.

Annual earnings by age are estimated using gross weekly earnings from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). Estimating annual from weekly earnings is not ideal but the LFS allows us to provide the best available estimate of annual earnings by qualification. Earnings at particular ages are the best proxy we have of what young graduates might earn after various periods in the labour market, assuming that labour market conditions remain stable over time. The estimates should therefore be treated with caution. The table shows the estimated annual average earnings of graduates at various ages. The figures relate to graduates whose highest qualification is a first degree.

Table 1: Estimated annual average earnings of first degree graduates by age band

Age band	Estimated annual earnings (£)
21–24	18,200
25–29	24,440
30–39	33,280
40–49	36,400
50–59	34,320

Notes:

1. Estimates are based on gross weekly earnings in main job, for graduates who are in full-time employment.
2. Annual earnings are derived by multiplying weekly earnings, rounded to the nearest £10, by 52 weeks, and may therefore be upwardly biased.
3. A few individuals who graduated at the age of 20 will be included in the 21–24 age band.

Labour Force Survey, spring 2002, GB

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the relative distribution of the earnings of graduates is, broken down into multiples of £5,000. [94785]

Margaret Hodge: The information is not available directly in the requested format so has been estimated from available data. Annual earnings are estimated using gross weekly earnings from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). Estimating annual from weekly earnings is not ideal but the LFS allows us to provide the best available estimate of annual earnings by qualification. The derived distribution of annual earnings should therefore be treated with caution. The table shows the distribution of estimated annual earnings for all individuals whose highest qualification is a first-degree.

Table 1 Estimated distribution of annual earnings of first degree graduates

Estimated annual earnings (£)	Percentage of graduates
Up to 9,999	2.3
10,000–14,999	9.9
15,000–19,999	18.6
20,000–24,999	17.7
25,000–29,999	14.4
30,000–34,999	10.8
35,000–39,999	7.4
40,000–44,999	6.0
45,000–49,999	3.8
50,000–54,999	1.9
55,000+	7.1
Total	100.0

Note:

Estimates are based on gross weekly earnings in main job, for graduates who are in full-time

The figures are derived from the distribution of weekly equivalent earnings associated with the annual earnings bands, on the assumption that individuals work 52 weeks per year.

Greater London Assembly

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what financial assistance his Department gave to the Greater London Assembly in 2002; and for what projects. [95852]

Mr. Charles Clarke: No financial assistance was given directly to the London Assembly by central government departments in 2002–03.

The London Assembly is part of the Greater London Authority. It is responsible for scrutinising and reviewing the Mayor's exercise of his statutory functions. It has particular power to investigate, and prepare reports on actions and decisions taken by the Mayor or any member of the Greater London Authority. The London Assembly's specific costs are part of the overall Greater London Authority budget which is proposed each year by the mayor and is subject to the Assembly's agreement.

The GLA grants from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister in 2002/03 as reported on the RA02 form are as follows:

Revenue Support Grant £659.641 million

Redistributed Non-Domestic Rate £267.654 million

General GLA Grant £27.950 million

Health and Safety

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills which senior officials within his Department and its agencies take responsibility for health and safety at board or equivalent level; and where their names are publicised. [89503]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: My Department is currently preparing a revised and updated Departmental policy which will incorporate all the best practice recommendations for procedures from the Revitalising H&S initiative. This will be formally offered to our Permanent Secretary for endorsement in the next few weeks. Similarly to many other Departments, this will propose that our Permanent Secretary continues to take overall responsibility for H&S in DfES. At Board level, it will further propose that the Director General for Corporate Services and Development takes specific responsibility for implementation of the Departmental policy and briefing Board colleagues on developments.

Higher Education

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on his plans to raise the proportion of young people in higher education to 50 per cent.; and by when he estimates this target will have been achieved. [93749]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 29 January 2003]: Our long-term vision for strengthening universities and increasing access to higher education was recently announced in our White Paper, "The Future of Higher Education".

The case for expanding higher education is strong, both to meet the economy's need for higher level skills and to realise the potential of individuals. The measures set out in the White Paper will enable us to deliver our Public Service Agreement target of increasing participation in higher education towards 50 per cent. of those aged 18 to 30 by 2010. This will be mainly achieved through expansion of the work focused foundation degree, which is designed to attract many people who do not currently enter higher education.

Progress towards the participation rate is measured by the Initial Entry Rate which sums the percentage of the age group who enter higher education for the first time in each year of age between 18 and 30. Participation is currently 43 per cent.

Our programmes to raise achievement levels in schools and to improve studying on rates in full-time education has and the age of 16 coupled with our programmes to encourage ambition and higher aspirations among more young people will contribute towards meeting our target.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the impact of the Government's proposals for higher education on (a) women, (b) ethnic minorities, (c) single parents, (d) mature students and (e) under-represented groups. [96278]

Margaret Hodge: All the policies set out in the White Paper "The Future of Higher Education" were given careful consideration to ensure that they would create the best higher education system possible, while ensuring equality of opportunity for all groups within society.

We will of course continue to consider the potential impact on the groups that the hon. Gentleman mentioned as we plan the detailed implementation of these policies, and in the light of responses received during the period for comment on the White Paper proposals, which runs until 30 April.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the Government's expenditure plans are for higher education in (a) 2002–03, (b) 2003–04, (c) 2004–05 and (d) 2005–06, (i) in cash terms and (ii) on a full resource budgeting basis. [96279]

Margaret Hodge: The Government's expenditure plans for higher education in England are shown in the table.

	£ million
2002–03	7,596
2003–04	8,309
2004–05	9,057
2005–06	9,918

These figures are taken from the table on page 19 of the White Paper, "The Future of Higher Education" (Cm 5735), and include estimates of funding from the Office of Science and Technology.

The amount of cash that the Department will require to support this resource expenditure is set on a year-by-year basis. The main differences between the resource-based figures above and the in-year cash requirement will relate to the cost of capital and depreciation charges on the administrative capital of the Student Loans Company and the Higher Education Funding Council for England, and to the treatment of student loans. Under resource accounting and budgeting, the costs of issuing such loans takes account of the economic value of all future loan repayments, whereas the cash total will be the payments issued in year (which in 2002–03 amounted to just over £2 billion) without any reflection of the repayments to be received in the future.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the differences between the Summary of the Spending Review Settlement for Higher Education Funding grand total, as announced in the Higher Education White Paper (Command Paper 5735, p19), and total 'publicly planned funding for higher education in England' as stated in his letter to HEFCE detailing Higher Education funding and delivery to 2005–06, dated 22 January 2003. [96285]

Margaret Hodge: The table on page 19 of the White Paper 'The Future of Higher Education' shows the total expenditure on higher education in England. The total publicly planned funding shown in the grant letter to the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) is the expenditure that is paid by the HEFCE to higher education institutions in England and the estimated fee income for home and EU students that those institutions will receive from public and private sources. The main differences between the two totals relate to student support expenditure; funding for research and knowledge transfer from the Office of Science and Technology, estimates of which are included in the totals in the White Paper; and the private contributions towards the costs of tuition which are included in the publicly planned funding total but not in the expenditure table in the White Paper.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what research he has conducted on the proportion of appropriately qualified students who proceed to higher education by social class; and if he will place the results in the Library. [97110]

Margaret Hodge: The Youth Cohort Study (YCS) shows that young people from higher socio-economic groups (SEGs) are twice as likely as those from lower SEGs to enter HE at 18. Participation rates of higher and lower SEGs are not significantly different after A-level attainment is taken into account (see following table).

Youth Cohort Survey—cohort 9 2000

Attainment at A-level is affected by people's aspirations. Aspirations are often formed at a young age and are shaped by a range of cultural, social, institutional and education influences.

In 2001 the Department published "Social Class and Higher Education: Issues Affecting Participation by Lower Social Class groups" by Connor, H. and Dewson, S. with Tyers, C. Eccles, J. Regan, J. and Aston, J. (DfEE Research Report No. 246). This found that for a small sample of qualified non-entrants from lower social classes the main reasons for not entering HE were:

they wanted to get a job and earn some money;

cost issues;

they wanted to take a break from studying; and uncertainties about their ability or commitment to complete a degree course.

In 2002 the Department published "Potential mature student recruitment to HE" by Ross, A. Archer, L. Hutchings, M. Gilchrist, and R. Thomson, D. with John, C. and Akantziliotou, K. (DfES Research Report 385). This found that, among a sample of 16–30 year olds from lower middle and working class backgrounds the propensity to enter HE depends upon qualifications, but is independent of their social class.

Both of the above reports are held on the Department's research publications website, www.dfes.gov.uk/research.

It is important to note that people without A-levels or other formal qualifications may be appropriately qualified to enter higher education on the basis of other experience and abilities that they demonstrate.

Higher Education (Hampshire)

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the rate of participation in higher education of young people in Hampshire was by social class in each year between 1996 and 2002. [94902]

Margaret Hodge: The requested participation rates by social class are not available.

The Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) can provide numbers of young people by social class from Hampshire accepted to full-time undergraduate courses. However, the corresponding Hampshire population breakdowns are not available and participation rates by social class cannot be calculated without them.

Higher Education (Student Costs)

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the average cost per student place in higher education for each university and higher education institution for (a) undergraduate students and (b) post-graduate students in each year since 1980. [94707]

Margaret Hodge: The information requested is not held centrally. The Government allocates funding for higher education in England to the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE). The HEFCE provide teaching grants on the basis that similar courses are funded at similar rates irrespective of the institution providing the education. The detailed allocations are calculated according to the numbers and types of students in the institutions, and the courses they are taking. Different courses are weighted at different levels to reflect, for example, the higher costs of providing laboratory-based and medical courses. There are also adjustments made to the calculations to reflect London weighting, the additional costs of teaching students from disadvantaged backgrounds and mature and part-time students. Average funding per student in institutions will therefore reflect these weightings and adjustments.

Funding for post-graduate research students is also provided through the HEFCE's research funding allocation. The Council allocate funding for research selectively to institutions according to their relative strength in research as measured through the periodic Research Assessment Exercise. The amount of research funding therefore varies widely between institutions.

Institutions receive their teaching and research funding as a block grant and are able to decide how it should be spent.

Hull University

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of students at Hull University he estimates will be eligible for maintenance grant under "The Future of Higher Education White Paper." [94306]

Margaret Hodge: The information requested is not available.

We have not made estimates of the proportion of students who will be eligible for the higher education grant at individual universities. That proportion will depend on the background of applicants to each university. Our intention is that nationally around 30 per cent. of students will benefit from the full grant.

Judicial Review

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills which decisions by his Department were challenged by judicial review in each session since 1997; and in how many cases the (a) Department's decision was upheld by the court, (b) court found for the applicant, (c) Department submitted to the judgment and (d) Department appealed successfully against the decision. [96664]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is contained in a table, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries.

Key Stage 3

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) how many schools in Key Stage 3 pilot local authorities administered the new Year 7 progress tests in English and mathematics that were trialled in 2002; [97765]

(2) what percentage of Year 7 pupils who had achieved level 3 at Key Stage 2 in 2001 achieved level 4 or above in the English and mathematics Year 7 progress tests that were trialled in 2002; [97766]

(3) how many pupils took the new Year 7 progress tests in (a) English and (b) mathematics that were trialled in 2002; [97767]

(4) what was the cost of (a) developing, (b) printing and distributing and (c) marking the Year 7 progress tests in English and mathematics that were trialled in 2002. [97768]

Mr. Miliband: There were 58 schools in Key Stage 3 pilot local authorities who administered the new Year 7 progress tests in English and mathematics that were trialled in 2002.

Level thresholds are not set at this stage of test development. Schools who took part in the trial have only been given an indication of the levels achieved by their pupils. The final level thresholds will not be set for the new progress tests until August 2003.

The trial of the 2003 tests that took place in 2002 was based on 52 schools for mathematics producing an entry of approximately 2400 pupils and 44 schools in English producing an entry of approximately 2100 pupils.

The overall cost of the 2002 trial of the 2003 year 7 progress tests was 21600. These costs include:

Project Management costs of £8950

Printing Costs of £2500

Packaging and distribution costs of 2750

Marking costs of £7400

Development costs are not included as the tests trialled in 2002 did not have a separate or discrete development that can be costed. The costs are therefore part of the overall development costs for the 2003 Year 7 progress tests.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of pupils attained (a) Level 5 and above and (b) Level 6 and above in Key Stage 3 Science in each year from 1999–2001. [97157]

Mr. Miliband: The percentage of pupils who achieved (a) level 5 or above and (b) level 6 or above in Key Stage 3 science in each year from 1999–2001 is shown in the table.

Pupil achievement in Key Stage 3 science

Percentage

	Key Stage 3 science test		Key Stage 3 science teacher assessment
	(a) Level 5 or above	(b) Level 6 or above	(a) Level 5 or above	(b) Level 6 or above
1999	55	24	60	29
2000	59	29	62	30
2001	66	34	64	32

Note:

Figures cover all schools in England.

Liverpool Institute for Performing Arts

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what recent assessment he has made of the work of the Liverpool Institute for Performing Arts. [97088]

Margaret Hodge: The Secretary of State has made no assessment of the Liverpool Institute for Performing Arts, which is not designated to receive funding directly from the Higher Education Funding Council for England. However, the Institute is exploring whether it can be so designated. To this end the Funding Council and the Quality Assurance Agency are working with the Institute to assess its progress towards meeting the criteria for direct funding.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many times since 2001 he has taken flights on departmental duties in the UK; how many of these were (a) charter flights, (b) first or club class and (c) by helicopter; and who accompanied him on each trip. [95396]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have taken one flight to Manchester, one flight to Norwich and a flight to Glasgow; all of these were commercial flights. I was accompanied on the flights to Manchester and Glasgow by one official. My predecessor Estelle Morris did not take any flights in the UK.

All travel is undertaken in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code and Travel by Ministers which are available in the Libraries of the House.

National Curriculum (Support Staff)

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of support staff in National Curriculum teaching. [97153]

Mr Miliband: The Office for Standards in Education (Ofsted) published an evaluation report in April 2002 on the quality and impact of the work of teaching assistants in primary schools. The report reinforced the Government's view that well-trained and well-managed teaching assistants have the potential to help schools raise standards by showing that the quality of teaching in lessons with teaching assistants is better than in lessons without them.

In a survey of headteachers (July 2002) relating to the implementation of the National Literacy and Numeracy Strategies, 89 per cent. said that teaching assistants made a positive contribution to the quality of literacy teaching and the same percentage said that teaching assistants contributed to improving the teaching of mathematics.

OECD PISA Survey

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the position in which the United Kingdom came in the OECD PISA 2001 survey in mathematics. [97001]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The performance of young people from the United Kingdom in the OECD Programme for International Student Assessment (PISA) 2000, published in December 2001, was encouraging. Out of the 32 countries participating in the study, the United Kingdom came eighth on the mathematical literacy scale and was only significantly outperformed by Japan and Korea.

Pre-School Provision

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list for each year since 1997 the percentage of rural parishes with (a) no nursery, (b) no parent and toddler group and (c) no pre-school play group. [91985]

Maria Eagle: The information is not available in the form requested.

Figures on Day Care Facilities in England were published by the DfES in Statistical Bulletin 08/01 "Children's Day Care facilities at 31 March 2001" in October 2001, a copy of which is available from the Library. An electronic copy of this publication is also available on the DfES' web-site: http://www.dfes.gov.uk/statistics

Statistics were collected at top-tier local authority level, not split between urban and rural areas. Local authorities are responsible for ensuring full coverage of both urban and rural areas within their areas.

£22 million has been allocated for a pilot project to develop 50 Mini Sure Start local programmes in areas with pockets of deprivation either in rural areas or in towns and cities that have small numbers of families living in poverty. Managed through local authorities, these Mini Sure Start local programmes are building on new Neighbourhood Nurseries and existing childcare facilities to deliver outreach, family support and additional health services. Of the 50 Mini Sure Start pilots, 29 are in rural areas.

Pupil Funding

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the funding per pupil was for (a) primary, (b) infant, (c) junior and (d) secondary schools in (i) the London borough of Havering, (ii) other London boroughs and (iii) other local education authorities in England in (A) 2001–02 and (B) 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [97700]

Mr. Miliband: The available information is contained in the following table. The Government does not fund pupils in primary, infant and junior schools separately.

Pupil Mobility Grant

Mr. [illegible]ardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he will introduce a targeted local government grant for pupil mobility. [94635]

Mr. Miliband: When we were developing the new LEA funding formula, we looked at whether we should introduce a targeted grant for LEAs with high mobility. However, we found that the problem was surprisingly widespread and it did not therefore seem sensible to introduce a targeted grant which would give a little funding to many authorities. We intend to look further at the question of pupil mobility in the light of data from the Pupil Level Annual Schools Census, with the aim of considering the possible introduction of a relevant factor when the formula freeze on Education Formula Spending ends in 2006–07.

Pupil:Teacher Ratios

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (a) how many pupils there were on school rolls and (b) what the pupil-teacher ratio was in (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools in each local authority area in England and Wales in each academic year from 1997–98. [96627]

Mr. Miliband: The information requested has been placed in the House of Commons library.

For information on Wales I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Welsh Assembly.

School Playing Fields

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many school playing fields disposals have (a) satisfied and (b) have not satisfied the criterion of a net gain for sport. [98114]

Mr. Miliband: Applications to dispose of school playing fields are assessed against three main criteria. These are:

(i) schools' needs: that playing field provision and curriculum requirements at the school making the disposal, and at other schools in the local area, will be met;

(ii) community needs: that community use of school playing fields is taken into account, with alternative facilities made available if necessary; and

(iii) finance: that any sale proceeds are re-invested to provide new or improved sports facilities at schools, or are used otherwise to help raise standards by providing better educational facilities.

The criteria are set out in the Department's Guidance 0580/2001: The Protection of School Playing Fields and Land for City Academies. The School Playing Fields Advisory Panel provides independent advice on the extent to which applications meet the published criteria. Over the past four years the Secretary of State has approved 118 applications to dispose, or change the use, of an area of school playing field larger than a sports pitch (i.e. 2,000 m^2). Of these, 48 were in respect of closed or closing schools and, of the remainder, 45 helped fund improved sports facilities at schools. No application has been approved that did not fully meet all of the criteria.

School Safety

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what improvements have taken place within the system of safety inspections of schools since Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools' statement in December 2001. [94384]

Mr. Miliband: School inspectors are required to consider whether the school monitors health and safety and are expected to report on any hazards that they encounter. They are not, however, health and safety inspectors and do not audit possible health hazards such as the presence of asbestos. The responsibility rests with the head and governing body, and (for community and voluntary controlled schools) the local education authority. While it is impracticable for school inspectors to conduct rigorous health and safety inspections, they are required in every inspection to make a judgment about the extent to which pupils work in a healthy and safe environment.

School Staff

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) how many local authorities have exempted schools from the job evaluation schemes linked to the recent single status agreement for local government staff; [97685]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of schools who use the form of employment contract recommended by the local education authority for the employment of teaching assistants; [97686]

(3) what estimate he has made of the number of (a) men and (b) women who are employed on term-time contracts in schools; [97688]

(4) what estimate he has made of the number of people employed on term-time contracts in schools whose hourly pay over the year places them below the lower earnings limit for national insurance contributions. [97689]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The pay and conditions of school support staff are a matter for local determination. The information requested is not collected centrally.

Schools (Job Evaluation Schemes)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what steps he is taking to review the type and amount of data collected by his Department on term-time working in education; and if he will make a statement. [97687]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 13 February 2003]: National Statistics Strategic Review of school workforce statistics began this month. This review is intended to ensure that official statistics are fit for purpose, of appropriate quality and are valuable. Major stakeholders will be invited to take part in the review and a consultation process will enable other users to provide input. The possibility of collecting data on term-time working will be considered.

Further details about National Statistics Reviews can be found on the National Statistics website at:

Sickness Absence

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the rate of staff (a) absenteeism and (b) sickness was in his Department, its predecessors and each of its agencies and non-departmental public bodies in each year from 1990–91 to 2002–03; what the target set is for his Department; and if he will make a statement. [93501]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: My Department is committed to managing sickness absence effectively and is reviewing the way sickness absence is managed across the Department.

The target for DfES as set out in the Service Delivery Agreement is to reduce sickness absence to 6.0 days per staff year by 2003. The overall sickness absence rate in theDepartment for Education and Skills (DfES) for 2001 was 8.4 days per staff year.

The overall sickness absence rate per staff year in the former Department for Education and Employment (DfEE) and its agency, the Employment Service (ES), for each of the years from 2000 to 1995 was:

Calendar Year	DfEE (excluding ES) (Days)	ES (Days)	DfEE (including ES) (Days)
2000	7.7	11. 8	11. 3
1999	7.6	11.5	11.0
1998	8.9	11. 9	11 .6
1997	9.8	13.0	12.6
1996	10.3	12.1	11.8
1995	10.3	12.4	11.9

The overall sickness absence rate per staff year for the former Employment Department (ED) in 1994 was 10.2 days and for ES, 11.3 days; the rate for the ED Group, which also comprised the Health and Safety Executive and the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service, was 11.0 days. The overall sickness absence rate per staff year for the former Department of Education in 1994 was 8.2 days.

The information is taken from the report "Analysis of Sickness Absence in the Civil Service", which is published annually by Cabinet Office. The figures for 2002 will be announced in due course; figures prior to 1994 are no longer readily available.

Non- Departmental Public Bodies

The overall sickness absence rates per staff year in the years in question for each of the non-Departmental Public Bodies (NDPBs) attached to DfES, where they are applicable and available, are set out in tables 1 and 2 following.

Calendar Year	Construction Industry Training Board (Days)	Engineering Construction Industry Training Board (Days)	National College for School Leadership (Days)	Higher Education Funding Council for England (Days)	Investors in People UK (Days)
2002	10.5	7.7	4.9	1.8	3.5
2001	8.6	6.5	2.1	3.5	6.0
2000	6.5			2.1	4.3
1999	6.2			2.1	2.0
1998	6.1			6.3
1997				8.4
1996				8.2
1995				5.1
1994				6.1
1993				6.1

Financial Year	Adult Learning Inspectorate (Days)	Qualifications and Curriculum Authority (Days)	Student Loans Company (Days)	Teacher Training Agency (Days)	British Educational Communication on and Technology Agency (Days)	Learning and Skills Council (Days)
2001/02	6.5	7.4	11.2	7.4	5.6	7.0
2000/01		8.4	12.0	5.4	4.8
1999/00		7.4	10.8	6.7	10.3
1998/99		7.4	12.2		4.3
1997/98		6.0	10.8		5.8
1996/97			8.1		10.6
1995/96			7.7		10.0
1994/95					8.5

The information in tables 1 and 2 has been provided by the NDPBs. Information on absenteeism is not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Standard Spending Assessment

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the education SSA per head is in secondary schools in (a) Bournemouth, (b) Poole, (c) Southampton, (d) Brighton, (e) Hampshire, (f) Dorset, (g) Wiltshire and (h) Sussex. [97786]

Mr. Miliband: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) on 8 January, Official Report, columns. 231–33W.

Student Debt

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what provision will be made under his proposals for higher education funding, regarding students who are unable to realise a working income sufficient to pay off the debt incurred as part of study fees because of (a) medical incapacity and (b) other reasons; and if he will make a statement. [93630]

Margaret Hodge: There are already appropriate arrangements in place under the current income-contingent repayment scheme. Repayment of a student's loan will be cancelled: when they reach the age of 65; if they are unable to work due to permanent disability; or when they die. Any graduate with a loan whose income is below the threshold at which repayments begin, currently £10,000 but rising to £15,000 in April 2005, will not be required to make repayments. This approach is both fair and equitable, and will continue when loans for deferred tuition fees are introduced in 2006–07.

Teachers

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teachers retired in 2001–02. [96743]

Mr. Miliband: In 2001–02 financial year, 9,950 teachers retired from the maintained schools sector in England. Further details can be found in the recently published 2002 edition of "Statistics of Education: Schools Workforce in England". This is available now in the statistical section of the DfES website and will soon be placed in the House Library.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) secondary and (b) primary school teachers were newly employed by each local education authority in England and Wales on (i) permanent and (ii) short-term temporary contracts in each academic year since 1997–98. [96699]

Mr. Miliband: Information is not available in the form requested. The table showing new entrants[1] to full-time or part-time[2] teaching in the maintained schools sector, in England by local education authority has been placed in the Library. Teachers providing short-term supply cover are not included.

The National Assembly for Wales is responsible for the supply of teachers in Wales.

[1] Those in service at the end of the period shown who had no known service in the maintained schools sector before that period. Includes newly qualified entrants and those who deferred entry.

[2] Around 10 to 20 per cent. of part-timers may not be included.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teachers are affected by the cancellation of the early retirement option broken down by age and LEA; and if he will make a statement. [93786]

Mr. Miliband: Early retirement continues to be available to teachers over the age of 50 where their employment has been terminated by their employer and their employer has agreed to meet the associated additional pension costs. In addition, teachers over the age of 55 are able to retire voluntarily with pension benefits that have been actuarially reduced to take account of their early payment. In 2001–02, for example, some 3,500 teachers retired early through these routes.

Teacher (Suffolk)

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teacher vacancies there were in Suffolk in each year since 1997. [97387]

Mr. Miliband: The information is shown in the following table.

January	Teachers[1]	Vacancies[2]	Vacancy rate[3] (percentage)
1997	4,790	36	0.8
1998	4,860	25	0.5
1999	4,880	38	0.8
2000	4,870	23	0.5
2001	4,840	89	1.8
2002	4,850	84	1.7

[1] Full-time teachers in post in the maintained schools sector.

[2] Advertised vacancies for full-time permanent appointments (or appointments of at least one term's duration) in maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special schools. Includes vacancies being filled on a temporary basis.

[3] Vacancies as a percentage of teachers in post.

Teachers (East Riding)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teachers entered into (a) full-time and (b) part-time service in maintained schools in the East Riding of Yorkshire in each year since 1997. [97739]

Mr. Miliband: The information is given in the following table.

	1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998		1 April 1998 to 31 March 1999		1 April 1999 to 31 March 2000[1]
	Full-time	Part-time[2]	Full-time	Part-time[2]	Full-time	Part-time[2]
New entrants[3]	15	15	20	10	15	10
Returner to maintained sector[4]	10	15	20	20	20	25
Moved from other LEA in England[5]	—	5	—	—	5	0

[1] The most recent data available at LEA level.

[2] The database of teacher records is maintained for pension purposes. Some part-time non-pensionable service is not recorded, as a result around 10 per cent. to 20 per cent. of part-timers may not be included.

[3] Those in service at the end of the period shown who had no known service in the maintained schools sector before that period. Includes newly qualified entrants and those who deferred entry.

[4] Teacher has returned to service in the maintained schools sector.

[5] Teacher has moved from service in the maintained schools sector elsewhere in England.

Top-up Fees

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what representations his Department has received from (a) higher education institutions and (b) student bodies (i) in favour and (ii) against the introduction of top up fees. [96701]

Margaret Hodge: The Department has received a number of representations from a variety of sources on the question of university fees. Representations before the publication of the White Paper were not, of course, set in the context of our full proposals, including the ability of students to defer fees rather than pay them up front, the continuation of fee remission grant, the introduction of a new additional grant, and the role of the Access Regulator.

Following the launch of the White Paper—"The Future of Higher Education"—we are engaging in a wide-ranging dialogue with those who provide higher education and those who benefit from it. The period for comment will run until 30 April 2003. Following the conclusion of this period, we shall make available a summary of comments on the Department for Education and Skills website.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what he estimates the annual costs of deferred tuition fees will be to his Department, once they are introduced in 2006. [96276]

Margaret Hodge: The costs of offering students the option to defer their tuition fees will depend on the proportion of those students who decide to defer payment of fees, which institutions decide to charge variable fees, at what level and for which courses, and the number of students taking those courses.

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what mechanisms his Department will put in place to recover debt from non-UK EU-resident students under the post-2006 university tuitions fee arrangements; and if he will make a statement; [97253]

(2) what estimate he has made of the likely default rate on tuition fee payments from non-UK, EU-resident students from 2006 onwards; and if he will make a statement. [97254]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 11 February 2003]: Non-UK EU students are not eligible for maintenance loans. Mechanisms are in place to recover loans from UK students who live abroad after graduation, and who are outside the UK tax system, through direct payments to the Student Loans Company. The arrangements for collecting varied fees from EU graduates will be based on these arrangements.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the cost to Government of abolishing tuition fees in higher education. [93911]

Margaret Hodge: For 2002–03, the standard tuition fee contribution for full-time home and EU students of £1,100 is estimated to raise around £853 million for English institutions and around £57 million for Welsh institutions. The contribution made from public and private resources towards these totals is as follows.

£ millions

2002–03 estimate	England	Wales
Public contributions to fees	447	30
Private contributions towards the cost of tuition	406	27
Total	853	57

Note:

Private contributions to tuition fees have been estimated from 2000–01 LEA income assessment data and assumed growth rates in annual earnings.

Estimates are based on projections of student numbers derived from actual data for academic year 2000–01. The figures for Wales exclude initial teacher training.

If the Government were to abolish tuition fees, the extra cost to the public purse would be the loss of private contribution towards the cost of tuition.

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what recent estimate he has made of the cost of providing all students with free tuition at university. [94752]

Margaret Hodge: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) on 20 February 2003.

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what level of support students receive in (a) Scotland, (b) Wales and (c) other EU countries. [94756]

Margaret Hodge: Financial support for students in Scotland is the responsibility of the First Minister for Scotland. Financial support for students in Wales is broadly the same as in England, except that the Welsh Assembly has introduced additional Assembly Learning Grants of up to £1,500 for Welsh-domiciled students on low incomes. About a quarter of Welsh HE students are expected to qualify for some or all of this grant.

The Department does not have up to date information about arrangements in all EU countries. However, the level of public spending on financial support for students in the UK as a percentage of total public expenditure on higher education is the highest in the OECD, including many EU countries.

University Applications

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimates he has made of the number of students applying to attend university in each of the next three years. [97412]

Margaret Hodge: Estimates of the number of students applying to attend university are not available centrally. However, the Department does make estimates of the number of students likely to attend English universities.

The projected number of UK and EU domiciled students attending English universities from 2003–04 to 2005–06, as set out in the Secretary of State's Grant Letter to the Higher Education Funding Council for England, is as follows.

Fundable full-time equivalents (FTEs) in English institutions[1]

Financial year	FTEs (000s)
2003–04	1,115
2004–05	1,134
2005–06	1,157

University Grants

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the number of students able to claim grants for university in (a) Lancashire and (b) Chorley for the next three years. [97409]

Margaret Hodge: My Department collects data from local education authorities (LEAs) on the number of students domiciled in their area, studying in the UK and claiming grants by means of an annual and retrospective survey. Information is not available below LEA level or for future years at present and it will not be available for future years.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to increase the threshold on eligibility to apply for university grants. [97410]

Margaret Hodge: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones) on 6 February 2003, Official Report, column 358W

University Redundancies

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many staff have been made redundant at each university in the UK since January 2002. [96579]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 7 February 2003]: The requested information is not held centrally.

Vehicle Fleets

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the annual rate is at which his Department has renewed its vehicle fleet, by (a) volume and (b) percentage for each (i) category of vehicle, (ii) type of power unit and (iii) type of fuel over the last three years. [96453]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: My Department has a vehicle fleet of approximately 58 vehicles but information in the format requested is currently not available.

TREASURY

Bank of Credit and Commerce International

Harry Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will reassess with a view to publication, the parts of the Official Report into the affairs of BCCI that were excluded from public disclosure, with particular reference to information linking BCCI with organisations now known to conduct terrorism. [97082]

Ruth Kelly: Paragraph 2.538 of the Bingham Inquiry's report (Inquiry into the Supervision of The Bank of Credit and Commerce International, House of Commons Paper 198, 22 October 1992) says

> "Having made detailed enquiry of all the intelligence agencies, the Inquiry has found no evidence to suggest that the management of BCCI at any level above that of branch manager knowingly held or handled accounts of the Abu Nidal organisation or its front companies or any other terrorist organisation at any time."

We have no plans to publish further material from the Bingham Inquiry.

Harry Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has had access to (a) all intelligence reports relevant to the official report on BCCI and (b) those intelligence reports that were supplementary to the BCCI report at around the time of its official publication; whether he has availed himself of that access; and if he will make a statement. [98160]

Ruth Kelly: It would not be appropriate to provide this information about access to intelligence material, as provided for under exemption 1(a) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Wages

Helen Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information his Department collects on wage rates in each parliamentary constituency or borough; and from what sources such information is collected. [97657]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Helen Jones, dated 18 February 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your question about information collected on wage rates in each parliamentary constituency, and the sources of such information (97657).

The Office for National Statistics (ONS) obtains average earnings data for paliamentary constituencies from the New Earnings Survey (NES).

The NES is an annual enquiry sent to employers. It asks for information about the earnings and hours of a sample of employees, selected by National Insurance number. Data for parliamentary constituencies are published on the ONS website. The link below will take you to the latest data.

http://www.statistics.gov.uk/downloads/theme-labour/NES2002-Analyses-By-Region/NES2002-Analyses-by-region.pdf.

Helen Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of individuals in Warrington, North who earn (a) up to £10,000 per annum, (b) between £10,000 and £20,000 per annum and (c) between £20,000 and £30,000 per annum. [97658]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Helen Jones, dated 18 February 2003:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question on earnings in Warrington North. (97658)

The New Earnings Survey for April 2002 provides an estimate of the percentage of full-time adult employees in employment who were in the same job as in April 2001, whose gross annual pay in the tax year ending April 2002 was within the specified bands. This information is given in the table below.

Percentage of employees in employment[1] in Warrington North[2] earning a specified amount in April 2002

Gross annual earnings	Percentage[3]
Less than £10,000	4
£10,000 to £20,000	63
More than £20,000	32

Notes:

Full-time adult employees who were in the same job a year previously.

Based on the work-place post-code of the employee.

The figures in the table do not sum to 100, as a result of rounding.

Card Transactions

Brian Cotter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent estimate he has made of the cost of bank charges to retailers for credit and debit card transactions. [96651]

Ruth Kelly [holding answer 10 February 2003]: The Cruickshank report on Competition in UK Banking (published in March 2000) examined, among other things, issues relating to payment systems—including the cost of bank charges to retailers for credit and debit card transactions. The Government has not made any recent estimates of such charges. However, it is closely monitoring developments in payment systems and remains committed to introducing legislation to give the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) new powers to promote effective competition in payment systems—and will do so as soon as parliamentary time allows.

To promote its understanding of how payment systems operate, and to help pave the way for its prospective powers, the OFT announced on 27 November that it would conduct an empirical study into recent payment system developments. The terms of reference of this study were published on 31 January 2003—and include issues related to pricing in the credit and debit card markets. The OFT has undertaken to publish a report outlining its assessment and conclusions in spring 2003.

Computer Fraud

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft his Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside his Department. [97566]

Ruth Kelly: Recorded cases for each type were as follows:

Type	HMT	IR	C&E	Total
External hacking	1	0	0	1
Internal hacking	0	0	0	0
Fraud	0	2	0	2
Theft	3	75	34	112

All the above incidents were investigated and reported to the Government's Unified Incident Reporting and Alert Scheme (UNIRAS).

Corporate Reporting

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what discussions officials from his Department have had with representatives of (a) the Association of Chartered Certified Accountants, (b) the European Federation of Accountants and Auditors and (c) the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales concerning proposals for quarterly corporate reporting; [96396]

(2) what recent discussions officials from his Department have had with officials from the European Union on proposals for quarterly corporate reporting. [96425]

Ruth Kelly: Treasury officials have raised the issue of quarterly reporting with European Commission officials in the context of a draft proposal for a directive on the transparency obligations of companies with securities traded on regulated markets in the European Union.

Treasury officials have informally consulted a wide range of representatives of the business community on this draft proposal for a directive, and will continue to do so. These discussions have not involved the three organisations to which the question refers, although it is intended that consultation will be broadened to include, for example, representatives of the accountancy and auditing professions.

Corporation Tax

Adam Price: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of all taxes on income paid by households and business was accounted for by corporation tax in 1998. [97249]

Mr. Boateng: Figures for corporation tax and taxes on income and wealth for 1998 are available in the National Statistics publication Financial Statistics, in Table 2.1C and Table 14.6B respectively.

Data Access Powers

Harry Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether (a) the Inland Revenue and (b) Customs and Excise may gain access to communications data using powers other than those specified in the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2002 and the Interception of Communications Act 1985. [95615]

Dawn Primarolo: The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act (RIPA) 2000 repealed the Interception of Communications Act 1985.

(a) It is anticipated that regulations to be laid by the Home Office later this year under the RIPA 2000 will give the Inland Revenue access to some communications data covered by the Act. Thereafter, it is expected that any access to communications data from communications service providers will be through the powers specified. The Inland Revenue have more general powers to require the production of information under the Taxes Management Act 1970.

(b) It would be normal for HM Customs and Excise to use the provisions specified in the RIPA 2000 to access communications data in all cases whenever and wherever appropriate. However, in certain cases, normally arrest situations, they will use other primary legislation—PCEA, DTA and VAT Act—to access stored data such as voice mail but this would only be in a very small number of cases and in accordance with Section 1 (5)(c) of the RIPA Part 1, Chapter 1.

E-mail Addresses

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what e-mail address members of the public may contact (a) him and (b) each of the Ministers in his Department; and for each e-mail address if he will state (i) the date it became active and (ii) the number of e-mails received in each month since activation. [97468]

Dawn Primarolo: Members of the public may e-mail Treasury Ministers at: ministers@hm-treasury.gov.uk The address was set up in 1999. Information on the number of e-mails received is available only from October 2002, and is as follows:

Month	Number of e-mails received
October 2002	792
November 2002	366
December 2002	266
January 2003	127

Greater London Assembly

Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what financial assistance his Department gave to the Greater London Assembly in 2002; and for what projects. [95848]

Mr. Boateng: No financial assistance was given directly to the London Assembly by central Government Departments in 2002–03.

Income Tax

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 22 January, Official Report, column 412W, on income tax, if he will provide comparable figures on the amount of income tax paid according to (a) gender and (b) 10-year age bands for each year from 1992–93 to 1999–2000. [96785]

Dawn Primarolo: Amounts of income tax liabilities broken down by gender and 10-year age bands in 1994–95 to 1999–2000 are in the tables. Reliable estimates for the earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Investment Ombudsman

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many complaints have been received in the past year by the Investment Ombudsman; how many have been upheld; and what the terms of reference are of the Ombudsman. [98006]

Ruth Kelly: The Office of the Investment Ombudsman became a part of the Financial Ombudsman Service on 1 December 2001. The Financial Ombudsman Service replaced the eight separate complaint-handling schemes that existed before for financial services disputes.

Page 14 of the Annual Report by the Financial Ombudsman Service for the year 2001–02, published in June 2002, gives an analysis of the different categories of complaints received by them. Page 16 gives an analysis of the outcomes of cases considered by them in 2002–02.

The Financial Ombudsman Service's terms of reference form a part of the Complaints Sourcebook, contained in the Financial Service Authority's Handbook of rules and guidance. Chapter 2 sets out the Ombudsman's jurisdiction, Chapter 3 sets out the Ombudsman's complaint handling procedures and Chapter 4 contains the standard terms for the Ombudsman's voluntary jurisdiction. The Complaints Sourcebook is available in HTML format on FSA's website at the following address: http://www.fsa.gov.uk/vhb/html/disp/DISPtoc.html

Iraq

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to initiate research into the cost of a possible conflict with Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [91196]

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what provision he has made for financing an attack on Iraq. [92976]

Mr. Boateng: No decision on military action in Iraq has been taken. We still await the outcome of the weapon inspection process under UN Security Council Resolution 1441.

However, the Chancellor announced a contingency reserve of £1 billion in the Pre-Budget Report to help meet our international defence responsibilities. The Ministry of Defence has been drawing down this amount to meet the cost of preparation. The Chancellor has now announced an additional three-quarters of a billion to be made available in this financial year for further commitments should this prove necessary.

Money Laundering

Harry Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has received the French parliamentary report The City of London, Gibraltar and the Crown Dependencies: offshore centres, sanctuaries for dirty money; and if he will make a statement. [97081]

Mr. Boateng: The 'Montebourg Report' of October 1991 made a number of unfounded allegations without supporting evidence about terrorist money laundering in the City of London, Gibraltar and the Crown Dependencies. These claims were refuted at the time of publication by the UK Government and by the authorities of Gibraltar and the Crown Dependencies. The UK has stringent laws to combat money laundering and the financing of terrorism. The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 further enhances controls and the Financial Services Authority takes vigorous action to enforce these controls. It is also the policy of Gibraltar and the Crown Dependencies to take the firmest measures to combat money laundering and terrorist financing.

Partnerships UK

Norman Lamb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the nature is of the employment arrangements of John Yard and John Gray in respect of their work for PUK; whether John Yard and John Gray remain employed by the Inland Revenue; what work John Yard and John Gray are undertaking within PUK; and what the financial arrangements are between PUK and the Inland Revenue with regard to the work of John Yard and John Gray. [95088]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 3 February 2003]: John Yard and John Gray are both employees of the Inland Revenue. John Yard is Director of Business Services. He has never worked for Partnerships UK. John Gray is on secondment to Partnerships UK until April 2004.

In accordance with the normal Civil Service rules governing such secondments, Partnerships UK reimburses the Inland Revenue for the full cost of John Gray's salary, NIC and superannuation costs. Under these arrangements, secondees remain contractually subject both to the Official Secrets Act, and the special obligation imposed on officers of the Inland Revenue to safeguard the confidentiality of information. Section 6 Taxes Management Act 1970, and Section 182 Finance Act 1989.

Statistics

Ms Buck: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the official statistics published in the past five years by the Office for National Statistics which have been amended, stating the reasons in each case. [97197]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Ms Karen Buck dated 18 February 2003:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question on official statistics published by the Office for National Statistics.

Official statistics are revised on a frequent and widespread basis, and for a variety of reasons including more complete and/or better source information, seasonal adjustment changes, rebasing and changes to the underlying administrative system. To catalogue every instance in the past five years would incur disproportionate costs.

National Statistics policy on revisions will be made available n the Protocol on Revisions which will shortly be published for public consultation.

Student Fees

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what amount it would be necessary to increase the standard rate of income tax (a) if student fees were paid out of general taxation and (b) if all fees and maintenance were paid out of general taxation. [94013]

Dawn Primarolo: Estimates of student and public contributions to fees in the financial year 2002–03 can be found on the HEFCE website at: www.hefce.ac.uk/news/hefce/2003/paper. DFES expect to pay £2.3 billion to the Student Loans Company to support student loans and hardship loans. Estimates of the effects of illustrative changes in taxation, including income tax, can be found in table 4 of the "Tax ready reckoner and tax reliefs", published in November 2002, which is available in the Library.

Terrorism

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much money has been (a) seized and (b) frozen under anti-terrorist legislation since 11 September 2001. [96423]

Ruth Kelly: Assets seized under anti-terrorist legislation are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Following 11 September 2001, £10,230,810 was frozen under Orders applying United Nations Security Council Resolutions 1267 and 1333 which froze accounts to prevent use by, inter alia, the then Taliban Government of Afghanistan. Subsequently, the Al-Qaeda and Taliban (United Nations Measures) Order 2002 implemented United Nations Security Council Resolution 1390 and, as well as allowing for the release of funds belonging to the legitimate Afghan Government, provided for the continued freezing of accounts belonging to Al-Qaeda.

Amounts totalling £346,382 remain frozen under the Orders implementing United Nations Security Council Resolutions 1373 and 1390.

Unpaid Tax

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 422W, on unpaid tax, if he will estimate the total unpaid tax, broken down by each major category, for 2000–01; and if he will make a statement. [94615]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 3 February 2003]: The Inland Revenue's accounting year for tax runs to the end of October each year. Over the last eight years, the amounts of tax unpaid at that date have approximately halved as a proportion of the tax collected during the year.

The figures for October 2001 were:

Inland Revenue	£ million
Income Tax other than PAYE	2,348.7
Corporation Tax[1]	566.6
Other (Capital Gains Tax and Petroleum Revenue Tax)	33.6
Total	2,948.9

[1] This figure includes an estimate for the amount of unpaid self assessed corporation tax

These figures for uncollected tax represent net tax charged but not paid as at the accounting date, and are a snapshot of the position at the date of the account. Most of the tax uncollected at the balance of each account is subsequently collected, and most of the amount outstanding attracts an interest charge.

Working Families Tax Credit

Caroline Flint: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to allow parents to claim under working families tax credit for extra costs to child care when the extra costs run for less than four consecutive weeks. [95864]

Dawn Primarolo: The child care tax credit within the working families tax credit provides support to families for the costs of registered or approved child care. Once an award of working families tax credit is made, it cannot be adjusted to reflect changes in the claimant's child care costs. However, from April 2003, working families tax credit is replaced by the new child tax credit and working tax credit. The working tax credit includes a child care element which provides more flexible support for the costs of child care. In particular, the child care element of working tax credit can be adjusted to reflect significant changes in average weekly child care costs.

In response to concerns raised with me by parents paying child care costs weekly, who may have short increases in child care costs during the school holidays, we will shortly bring forward regulations making a minor change to the system to allow parents to take account of changes in costs lasting less than four weeks. This will allow parents with fluctuating child care costs to have their tax credit based on their average child care costs, including any short-term fluctuations. It is our intention to produce this addition to the rules in good time for the start of the new tax credits system in April 2003. The Inland Revenue will issue clear guidance for parents and child care providers on how the system will work from April 2003.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Pension Provision (Women)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what assessment she has made of the adequacy of pension provision for women. [97718]

Mr. McCartney: The Green Paper takes a comprehensive look at the issue of women, work and pensions.

It recognises that it is often harder for women to build up state and private pensions rights than it is for men. This is because of a combination of factors including shorter working lives, lower pay and lower occupational pensions coverage among part-time workers. The Green Paper also recognises that the current generation of female pensioners are over represented in those groups of pensioners with low incomes.

We have already taken action to address these issues.

The introduction of the State Second Pension, from April 2002 provides extra help to those on low or moderate earnings, to certain carers and to certain people with long-term illness and disability.

The Government have enabled some low paid workers to get national insurance benefits without paying contributions. From April 2000, the start point of national insurance contributions was separated from the lower earnings limit (LEL) for employees and aligned with the personal allowance for income tax. From April 2002–03, national insurance contributions only become payable on earnings from £89 a week whereas entitlement to national insurance benefits start accruing at £75 a week. This has benefited around half a million women.

The Government have also already taken action to support the labour market position of women through, for example, the introduction of the national minimum wage and additional investment in child care.

And many current female pensioners should benefit from the introduction of the pension credit in October 2003. Just over half of those entitled to the pension credit are single women. Two-thirds of those entitled to the pension credit will be women, and half of these women will be aged 75 or over.

Finally, we are engaging in a wide-ranging consultation on proposals made within the Green Paper. In this document, we state our commitment to providing pensions information for everyone, but we recognise that this is particularly important for women.

Pensioners

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate the combined deduction of taxation and pensions credit for an extra £1 of income to a pensioner paying tax and receiving pensions credit. [90660]

Mr. McCartney: The combined deduction of taxation and pension credit for an extra £1 of income will depend on the individual characteristics of the person, such as age, family status, eligibility for additional amounts and income level.

The table shows an example of the deductions for a single person receiving pension credit and paying income tax, according to their gross income and age, assuming no additional amounts in payment.

Deduction of tax and pension credit for a single person paying tax and receiving Pension Credit [with no additional amounts].

Age	Gross income (£ per week)	Deduction per £1	Net increase in income per £1	Description
60–64	88.75–103.60	1.00	0.00	Pension credit [guarantee only] + 10 per cent. tax
65–74	127.10–140.40	0.46	0.54	Pension credit [savings credit]+ 10 per cent. tax
75+	129.25–140.20	0.46	0.54	Pension credit [savings credit] + 10 per cent. tax

Notes:

Calculations are for 2003–04 benefit and tax rates.

The personal tax allowances are consistent with announcements made in the Pre-Budget Report 2002. Income tax bands have not yet been announced. For the purposes of this PQ they have been assumed to increase in line with normal indexation.

Gross Income bands are defined using a 52-week year and then rounded to the nearest 5 pence.

Taxation is defined as income tax only and excludes National Insurance contributions, which people below state pension age may pay.

The effect of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit is not included.

The deductions and gross income bands may vary for people with entitlement to additional amounts in Pension Credit.

Pension Credit entitlement is calculated according to post tax income.

The guarantee within pension credit will be £102.10 for a single person in 2003–04 in net income terms.

For single people, only those in the above income bands and age groups will be eligible for pension credit and be liable to pay income tax.

Benefit Payment

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners collect benefits from post offices in (a) Haltemprice and Howden and (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire. [96707]

Malcolm Wicks: The number of pensioners as at 28 December 2002 in the constituency of Haltemprice and Howden and the East Riding of Yorkshire receiving their benefits by a method of payment collectable at a post office is shown in the table. Included in these figures are customers paid by giro cheque. Giro cheques are encashable either at a post office, or they can be paid into a bank or building society account.

	Number of pensioners
Haltemprice and Howden	9,107
East Riding of Yorkshire	37,916

Some customers who are paid direct into an account can also collect their benefit in cash at post offices through network banking arrangements at the Post Office. There is no data available on the number of benefit claims collected in this way.

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners have migrated from over-the-counter benefit payments to direct bank transfer in (a) Haltemprice and Howden and (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire. [96708]

Malcolm Wicks: The number of pensioners receiving DWP benefits (including War Pensions) who have migrated from payments collectable at the post office to payments direct into a bank or building society account is 43 in Haltemprice and Howden, and 159 in the East Riding of Yorkshire. The figures are as at 28 December 2002 compared with the same records from four weeks earlier.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what his estimate is of the cost of the minimum income guarantee and pension credit for each year from 1997–98 to 2004–05 (planned). [97365]

Mr. McCartney: The information is shown in the table below:

	Cash terms £ million	Real Terms (02/03 prices) £ million
1997/98 out turn	3,773	4,249
1998/99 out turn	3,619	3,967
1999/00 out turn	3,781	4,046
2000/01 out turn	4,095	4,288
2001/02 estimated out turn[1]	4,486	4,598
2002/03 plans	4,470	4,470
2003/04 plans[2]	5,287	5,171
2004/05 plans	6,231	5,945

Notes:

All estimates are consistent with the PBR2002 forecasts

[1] Expenditure for 2001/02 reflects the latest estimate of out turn for the year and not the amounts voted by Parliament.

[2] Pension Credit is introduced in October 2003.

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what percentage of pensioners collected benefits from post offices in the parliamentary constituency of Bury St. Edmunds. [97390]

Malcolm Wicks: The percentage of pensioners receiving DWP benefits (including war pensions) collectable at post offices in the Bury St. Edmunds constituency was 48 per cent. of all pensioners as at 28 December 2002. This figure includes benefits paid by giro cheque which can also be paid into a bank or building society account.

Benefit Take-up

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) how many pensioners in the London Borough of Southwark claim (a) the minimum income guarantee and (b) attendance allowance; and if he will make a statement; [96844]

(2) what the average take-up rate is of (a) the minimum income guarantee and (b) attendance allowance, expressed as a percentage; and if he will make a statement; [96845]

(3) what arrangements are in place between his Department and partner organisations to increase take-up of (a) the minimum income guarantee and (b) attendance allowance in the London Borough of Southwark; and if he will make a statement. [96847]

Mr. McCartney: In August 2002, there were approximately 7,900 customers receiving the minimum income guarantee in the London Borough of Southwark and approximately 3,200 receiving attendance allowance.

The information regarding the average take-up rate of minimum income guarantee for 1999–2000, the latest financial year for which estimates are available, can be found in the DWP publication, "Income Related Benefits Estimates of Take-Up in 1999–2000". A copy is placed in the Library.

The next edition of the report containing estimates for 2000–01 will be released on 27 March 2003.

Our fundamental priority is to put money in the pockets of pensioners who need it. The MIG take up campaign has put an average £20 a week extra in the pockets of 144,000 elderly people who would not have received it otherwise. These people would have lost out so the campaign undoubtedly achieved value for money.

Because the MIG is more generous and the limits on capital have been increased, there has been a natural increase in the number of people who could claim. Our overall policy is, and will continue to be, that we will get as many eligible pensioners as possible to claim their entitlement to the MIG.

Pension credit will be introduced in October 2003 and we have developed a strategy to ensure maximum take-up.

First, we will transfer existing MIG recipients to pension credit ready for payments to be made from October 2003;

Second, we will run mass advertising (TV and Press) from September 2003 to launch pension credit and advise pensioners and their friends and family of how The Pension Service and partner organisations can support them to consider and take-up entitlement;

Third, we will write to all pensioners not already receiving MIG over the take-on period (through to October 2004) to help them consider any entitlement to pension credit and encourage those likely to be eligible to apply; and

Fourth, we will work with local partners to help support the communications to pensioners, and tailor marketing and communications activity accordingly.

We will review the take-up position during autumn 2004 and take any further action that may be necessary.

The DWP set up the Partnerships against Poverty Forum for England and Wales as a working group in 2001 with the Local Government Association and voluntary organisations to develop joint working to improve take-up of minimum income guarantee.

The group has, on a national basis, identified and developed a number of initiatives to improve access to entitlements and for the take-up of MIG by older people. The group has been instrumental in helping to develop products such as the shorter minimum income guarantee (MIG) claim form, the new MIG leaflet and the "At a Glance" and "Good Practice Guides", which all support the take-up of benefit entitlements. It also regularly reviews new and revised leaflets and has provided invaluable feedback into the training packages developed by The Pension Service local service.

The Partnership Against Poverty members quickly recognised that the issues that adversely impact the take-up of entitlements by black and minority ethnic (BME) elders needed to be addressed separately. To support this, a sub-group was established.

One of the first tasks of the group was to commission research into the barriers to look specifically at the problems faced by black and minority ethnic elder communities. The research will be qualitative and based around seven case studies looking at different groups. One of these is looking at the black African communities in Southwark.

Take-up is encouraged through local services via their drop-in surgeries in Southwark. These take place frequently in partnership with local groups and organisations. These are Peckham One Stop, Black Elderly Group of Southwark, South Asian Elderly Organisation, Blackfriars Settlement and at the Surrey Quays Shopping Centre.

In terms of attendance allowance, it is not possible to be precise about the number of pensioners who might be entitled if they claimed it. This is because entitlement to AA is determined on the customer's specific circumstances, which can only be determined after a claim has been made. Up-to-date estimates of the take up of AA and disability living allowance are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Sutton Disability Benefits Centre undertakes a number of targeted local activities to promote awareness of AA in the area it serves, which includes the London Borough of Southwark. This includes training and awareness sessions for Pension Service staff and external organisations.

Notes on the minimum income guarantee figure:

1. Based on a 5 per cent. sample, therefore subject to sampling variation.

2. Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred and are expressed in thousands.

3. MIG claimants are defined as any live income support benefit unit where the claimant and/or partner are aged 60 and over.

4. Local authority is assigned by matching postcodes against the relevant ONS postcode directory.

Benefit Uprating

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions for what reason benefits are uprated by (a) RPI and (b) the Rossi index. [97681]

Mr. McCartney [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The levels of all benefits and their components are reviewed annually. Contributory benefits and non-contributory benefits are uprated by the Retail Prices Index to meet the statutory requirement to increase them in relation to the general level of prices. Income-related benefits are uprated by the Rossi index which is based on the Retail Prices Index less housing costs. This index most clearly reflects the cost of living increases for recipients of income-related benefits since housing costs are separately provided for, for example by Housing Benefit for rent. Uprating benefits in line with prices maintains their value in real terms.

Child Support Agency

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many CSA cases were referred to the Independent Case Examiner in (a) Haltemprice and Howden and (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire in each year since 1997; what the average time taken to determine each case was; and how many complaints were upheld. [96706]

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many CSA cases were referred to the Independent Case Examiner in Portsmouth, South in each year since 1997; what the average time taken to determine each case was; how many complaints were upheld; and if he will make a statement. [97279]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available.

Council Tax Benefit

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what estimate he has made of the change in the level of expenditure on council tax benefit if the average level of council tax (a) rose by £100 and (b) fell by £100; and if he will make a statement. [97021]

Malcolm Wicks: An increase of £100 a year in the average level of council tax would result in an estimated annual increase of up to £600 million in council tax benefit expenditure. This figure includes the cost of increased payments to people already receiving council tax benefit as well as people who would become eligible for the benefit because of the council tax increase. An equivalent decrease would reduce expenditure by an estimated £500 million a year.

Note:

Figures are rounded to the nearest £50 million.

Source:

Figures are derived from the Department's policy simulation model, and are based on the 2000–01 Family Resources Survey, uprated to 2003–04 prices, benefit rates and caseloads and earnings levels.

Departmental Equipment (Theft)

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what equipment was stolen from his Department in 2002; what the approximate value of each item was; and if he will list items valued at more than £50 stolen or lost from his Department in 2002. [88509]

Malcolm Wicks: The DWP employs over 130,000 staff operating from 1,500 different locations and deals with over one million customers per day. Losses from theft are low.

In total there have been 708 items of equipment recorded as stolen from the Department during 2002, with an approximate total value of £556,674.

The 708 items are made up of:

5 Official Vehicles
103 Personal Computers
469 System Base Units
8 Printers
16 Flat Screen Monitors
60 Portable Computers
47 Miscellaneous Items

A list of those items valued at more than £50 has been placed in the Library.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) what his estimate is of the real growth of planned total expenditure by his Department for each year from 2002–03 to 2005–06; and if he will make a statement; [97351]

(2) what estimate he has made of the change in real spending on total administration costs for gross controlled areas for each year from 1998–99 to 2003–04 (planned); and if he will make a statement. [97347]

Mr. McCartney: The Department for Work and Pensions came into being on 1 April 2001. Consequently there are no comparable figures prior to this date. The final provision for 2002–03 has yet to receive parliamentary approval and therefore a comparison with actual expenditure for 2001–02 or planned expenditure for 2003–04 cannot be made. The current expenditure plans of the Department for Work and Pensions are contained in Tables 1–11 of the departmental report: The Government expenditure plans 2002–03 to 2003–04, Command 5424.

Departmental Finance

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what his estimate is of his Department's total budget as a share of total public spending in each year from 1979–80 to 2003–04, planned. [96813]

Mr. McCartney: The Department for Work and Pensions came into being on 1 April 2001. Consequently there are no comparable figures prior to this date. The final provision for 2002–03 has yet to receive Parliamentary approval and therefore a comparison with expenditure for 2001–02 or planned expenditure for 2003–04 cannot be made. The current expenditure plans for the Department are contained in Tables 1–11 of the Departmental Report: The Government expenditure plans 2002–03 to 2003–04, Cm 5424.

Departmental Staff Numbers

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many staff were employed in each of the last four years for which figures are available by (a) his Department and its predecessor and (b) local authorities in connection with the administration of (i) housing and (ii) council tax benefit. [94006]

Malcolm Wicks: The overall strategy of our wide-ranging package of reforms for housing benefit (HB) announced on 17 October 2002, is to improve administration, promote choice and responsibility, enhance work incentives and reduce levels of fraud and error in the system. We provide help, guidance and support to local authorities to assist them in achieving these goals.

The number of people currently employed by the Department identified as working exclusively on various aspects of housing benefit and/or council tax benefit (CTB) is 340. These figures are liable to fluctuation throughout the year as particular aspects of work expand and contract. In addition there are a number of officials whose cross cutting responsibilities include these benefits to a greater or lesser extent. Figures for earlier years are not available.

Local authorities have responsibility for the day to day administration of HB and CTB. The number of full-time staff or full-time equivalents employed by local authorities in Great Britain to administer HB and CTB in the last four years for which figures are available is in the table.

	Annual average number of full-time staff or full-time equivalents employed on HB/CTB administration
1998–99	16,000
1999–2000	16,000
2000–01	17,000
2001–02	17,000

Notes:

1. Figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand.
2. Figures for any non-responding authorities have been estimated.
3. Separate figures are not available for HB and CTB.

EU Pension Policies

Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what studies he has made of the evolution of pension policies in other European Union countries; and what steps he has taken to reflect the findings of these studies in his policy on pensions provision. [98329]

Mr. McCartney: The United Kingdom has contributed to the voluntary exchange of information and good practice by EU Member States within a framework of common objectives on pensions covering adequacy, financial sustainability and modernisation agreed during the Swedish Presidency of the EU.

As part of this process the European Commission published a draft joint report on adequate and sustainable pensions in December 2002 based on national contributions.The draft report recognises that Member States have pension systems that have developed in very different ways and do not conform to one single model of provision. A major theme in the draft report is the need for urgent reform in many public pension systems to ensure they are financially sustainable in the future. This concurs with the UK's position that financial sustainability is a prerequisite for the adequacy of public pension provision. The UK public pension system is one of those found to be financially sustainable in the long term.

The draft report concludes that the major challenge for the UK system is ensuring that there is increased access to occupational and personal pension provision and people are encouraged to save enough to meet their expectations in retirement. These same issues are addressed by the proposals set out in the Green Paper published in December 2002 on which we are currently consulting.

Free TV Licences

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners there are in Nottingham, North; how many qualify for a free TV licence; and how many get the minimum income guarantee. [98323]

Mr. McCartney: The information is not available in the format requested. However such information as is available shows that in the parliamentary constituency of Nottingham, North:

The number of recipients of state pension for September 2002 was 14.9 thousand.

The number of pensioners over the age of 75 and therefore eligible to qualify for a free TV licence as at May 2002 was 6.5 thousand; and

In November 2002, there were 4.2 thousand minimum income guarantee claimants.

Notes:

1. Figures are based on a 5 per cent. sample and are therefore subject to sampling variation.
2. Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred and are expressed in thousands.
3. MIG claimants are defined as any live income support benefit unit where the claimant and/or partner are aged 60 and over.
4. Parliamentary constituency is assigned by matching postcodes against the relevant ONS postcode directory.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what action the Department is taking to co-ordinate housing benefit anti-fraud work with the Inland Revenue's work on tax credit fraud; whether a working group has been established to consider this; and how many joint local authority and Inland Revenue fraud prosecutions have occurred. [91969]

Malcolm Wicks: A working group, whose members include representatives from the Inland Revenue and local authority associations, has been meeting to consider all the implications for local authorities of the introduction of new tax credits.

Information is not available on the number of joint local authority and Inland Revenue fraud prosecutions that have occurred.

Income-related Benefits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions when he intends to publish Income Related Benefits: Estimates of Take-Up 2000–01; and for what reason it has been delayed. [92154]

Malcolm Wicks: Income Related Benefits Estimates of Take-up 2000–01 will be published on 27 March 2003. This has been pre-announced in Updates—the ONS diary of statistical releases. The forthcoming statistics will incorporate findings from research commissioned to improve the precision and accuracy of MIG take-up estimates; this addition has extended the production process.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate the cost per claimant of administering the minimum income guarantee. [96505]

Mr McCartney: Information is not currently available in the format requested. The Department now accounts for its administration and benefit expenditure by Strategic Objective, as set out in its Public Service Agreements (PSA), and by individual Requests for Resources (RfRs), as set out in the Departmental Estimates and Accounts.

Pension Credit

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions whether all pensioners newly entitled to the pension credit will be able to claim the money in October. [99068]

Mr. McCartney: Yes

Pension Payments

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners draw their retirement pensions at (a) post offices, (b) banks and (c) building societies in the Portsmouth, South constituency; and if he will make a statement. [98099]

Malcolm Wicks: The number of pensioners in receipt of Retirement Pensions collectable at Post Office in the Portsmouth, South constituency was 7,886 at 28 December 2002. This figure includes payments by giro cheque, which can also be paid into a bank or building society account. The number of pensioners in receipt of Retirement Pension paid directly into a bank or building society was 6,373 as at 28 December 2002. Information to differentiate between payments into bank and building society accounts is not available.

Some customers who are paid direct into an account can also collect their benefit in cash at post offices through network banking arrangements at the Post Office. There is no data available on the number of benefit claims collected in this way.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners draw their retirement pensions at (a) post offices, (b) banks and (c) at building societies in the Easington constituency. [97158]

Malcolm Wicks: The number of pensioners in receipt of retirement pension collectable at post offices in the Easington constituency was 9,939 at 28 December 2002. This figure includes payments by giro cheque, which can also be paid into a bank or building society account. The number of pensioners in receipt of retirement pension paid directly into a bank or building society was 2,853 as at 28 December 2002. Information to differentiate between payments into bank and building society accounts is not available.

Some customers who are paid direct into an account can also collect their benefit in cash at post offices through network banking arrangements at the Post Office. There are no data available on the number of benefit claims collected in this way.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners have migrated from over-the-counter benefit payments to direct bank transfer in Portsmouth, South; and if he will make a statement. [97274]

Malcolm Wicks: The number of pensioners in Portsmouth, South constituency that have migrated from payments collectable at post offices to payment into a bank or building society account is 50 as at 28 December 2002, compared with the same records from data available four weeks earlier.

Some customers who are paid direct into an account can also collect their benefit in cash at post offices through network banking arrangements at the Post Office. There are no data available on the number of benefit claims collected in this way.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners collect benefits from post offices in Portsmouth, South; and if he will make a statement. [97277]

Malcolm Wicks: The number of pensioners receiving DWP benefits (including war pensions) collectable from post offices in Portsmouth South is 10,034 as at 28 December 2002. This figure includes benefits paid by giro cheque, which can also be paid into a bank or building society account.

Some customers who are paid direct into an account can also collect their benefit in cash at post offices through network banking arrangements at the Post Office. There are no data available on the number of benefit claims collected in this way.

Pension Schemes

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many defined benefit schemes are (a) open, (b) closed to new members and (c) closed to further contributions from existing members, giving for each type of scheme the estimated number of members, in each of the past five years. [90827]

Mr. McCartney: The information requested is not available. However, the Pensions Scheme Registry that is administered by the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority contains some relevant data that are shown in the table.

Defined Benefit Occupational Pension schemes, 1998–99 to 2002–03

New registrations/change of scheme status

	Open		Closed		Frozen
	Number of schemes	Number of members at registration date (thousand)	Number of schemes	Number of members at effective date of status change (thousand)	Number of schemes	Number of members at effective date of status change (thousand)
1 April 1998–31 March 1999	111	25	103	180	41	11
1 April 1999–31 March 2000	86	16	115	54	52	8
1 April 2000–31 March 2001	97	59	161	94	87	113
1 April 2001–31 March 2002	78	32	263	560	65	45
1 April 2002–31 March 2003	22	19	198	146	65	41

There a[illegible]ome important points to note with regard to the data in the table:

'Open' schemes are those that had a registerable date on to the Pensions Scheme Registry during the year in question, and were also recorded as being open on 10 February 2003. This does not represent the total number of schemes that were open in the year in question. Figures in the table refer to the 'flow' of new open schemes in each particular year, rather than the 'stock' of all open schemes. Because of the way scheme-status changes are recorded on the Registry, it is not possible to identify the stock of all those schemes that were open at a particular point in time prior to the current date. Furthermore, scheme trustees have 12 months to notify OPRA of any change to the status of an open scheme, and so some schemes currently included in the table as open may since have changed status.

'Closed' schemes are those that have become closed to new members during the year in question and remain closed as at 10 February 2003. Existing members in these schemes can continue to accrue additional pension rights. 'Frozen' schemes are those that have become closed to new accruals during the year in question and remain frozen as at 10 February 2003. The dates used for closed and frozen scheme figures relate to the effective date of change as notified by schemes and recorded by the Registry. In some cases, schemes do not supply an effective date and where this has occurred the date of inputting the change onto the Registry database has been used.

Data for closed and frozen schemes refer only to the number becoming closed or frozen in the year in question, and do not represent the stock of the total number of schemes that were closed (previously closed plus newly closed in that year).

The table updates previous information used to answer earlier PQs. As referred to above, the Registry system holds information on the most recent change in scheme status and the effective date of the change. Because of the way the data are held a later change will overwrite an earlier change, so data for earlier years become increasingly inaccurate. Trustees are required to report changes within 12 months so there could be a lag between the closure or freeze of a scheme and trustees informing the Registry that the scheme has actually closed or frozen. The table reflects the most up to date data available.

Scheme members are those individuals that have accrued pension benefits and do not include those receiving pensions in payment. An individual may have pension benefits accrued in, and therefore may be a member of, more than one scheme.

Membership figures for open schemes are given at the date of registration. Membership figures for closed or frozen schemes are given at the effective date of change of status.

This information relates only to those schemes recorded on the Registry database as Defined Benefit. It does not include schemes where the benefit type is unknown or those offering a mixture of salary related and money purchase benefits.

Pension Service

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what specialist training is given to those working in Pension Service call centres. [98107]

Mr. McCartney: Training for staff in the new Pension Service Pension Centres is designed to ensure that they have the knowledge and skills needed to provide a high-quality service to Pension Service customers. The training covers various themes, depending on each individual member of staff's role, including: customer service, IT/telephony, business procedures and management.

State Pensions

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what his estimate is of the cost of increasing the basic state pension by (a) £5 per week, (b) £10 per week, (c) £15 per week, (d) £20 per week, and (e) to £100 per week, for (i) all pensioners, (ii) pensioners of age 75 and over, and (iii) pensioners of age 80 and over. [97366]

Mr. McCartney: The information requested is set out in the tables.

Cost of increasing the maximum rate payable of the basic state pension by £5, £10, £15 and £20 per week in 2003–04

	£5 per week	£10 per week	£15 per week	£20 per week
All pensioners	1.5 billion	3 billion	4.6 billion	6.2 billion
Pensioners aged 75 and over	800 million	1.5 billion	2.3 billion	3 billion
Pensioners aged 80 and over	400 million	800 million	1.2 billion	1.6 billion

Notes:

1. Estimates are in cash terms for Great Britain and are rounded to the nearest £100 million.
2. The estimates take account of offsetting savings in income related benefits. Income related benefit offsets are calculated using the Department for Work and Pensions Policy Simulation Model for 2003–04.
3. Calculations assume the maximum rate payable of the basic state pension is increased by the amounts specified and all other payments proportionately.
4. For modelling purposes, pension credit is assumed to be in place throughout 2003–04. In fact, pension credit will begin in October 2003.

	£ billion
All pensioners	7
Pensioners aged 75 and over	3.4
Pensioners aged 80 and over	1.9

Notes:

1. Estimates are in cash terms for Great Britain and are rounded to the nearest £100 million.

2. The estimates take account of offsetting savings in income related benefits. Income related benefit offsets are calculated using the Department for Work and Pensions Policy Simulation Model for 2003–04.

Pensions Green Paper

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will set out the basis for the calculation of page 5 of the Green Paper "Simplicity, Security and Choice", that the simplification proposals in the Green Paper could save employers £150-£200 million per year. [90825]

Mr. McCartney: The basis for the calculation can be found on page 129 of the green paper "Simplicity Security and Choice: Working and Saving for Retirement."

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will set out the basis of the calculation given in the Green Paper on pensions "Simplicity, Security and Choice: Working and Saving for Retirement", that there has been a 40 per cent. increase in pension contributions since 1997. [90826]

Mr. McCartney: The increase in pension contributions since 1997 was calculated using the estimated value of contributions to private pension schemes from the Office for National Statistics, and deflating by the Retail Prices Index (RPI).

The data used for the calculation are set out in the table.

	Estimated contributions to private pension schemes[1]	RPIX index (13 January 1987 equals 100.0)	Estimated contributions to private pension schemes[2]
1997	33.1	157.5	36.4
1998	37.3	162.9	39.7
1999	42.3	165.4	44.3
2000	47.5	170.3	48.3
2001	49.9[3]	173.3	49.9[3]

[1] £ billion, current prices.

[2] £ billion, 2001 prices.

[3] Provisional.

Contributions to private pension schemes have been calculated using the methodology outlined in the letter from the National Statistician to the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) on 29 October 2002, PQ 77826, Official Report, column 689W.

The estimates are consistent with those published in both Annexe B table 1 of the Review of Pension Contributions Statistics and the ONS Blue Book for 2002. The Review of Pension Contribution Statistics suggested that until the full implementation of the recommendations of the review, these are the best estimates for pension contributions statistics.

Personal Pension Plans

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on the guidance which he gives on funding for personal pension plans. [98061]

Mr. McCartney: As the Green Paper 'Simplicity, security and choice: working and saving for retirement' (CM 5677) states that the decisions over how much pension an individual should have depends on their individual preferences and circumstances. Therefore, it is not appropriate for the Government to seek to stipulate the level of income that any particular person will need in retirement, and consequently the additional saving any one individual should make.

We are committed, however, to actively encouraging people to consider their pension saving options early so that they have as clear a view as possible of their own pension funding needs. The Green Paper, sets out the Government's proposals to work with employers and the financial services industry to provide:

A simple framework to help people understand their choices; Financial education and awareness to navigate the system, including access to generic financial advice for the mass market; Personalised information tailored to individual circumstances, so people can make informed choices; and a choice of suitable products.

We are already running a pension education publicity campaign to make people aware of the importance of saving for retirement. The campaign is supported by a range of guides that provides information on pensions options. The current phase of activity started on 8 February 2003. In time, we plan to move the campaign forward from awareness so that it is more focused on taking action.

In addition, we have already introduced measures to inform individuals of the level of pension they can expect when they save in a personal pension. New regulations that come into force in April require money purchase pension schemes (occupational, personal and stakeholder) to give members an annual illustration of what their pension might be when they require. This will give them important information about how theirpension plan is progressing.

The Green Paper, therefore, sets out proposals for building on work that has already been done, as well as identifying new initiatives, in order to provide a coherent education and information effort. This will enable individuals to make choices as to the level of funding for their personal pensions.

Benefit Fraud

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what recent assessment he has made of benefit fraud in the East Riding of Yorkshire. [96711]

Malcolm Wicks: Our most recent estimate is that £2 billion is lost annually through benefit fraud in Great Britain. This estimate cannot be broken down for individual areas.

Post Office Card Accounts

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on the issue of personal invitation documents to benefits customers in respect of Post Office card accounts; why the issue of personal invitation documents was delayed from 5 January 2003 until 24 March; and what estimate he has made of the likely impact of the delay on the number of benefits claimants signing up to card accounts in time for the launch on 1April. [97373]

Malcolm Wicks [holding answer 11 February 2003]: The Government has made clear that we will only accept the Post Office card account service once further testing and proving has shown that the Post Office can provide a reliable and robust system delivering high levels of customer service. We have been continually reviewing and refining our plans to issue Personal Invitation Documents, and will gradually start to issue them once we are sure the Post Office can deliver the required level of service.

None of this affects people's choices. Customers will choose the account that best meets their needs and circumstances. The arrangements for issuing Personal Invitation Documents will not affect this choice—customers opting for a card account will simply be kept on their current method of payment (order book or giro) until they have been issued a Personal Invitation Document and then successfully opened a card account.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what assessment he has made of how housebound pensioners and others will be able to use a Post Office card account without giving their PIN to a carer. [97669]

Malcolm Wicks: Customers with a Post Office card account can, if they wish, nominate someone else to have permanent access to their account and collect their money for them. In these cases a second card with a separate PIN will be issued for use by the person nominated by the customer. The Post Office card account is not the only option available. Some housebound pensioners may find that a bank account, which may offer services such as phone or Internet banking, may be better to meet their personal needs.

Retirement Age

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what his policy is on allowing civil servants to retire at the age of 65. [90029]

Mr. McCartney: The Government has already begun to address the social and economic consequences of demographic change in its role as employer. One of the recommendations of Winning the Generation Game was that public sector employers should review their retirement ages and examine the case for allowing those who want to work on to age 65 to do so. Already 75 per cent. of civil servants now have the option to retire at 65 and the numbers able to serve beyond 60 are expected to increase.

All staff in the Department for Work and Pensions, below the Senior Civil Service, are able to choose to remain in employment beyond the age of 60 for any period of time up to the age of 65.

> "Staff in the Senior Civil Service normally retire at the age of 60 but the Head of the Department and Agency Chief Executives have flexibility to retain members of the Senior Civil Service beyond age 60 if they judge it in the public interest and they are satisfied about the fitness and efficiency of the individual to carry out his or her duties. The most senior posts require written approval from the Head of the Home Civil Service to be retained for longer than three months beyond their 60th birthday."

This is based on an extract from the Civil Service Management Code.

Most public service pension schemes, however, still allow a normal pension to be taken at 60 or under. The Government is seeking views on the proposal that the rules of public service pension schemes should be changed and applied to all new members during the next few years to make an unreduced pension payable from age 65 rather than 60. Such a change would reflect improved longevity, modern working patterns and the practice in the majority of private sector pension schemes.

Senior Civil Servants (IT Qualifications)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what IT qualifications each of the senior civil servants within his Department possesses. [98109]

Mr. McCartney: Information on IT qualifications held by each senior civil servant is not held centrally. Senior civil servants are encouraged to gain IT skills through a range of internal and external training.

War Pensions

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what mechanism exists to co-ordinate benefit awarded by his Department and those paid by the War Pensions Agency. [96952]

Malcolm Wicks: It has been a long-standing principle of the benefits system that it should not provide more than one benefit to cover the same contingency. While income from a War Pension is often disregarded for benefit purposes, there are certain circumstances where the award or cessation of a War Pension or supplementary allowance will necessitate an adjustment to the amount of benefit in payment.

We have measures in place to ensure that benefits paid by this Department are co-ordinated with those paid by the Veterans Agency (formerly the War Pensions Agency), and that any appropriate adjustments to benefit claims are made in the normal course of events.

Prior to the award of a Social Security benefit, a person must make a declaration of their circumstances, including details of the benefits they receive or have claimed. Once benefit is in payment, the recipient is advised to report any changes in their circumstances, including for example, the award or cessation of another benefit. Claims are also reviewed periodically by the Department to ensure their accuracy.

In addition, all claims to benefit are recorded on a computer system to which our agencies and the Veterans Agency have access, enabling the relevant agencies to share information where appropriate.

Winter Fuel Payments

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions pursuant to his answer of 22 January 2003, ref: 90125, what the reasons are for the assumption in the Green Paper on Pensions that spending on winter fuel payments will remain at their current level of £200 up until 2051–52; and, on the basis of the projections of spending given in the Green Paper, what the value of the winter fuel allowance will be in real terms in (a) 2011–12, (b) 2021–22 and (c) 2051–52. [93940]

Mr. McCartney: The current amount of the Winter Fuel Payment of £200 will continue to be paid to each eligible household for the rest of this parliament. The rate will be kept under review. However, for the purposes of the projections in Annexe 3 of the Green Paper 'Simplicity, security and choice' (Cm 5677), it was necessary to make a modelling assumption about the value of winter fuel payments. Modelling assumptions should not be interpreted as statements of policy. It will be for future Governments to decide what the rate of Winter Fuel Payments should be for future years.

The following table shows the projected future value of the winter fuel payment in 2002–03 prices on the assumption that it remains at its current cash value of £200 and that inflation remains constant at 2.5 per cent.

WFP values in selected years

	Cash amount	2001–02 prices
2011–12	200	155
2021–22	200	121
2051–52	200	58

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners received winter fuel payments in the financial year 2001–02 in (a) Scotland, (b) Wales, (c) England and (d) Northern Ireland; and what the total payment was in each. [97265]

Mr. McCartney: Most people aged 60 and over, who normally live in Great Britain are entitled to a Winter Fuel Payment. There is no need to be in receipt of a State Pension. Information based on the number of people who received a payment is given in the table below.

Benefits in Northern Ireland are normally the responsibility of the Northern Ireland Social Security Agency (NISSA). However, the following figures are available as this Department processes Winter Fuel Payment's on behalf of NISSA. In winter 2001/2, 269,289 payments were made, totalling £42,152,400

Total number of recipients of a Winter Fuel Payment for Winter 2001/2002.

	Thousands Total number of recipients	Millions Total amount paid
Great Britain	11,201.9	1,680.6
England	9,585.8	1,435.9
Scotland	996.4	151.9
Wales	619.7	92.8

Matching Intelligence Data Analysis Service Winter Fuels Payment 2001/2002 exercise.2.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what his estimate is of the amount of unclaimed winter heating allowance for each year from 1999–2000 to 2003–04; and if he will make a statement. [97357]

Mr. McCartney: Most eligible people receive their winter fuel payment automatically, without the need to claim. Over 11 million payments have been made this winter.

We are unable to provide any reliable estimate of the amount of unclaimed Winter Fuel Payments because some people aged 60 and over are excluded, others may choose not to claim and payments are based on household composition.

Where a person needs to claim, it is up to them whether they do so, and we publicise the availability of these payments.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what his estimate is of the change in real spending on the winter heating allowance between 2000–01 and 2003–04 (planned); and if he will make a statement. [97358]

Mr. McCartney: In 2002–3 price terms, expenditure of winter fuel payments was £1.83 billion in 2000/1 and it is estimated it will be £1.68 billion in 2003/4. These figures are based on the standard winter fuel payment being 200 for each year.

TREASURY

Burmese Narcotics

Vera Baird: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what percentage of illegal narcotics on UK streets he estimates originated from Burma in 2002; [97224]

(2) what (a) percentage and (b) types of intercepted illegal narcotics were believed to have originated from Burma in 2002. [97222]

John Healey: Burma is known to be a source of two of the narcotics that would be considered illegal if trafficked into the UK—heroin and methamphetamine. However there was no evidence in 2002, either from Customs and Excise intelligence or from analysis of samples of seized drugs, that any of these narcotics on the UK streets could be traced back to Burma.

Aggregates Tax

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much aggregates tax revenue has been collected in Northern Ireland to date against that which would have been expected; and what is the estimated cost to date of implementing the tax in Northern Ireland; [97014]

(2) what research Customs and Excise have carried out into the amount of illegally imported aggregate from the Republic of Ireland; [97007]

(3) how he proposes to remove the incentive for people (a) to import aggregate from the Republic of Ireland, (b) to open up unauthorised extraction operations and (c) to sell aggregate without paying aggregate tax; [97010]

(4) how many tonnes of imported aggregate have been declared in tax returns to date; [97006]

(5) how many (a) detections of evasion of payment of aggregates tax and (b) prosecutions there have been; [97008]

(6) what mechanism is used by Customs and Excise to ensure that companies pay aggregates tax on stone. [97015]

John Healey: The Government has designed the aggregates levy to protect the international competitiveness of aggregates businesses by applying the levy to the commercial exploitation of all virgin aggregate used in the UK and by exempting exports. The Government has also recognised the unique position of the Northern Ireland processed products sector, those producing concrete, mortar and asphalt, by introducing a transitional relief scheme.

This scheme allows the sector more time to adapt to the new market conditions by, for example, making increased use of levy-free alternatives to virgin aggregate.

Customs and Excise assure aggregates levy in the same way that they assure other taxes and duties for which they are responsible. Assurance resources are allocated according to risk. Additionally, in the first year of its operation Customs are undertaking education and assurance visits to all companies registered for the levy. The resources allocated to administering the levy in Northern Ireland take account of issues associated with the land boundary, and this resourcing is subject to regular review.

The levy is due at the point of first commercial exploitation in the UK and not at the point of import. Consequently aggregates can be imported without levy immediately being due and therefore the question of illegal imports does not arise. Where it cannot be demonstrated that commercially exploited aggregate is from a levy-paid source, Customs will use their powers to recover the revenue due and impose penalties, where appropriate.

Similarly, figures for the total weight of aggregate imported into the UK are not available. Aggregates levy returns record the weight of aggregate which is commercially exploited in the UK and do not differentiate between domestically produced and imported aggregate.

Data for revenue collected under the levy are recorded for the UK as a whole and are not available by devolved region; therefore, figures for levy revenue raised in Northern Ireland are not available. Equally, the cost of implementing the levy is estimated for the UK as a whole and not by devolved region.

There have been no prosecutions for evasion of the levy. Customs' approach in the first year of the tax has been to ensure that those who should be registered are registered, and that the correct liability is established and paid.

Burglary

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost of burglary offences to the British insurance industry each year between 1995 and 2002. [98137]

Mr. Denham: I have been asked to reply.

The Government do not make any estimates of the cost of burglary offences to the insurance industry. The Association of British Insurers (ABI) publish annual information in their "Insurance Statistics Yearbook" on total UK claims for property damage due to theft.

The Home Office has published estimates of the economic and social costs of crime (Home Office Research Study 217). This study includes the cost of "insurance administration", that is the resources used in administering and processing premiums and claims, based on information in the ABI "Yearbook". The study estimates the total cost to society of insurance administration in England and Wales in 1999–2000 was £140 million for burglary in a dwelling and £50 million for burglary not in a dwelling.

Cancer Statistics

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to (a) improve, (b) extend and (c) update statistics for five year survival rates for common cancers; and what programme of development work in such health statistics is under way. [99099]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 24 February 2002:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning what steps are being taken to improve, extend and update statistics for five year survival rates for common cancers; and what programme of development work in such health statistics is underway. (99099)

The Office for National Statistics is currently collaborating with the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine to produce survival statistics for adult patients diagnosed with the 20 commonest cancers in England and Wales during 1991–1999 and followed up to the end of 2001. These account for almost 90% of adult cancers. The work will include estimates of the socio-economic gradients in cancer survival.

Survival analyses based on complete follow up of patients for five years from diagnosis will be possible for those diagnosed up to 1996. As follow up is not yet available beyond 2001, a recently developed statistical method, "period" survival, will be used to estimate the five-year survival for patients diagnosed up to 1999.

The results, which will be published later this year, will provide robust and up-to-date evidence on changes in survival during the 1990s.

Capita

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many meetings (a) he and his Ministers, (b) Treasury special advisers and (c) Treasury officials have had with Capita employees and members of the Capita Board since May 2001; what the purpose of each meeting was; and if he will make a statement. [98570]

Ruth Kelly: As with previous Administrations, and in line with Exemption 7 of the "Code of Practice on Access to Government Information", it is not this Government's normal practice to release details of specific meetings or their content, as some of these discussions may have taken place on a confidential basis. All such contacts are conducted in accordance with the rules set out in the "Ministerial Code", the "Civil Service Code", and "Guidance for Civil Servants: Contacts with Lobbyists". Copies of these documents are available in the Libraries of the House.

Child Tax Credit

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the total budgetary provision is for the introduction of the new Child Tax Credit in each of the first three years of its operation, broken down by (a) the budgetary provision for payment of the estimated sums due to recipients, (b) the promotional and advertising costs associated with the Child Tax Credit and (c) the publishing costs of documentation sent to potential applicants. [97915]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The answer is as follows.

(a) The budgetary provision for payments for the Child Tax Credit is £8.3 billion in 2003–04, £11.7 billion in 2004–05 and £13.1 billion in 2005–06.

(b) The promotional and advertising costs associated with the Child Tax Credit cannot be separated from the costs for the Working Tax Credit. For promotional and advertising costs for both credits, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) on 15 October 2002, column 603W. Since the question was answered, further spending on promoting and advertising the new tax credits means that current expenditure stands at about £9.75 million.

(c) The current cost of sending out claim packs to potential applicants is approximately £400,000.

Crown Estate

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to review the tax regime pertaining to the Crown Estate. [97904]

Dawn Primarolo: There are no plans to change these arrangements.

Debt Relief

John Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with developing countries on (a) the future of debt relief and (b) the proposed international finance facility. [98259]

John Healey: The UK remains at the forefront of the international debate on debt relief and continues to promote the implementation of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative. The Chancellor discusses debt relief issues in a wide range of international meetings with representatives of developing countries. For example, on 24–26 September 2002 the UK hosted the Commonwealth Finance Ministers meeting that included a Commonwealth HIPC ministerial forum. Debt relief and the HIPC initiative will also be discussed at the forthcoming spring meetings of the IMF and World Bank.

On 27 November 2002 the Chancellor announced in his pre-budget report that he had written as Chairman of the International Monetary and Finance Committee to all fellow Finance Ministers, and to the World Bank and United Nations about the international finance facility.

On 23 January 2003 the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for International Development published a document on the UK's proposal for the international finance facility. The Chancellor and Secretary of State have written to their counterparts in developing countries enclosing a copy of the proposal document.

Departmental Annual Reports

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it compulsory for departmental annual reports to include a full statement of accounts. [98123]

Mr. Boateng: Under the Government Resource and Accounts Act 2000, the Treasury must lay departmental resource accounts before the House of Commons no later than 31 January of the financial year following that to which they relate. Departments are currently required to publish their accounts either on the day their accounts are laid or as shortly as possible thereafter. There are no plans to reproduce the accounts in the spring departmental reports.

Departmental Computer Systems

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which computer systems within his Department use XML. [98112]

Ruth Kelly: The following live computer systems make use of XML:

In HM Treasury

a) The departmental finance and purchasing system (name of system is ABACUS)

b) The main Treasury website.

In the Office for National Statistics

c) The Business Surveys sub-system that handles faxed replies from contributors.

d) The system which supplies information to the TSO for the government wide 'Information Asset Register'

e) The English Housing Conditions Survey system.

In the Inland Revenue

For external (customer) and Inter-governmental communications in these systems :

f) New Tax Credits

g) Corporation Tax

h) PAYE

i) Self Assessment

j) Government Gateway Authentication and Communication

k) NIRS

And for internal communication and storage in:

l) Self Assessment

m) New Tax Credits

n) NIRS

o) Software Frameworks

p) Call Centre Programme

q) GovRules

r) IR Intranet

In the HMCE

For communication with the Government Gateway in the following systems

s) Trader Registration

t) New Export System and in the following other systems:

u) e-aggregates

v) Climate Change levy

w) CHIEF printing

x) New Computerised Transit System

Diesel

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals have been made by the European Commission to harmonise the taxation of diesel fuel for transport by all modes; whether that includes marine use at sea, in estuaries, on rivers and canals, for both commercial and leisure use; what consultations have taken place with interested persons or bodies; what reports have been published by the Government; and whether a decision in the Council of Ministers is by two-thirds majority vote. [98476]

John Healey: The only European Commission proposal for full harmonisation of duty rates for diesel fuel used in transport relates to diesel fuel used by lorries over 16 tonnes, buses and coaches. The proposal is that member states should bring their duty rates for such diesel closer together to reach a harmonised rate by 2010 of €350 per 1,000 litres, although that rate would be uprated in line with inflation. The Government have submitted an Explanatory Memorandum on this proposal (reference 11571/02 dated 26 September 2002), which set out our opposition to it. That opposition is shared by nearly all member states, so the directive cannot be adopted in its present form, as any decisions taken by the Council of Ministers on matters of taxation have to be unanimous.

The only European Commission proposal relating to duty on diesel fuel for marine use is the proposed directive on taxation of energy products. This would generally continue the existing duty treatment of diesel fuel for marine use in the mineral oils structures directive. It provides for a compulsory exemption for diesel fuel used for navigation in Community waters (although it would allow member states to limit the exemption to international and intra-Community transport) and for an optional exemption for diesel fuel used for navigation in inland waterways. In both cases, private pleasure craft are excluded from these exemptions, but the United Kingdom's derogation from the existing directive, allowing the United Kingdom to exempt fuel for private pleasure craft until 31 December 2006, will be unaffected. The Government have submitted a supplementary Memorandum on the latest version of the proposal (reference 13422/02, FISC 266, dated 26 November 2002). This directive will support efforts to deal with the significant environmental problems arising from global warming, which requires cross-border action. This proposal also cannot be adopted in its present form without unanimous agreement by the Council of Ministers.

Duty Diversion Fraud

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many customs officials have been (a) investigated and (b) interviewed regarding their participation in duty diversion fraud for each year from 1994 to 2002. [97367]

John Healey: The Internal Investigation Division [IID] is responsible within HM Customs and Excise for staff irregularity matters. The division was created in the autumn of 2000. From that date the IID has held all central records relating to investigations of staff irregularity matters. Prior to the establishment of the IID, no central records were held.

As at 11 February 2003, its records show no customs officials as having been investigated and/or interviewed, by the police or internally, regarding their participation in duty diversion fraud.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to introduce enhanced capital allowances to encourage the purchase of (a) the most efficient domestic central heating systems and (b) energy saving products by (i) registered social landlords and (ii) energy service companies. [98667]

John Healey: Budget 2001 introduced 100 per cent first-year enhanced capital allowances (ECAs) for designated energy-saving plant and machinery. The ECA scheme enables businesses to write-off the whole cost of their investment in designated energy-saving equipment against the taxable profits of the period during which the investment is made.

Registered Social Landlords are non profit-making organisations and as such will not be able to claim capital allowances.

In the commercial sector, energy service companies can claim ECAs on their spending on qualifying equipment and special rules enable them to claim allowances where, as part of a comprehensive energy services agreement, they provide equipment that becomes a fixture on another person's land in which they have no interest.

The Government's Affordable Warmth Programme supports the installation of modern energy efficient central heating systems in low-income homes, including registered social landlord homes. The equipment is leased to the landlord and where the equipment is designated energy-saving equipment, special rules enable the lessor to claim the enhanced capital allowances. The benefit can be passed on in the form of lower rentals.

The Government consulted on economic instruments to improve household energy efficiency during 2002 and a summary of responses has been published on the HMT website. PBR 2002 stated that the Government would consult further on specific measures to promote greater energy efficiency by households, once the responses to the initial consultation have been fully considered.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the price in real terms paid by the domestic consumer has changed since 1997 for the purchase of (a) domestic electricity and gas, (b) insulation materials, (c) high efficiency boilers, (d) draught-proofing, (e) double glazing and (f) low energy light-bulbs. [98666]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. David Chaytor, dated 24 February 2003:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking for the change in price in real terms since 1997 of (a) domestic electricity and gas, (b) insulation materials, (c) high efficiency boilers, (d) draught-proofing, (e) double glazing and (f) low energy light-bulbs. (98666)

The Office for National Statistics publishes separate sub-indices of the Retail Prices Index for domestic electricity and gas, but not for any of the other items to which you refer.

The following table gives the index numbers relating to the relevant sub-indices for domestic electricity and gas and for the All Items RPI. The figures are for the annual average for 1997 and for January 2003 (the most recently published), together with the corresponding percentage change.

	Average 1997 index	January 2003 index	Percentage change
All items RPI	157.5	178.4	+13.%
Electricity	140.0	128.9	-7.9%
Gas	123.1	126.4	+2.7%

Between the 1997 average and January 2003 the electricity index fell by 7.9% whilst the gas index rose by 2.7%. In contrast the All Items RPI increased by 13.3%.

Euro

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the answer of 30 January 2003, Official Report, column 991W, on the euro, whether the issue of single European currency has been discussed during meetings between Government officials and representatives of Gibraltar; which Government officials are responsible for liaison with officials from Guernsey; what issues have been discussed by Government officials with representatives of Jersey; and when the most recent discussion between Government officials and representatives of the Isle of Man was. [98482]

Ruth Kelly: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to him on 30 January 2003, Official Report, column 991W.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many investigations his Department is undertaking into the five tests for the euro. [98898]

Ruth Kelly: The 6 September 2002 Paper for the Treasury Committee set out that a number of supporting studies will be published alongside the assessment of the five tests. On 12 February 2003, Official Report, column 884, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear that an additional four studies will be published.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the meetings he has had with the Prime Minister (a) in the last month and (b) regarding the UK's entry into the Euro currency zone in the last month. [99024]

Ruth Kelly: The Chancellor meets regularly with the Prime Minister to discuss a wide range of issues.

Fair Trade Fortnight

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps his Department is taking to promote Fair Trade Fortnight. [98900]

Ruth Kelly: My right hon. Friend strongly supports the work of the Fair Trade Foundation in helping the poorest people in developing countries to benefit more from trade. The range of fair trade beverages already on offer in the Treasury's Restaurant and Coffee Shop will be extended during Fair Trade Fortnight, and fair trade confectionery products will also be available.

Gibraltar

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether minutes of meetings between his Department's officials and representatives from Gibraltar are published. [99109]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 11 February 2002, Official Report, columns 114–15W.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 10 February 2003, Official Report, column 607W, on gross domestic product, if he will publish the research used to make the assumption that trend output growth is ¼ percentage point lower than the Government's neutral view. [99125]

Ruth Kelly: The Treasury's analysis of the rate of trend growth in output is set out in "Trend Growth: Recent Developments and Prospects" (HM Treasury, April 2002), which is available online at www.hm-treasury.gov.uk.

For the purposes of the public finances projections the Government adopt a deliberately cautious assumption for trend growth that is ¼ percentage point below its neutral view. In the interests of stability and robust, medium-term fiscal planning, this strikes the right balance between being a reasonable and a cautious assumption.

As set out in paragraph B20 of the 2002 pre-Budget report, over the period to 2006–07 this gives rise to an assumed rate of 2½ per cent: the Comptroller and Auditor General has audited this assumption and concluded that it is "reasonable and cautious".

Health Cash Plans

Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Ministers in his Department have met non-profit distributing health cash plan providers to discuss the recent decision of the Inland Revenue to change the tax treatment of health cash plan providers; what changes in the constitutional governance and trading practices of such providers gave rise to the change in their assessed status; and when those changes arose. [96778]

John Healey: Ministers have had no meetings to discuss the tax treatment of health cash plan providers.

The Inland Revenue's inquiries into the tax returns of non-profit distributing health cash plan providers concluded that they were not meeting all the conditions for mutual trading and their mutual status for tax purposes was not justified. However, the Inland Revenue did not consider any changes of the sort described.

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of how many individuals make contributions to health cash plans operated by non-profit-distributing organisations; and what assessment he has made of the impact on the charitable giving policies of such funds of recent changes in their tax treatment. [97606]

John Healey: Inquiries by the Inland Revenue discovered that health cash plan providers were not meeting all the conditions for mutual trading and their mutual status for tax purposes was not justified.

No estimate has been made of the number of contributors.

No assessment has been made of the impact of these changes which depend largely on decisions taken by individual health cash plan providers.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make a statement on the impact on NHS projects that have previously received donations from not-for-profit providers of health cash plans of the changes resulting from the proposed introduction of corporation tax on operating surpluses; [98605]

(2) if he will make a statement on what assessment he has made of the impact on those individuals who are contributing towards health cash plans of the proposals of the Treasury to impose corporation tax on operating surpluses. [98606]

John Healey: Health cash plan providers were exempt from corporation tax as they were regarded formally as trading mutually.

Following a review in 2000, the Inland Revenue concluded that these organisations did not meet all the conditions for mutual trading and their exemption was therefore withdrawn for the future. However, individual providers had the option of changing their rules so that they could continue to benefit from the tax exemption. Where organisations have taken this option, the Revenue has accepted them as being mutual throughout.

No assessment has been made of the impact of these changes.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on why the Treasury launched a review of the tax treatment of health cash plans; and how he estimates this will impact on (a) policy holders and (b) recipients of charitable donations from those plans. [98607]

John Healey: The Inland Revenue has a right to inquire into any Self Assessment return, including those of health cash plan providers.

An inquiry into one of these organisations discovered that the conditions of mutual trading were not being met and therefore their mutual status was not legally valid and had to be withdrawn for tax purposes.

Further inquiries were subsequently carried out into the tax returns of other such organisations by the Inland Revenue. The Treasury conducted no review.

The Inland Revenue has to apply the law as it stands to ensure that organisations do not have favoured treatment to which they are strictly not entitled.

No assessment has been made of the impact of these changes, which depend largely on decisions taken by individual health cash plan providers.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether representatives from the Treasury met representatives of the health cash plan industry to discuss the impact of proposed changes in health cash plans which will involve the introduction of corporation tax on their operating surpluses. [98603]

John Healey: Neither Ministers nor officials from the Treasury have held such a meeting. However, Inland Revenue officials have met with the British Health Care Association.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the NHS projects that have received donations from not-for-profit providers of health cash plans in the latest year for which figures are available. [98604]

John Healey: The information requested is not available.

Income Tax (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many low earning income tax payers in Nottingham have benefited from the 10 per cent. starting rate of income tax. [98253]

Dawn Primarolo: In Nottingham, it is estimated that 15,000 taxpayers now pay tax at the starting rate of 10 pence. However all income tax payers with taxable earnings will have benefited from the 10 per cent. band.

Independent Financial Advisers

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what research he has commissioned into professional indemnity insurance requirements of independent financial advisers beyond 2003; and if he will make a statement; [99027]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 10 February, Official Report, column 602W, on independent financial advisers, if he will make a statement concerning the professional indemnity insurance requirements of independent financial advisers. [998129]

Ruth Kelly: The Financial Services Authority tell me that they are continuing to monitor the market for professional indemnity insurance for independent financial advisers.

The results of the FSA work to date are set out in their Consultation Paper 169, "Professional Indemnity Insurance for personal investment firms—consultation on rule changes; and discussion of other policy options", which they issued on 3 February 2003.

Practitioners, and others with views, should respond to the FSA consultation.

Iraq

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions his Department has had with the Ministry of Defence on (a) the duration of a possible war in the Middle East and (b) its effects on (i) the performance of the UK economy and (ii) the public sector finances. [94401]

Mr. Boateng: The information is as follows:

(a) My Department is in continuous discussion with MOD on a range of issues. These include discussions on military contingency planning. Such planning for events in the Middle East includes the means to avert conflict through the credible threat of force in support of UNSCR 1441 and the weapons inspection process.

(b) The Treasury monitors global developments that affect UK economic performance. An updated assessment of economic prospects, including public finances, will be published in the Budget.

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what financial provision he has made for the costs of UK participation in military action against Iraq. [98955]

Mr Boateng: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) and my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 20 February.

IT Contracts

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many and by how much Government Departments have overspent on their IT contracts since 1997. [98124]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list IT contracts in his Department above £50 million in each of the last 10 years; what the inception date for each system was; when it became fully functional; when it became fully debugged; and what the cost of over-runs has been. [99005]

Ruth Kelly: Of the Chancellor's Departments, only the following have let IT contracts above £50 million in the last 10 years.

1. Inland Revenue

IR currently has major contracts with two strategic technology partners, EDS and Accenture, to provide its IT systems and support, including development and maintenance. It also has a framework contract with Computacenter for the supply of IT equipment and software.

(i) The IT services contract was let to EDS in 1994 for 10 years and is worth £2.4 billion over its lifetime, with an estimated £300 million to £400 million annual expenditure. The contract is input based (i.e. time and materials, not system specific). Its complex charging and price capping mechanism means that details of systems delivered through this contract could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

(ii) The NIRS 2 contract for operational services was awarded to Andersen Consulting (now Accenture) in May 1995 with an initial scheduled implementation in February 1997. The third phase of the project, introduced in July 1998, was not signed off as fully functional until April 2000. Compensation of £4.1 million was paid by the supplier for this delay. Significant Government and legislative changes resulted in the NIRS 2 contract being extended in April 2000 and the contract now runs to 2004.

2. HM Customs and Excise

HM Customs and Excise (HMCE) has let only one IT Contract in excess of £50 million in the past 10 years. The contract was awarded to Fujitsu C&E Services Ltd. under the Private Finance Initiative in 1999. The contract is for the provision of an outsourced IT and telephony infrastructure. The inception date was 25 August 1999 (the date the contract was signed). The date when it became fully functional is deemed as 'Transfer of Undertaking', 1 April 2000, when the infrastructure and associated staff were transferred to Fujitsu Customs and Excise Services Ltd. As this is an IT Infrastructure service there was no debugging element and the Transfer of Undertaking date was achieved to target without any overrun.

Lisbon and Stockholm Objectives

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 10 February 2003, Official Report, columns 611–13W, on Lisbon and Stockholm objectives, whether officials in his Department expressed an opinion on proposals for reforms of listing rules in such discussions; and if he will make a statement. [99130]

Ruth Kelly: The Financial Services Authority (FSA), in its role as United Kingdom Listings Authority, has sole responsibility for setting the listing rules under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. The FSA are currently conducting a review of the listings rules. To help with this process, it has established a consultative committee, made up of representatives of companies and City bodies and institutions. The Treasury is represented on this committee with observer status.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 10 February 2003, Official Report, columns 609–11W, on Lisbon and Stockholm objectives, whether he will include in the next progress report on developments in European economic reform a section listing the progress made in meeting the Lisbon and Stockholm objectives. [99131]

Ruth Kelly: The progress report on European economic reform, 'Meeting the Challenge; Economic Reform in Europe', was published on 17 February 2003, and describes progress made in meeting the Lisbon and Stockholm objectives.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 10 February, Official Report, columns 609–11W, on Lisbon and Stockholm Objectives, when he will publish a progress report on developments in European economic reform. [99132]

Ruth Kelly: The progress report on European economic reform, 'Meeting the Challenge; Economic Reform in Europe', was published on 17 February 2003. Copies are available in the Vote Office and the Library of the House.

Meetings

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether minutes of meetings between his Department's officials and representatives from the Isle of Man are published; [98219]

(2) whether meetings between officials for his Department and representatives of Jersey are held on Jersey; [98217]

(3) how often Treasury officials meet representatives from Gibraltar; and whether meetings are held purely when deemed necessary; [98215]

(4) what his Department's policy is regarding consultation with representatives of Guernsey on economic decisions that could potentially affect Guernsey. [98216]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 11 February 2002, Official Report, columns 114–15W.

Minimum Wage (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people in Nottingham, North are on the minimum wage. [98322]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Graham Allen dated 24 February 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question about the number of individuals in the Nottingham North parliamentary constituency on the National Minimum Wage (NMW). (98322)

Estimates for Parliamentary Constituencies are not available.

The Office for National Statistics (ONS) calculates estimates of the number of jobs paid less than NMW rates for the United Kingdom and Government Office Regions. A guide to measuring low pay and associated articles and data can be found on the National Statistics website at:

http://www.statistics.gov.uk/CCI/nugget.asp?ID = 188&Pos = 44&ColRank = l&Rank = 208.

Mobile Phones

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many mobile phones have been used and at what cost by (a) himself and Ministers in his Department, (b) Special Advisers in his Department and (c) his departmental officials in each year since 1997; [98577]

(2) how many mobile phones used by (a) himself, his Ministers of State, and Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, (b) his Department's Special Advisers and (c) his Department officials have been listed as lost or stolen on an annual basis since 1997. [98579]

Ruth Kelly: Comprehensive information about mobile phone costs is not available in the form requested.

Information on thefts of mobile phones is not disaggregated, although the global costs to the Treasury of theft and fraud for the last five years were given in my answers of 21 January 2002, Official Report, column 651W and 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 611W.

Money Laundering

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 11 February 2003, Official Report, column 651W, whether discussions with the Law Society about the new money laundering regulation, and the EU second money laundering directive, have taken full account of the matters raised in the solicitors tribunal hearing in the matter of Sir Gerrard Anthony Neale on October 2002. [98410]

Ruth Kelly: The Treasury have been in consultation with the Law Society about the form of the proposed money laundering regulations 2003, which will implement the second EU directive on money laundering. The Treasury understand that the Society has already issued interim guidance to solicitors and is in the process of preparing detailed guidance on the application of the new regime to solicitors.

This case did not feature in the Law Society submissions or discussions.

Secondments

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals are loaned to HM Treasury from private accounting firms; how long the secondment is of each one; and what their responsibilities are. [99026]

Ruth Kelly: There are currently three people seconded into HM Treasury from private accounting firms.

Date	Duties
2 January 2002 to 30 June 2003 (18 months)	Finance Regulation and Industry Directorate—Head of Public Enterprise Partnership Team
24 September 2001 to 23 September 2003 (2 Years)	Budget and Public Finance Directorate—Advice on Tax policy
22 July 2002 to 21 July 2004 (2 years)	Financial Management, Reporting and Audit Directorate—Central Accountancy

Special Purpose Vehicles

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will impose a special tax on special purpose vehicles sold by tax advisers for tax avoidance purposes. [98427]

John Healey: The Government have demonstrated their strong commitment to combating tax avoidance by countering it with legislation on over 40 separate occasions since 1997. They continue to keep the tax system under review and have already announced their intention to legislate to counter a number of tax avoidance schemes in the forthcoming Finance Bill.

Spending Review

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update Table 1.3, page 16, of the 2002 Spending Review (Cm. 5570) to show changes to budgets and expenditure allocations made since the publication of this document; and if he will make a statement. [98431]

Mr. Boateng: Table B15 in the pre-budget report shows equivalent information. An updated table B15 will be published in this year's financial statement and budget report.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will announce the results of the next spending review; which years that will cover; and if he will make a statement. [98432]

Mr. Boateng: Spending plans for the financial years 2003–4 to 2005–6 were set out in the July 2002 Spending Review White Paper. Spending reviews are normally held every two years.

Student Work Placements

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many university students his Department and associated agencies have supported or sponsored with a work placement in the last year; what his policy is on work placements; what plans he has to develop such schemes; and what his policy is on paying their university fees. [98537]

Ruth Kelly: A total of 104 university students undertook a work or training placement in one of the Chancellor's Departments and agencies in the last year[1].

Under the Civil Service Commissioners Code, policies and plans on recruitment and work placements are delegated to individual departments and agencies. For example, these range from a plan by HM Treasury to continue to provide 'sandwich' work placements for students studying for economics or IT degrees, and to offer two summer development training placements in 2003; to plans by the Inland Revenue to offer up to 40 summer development training placements, four Windsor Fellowship placements, two placements for disabled students, and 10 internship placements this summer.

The Chancellor's departments and agencies do not contribute towards university fees, but provide paid work placements instead.

[1] The answer includes figures from HM Treasury, Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise, Office of Government Commerce, Debt Management Office, Valuation Office, Government Actuary's Department, Department of National Savings and Investments, and the Office of National Statistics, for students who began their placements during the period February 2002 to February 2003.

Tax Revenue Forecasts

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 10 February 2003, Official Report, column 607W, what plans he has to make forecasts of total tax revenues associated with GDP growth rates which fall outside his Department's GDP growth forecasts made in the pre-Budget report. [99126]

Ruth Kelly: In accordance with the requirements of the Code for Fiscal Stability, an interim forecast update, including projections for current revenues, was presented in the 2002 pre-Budget report. Projections will also be published in the forthcoming Budget.

There are no plans to make forecasts for total tax revenues associated with GDP growth rates that fall outside the forecast range. However, as set out in paragraph B17 of the 2002 pre-Budget report, if GDP growth were one percentage point higher than assumed over the coming year, public sector net borrowing might be approximately 0.5 percentage points lower in the current year and a further 0.2 percentage points lower in the following year.

Telephone Call Prices

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the potential loss in tax revenue resulting from lower telephone call prices following the Competition Commission Report on mobile termination charges. [94393]

John Healey: It is not possible to estimate the impact for the Exchequer as this will depend on the commercial decisions of the companies affected.

Unemployment (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what change there has been in the unemployed totals in Nottingham, North since June 1997. [98320]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Graham Allen dated 24 February 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question about unemployment in Nottingham North. (98320)

The Office for National Statistics (ONS) compiles unemployment statistics from the Labour Force Survey following the internationally standard International LabourOrganisation definition. For Parliamentary Constituencies, information about unemployment rates, but not levels, is available. This information is available on a yearly basis, but not for calendar months. The unemployment rate for the Nottingham North Constituency decreased by 7.6 percentage points from 15.6 per cent in the twelve months ending February 1998 down to 8.0 per cent in the twelve month period ending February 2002.

ONS also compiles statistics of claimants of unemployment-related benefits. The number of people in the Nottingham North Constituency claiming Jobseeker's Allowance decreased by 1,349 from 3,947 in June 1997 down to 2,598 in January 2003.

Working Families Tax Credit

Ann Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people in the Dewsbury area (a) are eligible for the working family tax credit and (b) have benefited from the working family tax credit in the last year for which figures are available. [98319]

Ruth Kelly: Information about the numbers eligible for working families tax credit (WFTC) is not available by constituency or by local authority.

The number of recipients of WFTC and disabled person's tax credit in each local authority and in each constituency are shown in "Working Families' and Disabled Person's Tax Credit Statistics. Geographical analyses" for each quarter. Copies are on the Inland Revenue website, www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) families and (b) individuals in Nottingham benefit from the working families tax credit. [98255]

Dawn Primarolo: The number of families with children in each local authority receiving Working Families Tax Credit or Disabled Person's Tax Credit in each quarter is shown in "Working Families' and Disabled Person's Tax Credit Statistics: Geographical analyses", which is available on the web site www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk. This also shows how many of these families are headed by lone parents, the rest being headed by couples, and the number of dependent children in the families.

NORTHERN IRELAND

A2

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what priority is being given to upgrading the A2 between Carrickfergus and Jordanstown, Co Antrim; and if he will make a statement. [98817]

Angela Smith: I have asked the Chief Executive of Roads Service to write to the hon. Gentleman in response to this question. A copy of the letter is attached and will be placed in the Library.

Airport Police

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland pursuant to the answer of 11 February 2003, Official Report, column 681W, on airport police, if he has taken into account his powers under Article 19 of the Airports (Northern Ireland) Order 1994 in relation to the Government's consideration of the contents and recommendations of Sir John Wheeler's report into policing at UK airports. [98622]

Jane Kennedy: Sir John's report acknowledges the powers that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has in terms of authorising an airport operator to appoint constables at an airport, and cites Belfast International Airport as an example of this. We await the initiatives that emerge from the outworking of Sir John's findings and recommendations.

Employment Discrimination

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what research the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland plans to fund concerning the causes and appropriate policy response to the employment and unemployment differential between Catholics and Protestants. [98212]

Mr. Browne: The Equality Commission for Northern Ireland plans to fund research in 2003–04 into economic activity given the evidence in the Labour Force Survey of differential rates of activity of Protestants and Roman Catholics in Northern Ireland.

The commission plans to utilise the results of the 2001 Population Census to review the comparative labour market position of Protestants and Roman Catholics in terms of:

employment/unemployment/economic inactivity occupation and industrial sector.

This research will be carried out following release of cross tabulations of Census data by the Department of Finance and Personnel. Release of the census data is expected by March 2003 (approximately) and the review will be completed by March 2004.

The Equality Commission has also been encouraging employers to make use of the facility provided by the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 to recruit from those not in employment.

Fair Employment and Treatment Order

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what research the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland is funding concerning the effectiveness of the Fair Employment and Treatment Order 1998; and what proportion this represents of the total research budget of the commission for 2002–03. [98209]

Mr. Browne: The commission is currently undertaking research which will consider:

patterns and trends in employment; effectiveness of the affirmative action provisions in the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998; and the contextual framework e.g. feminisation of workforce, increased flexible working arrangements and changing educational outcomes.

These research findings will be published in June 2004.

The costs of this project, including publication of the results, will be spread across 2002–03, 2003–04 and 2004–05. A significant element of the research has or will be undertaken without charge to Equality Commission for Northern Ireland. Therefore, reflecting the proportion of the commission's research budget invested in the project is not appropriate.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many investigations the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland is undertaking that concern compliance with the Fair Employment and Treatment Order 1998; and what proportion this represents of the total investigations budget of the Commission for 2002–3. [98210]

Mr. Browne: The Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 enables the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland to conduct investigations for the purpose of assisting it to promote equality of opportunity. The Commission is not at present conducting any investigations under the Order.

The Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 places duties on employers with regard to registration and the monitoring and review of employment composition and practices. There is a high level of employer compliance with these duties.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases concerning an alleged breach of the Fair Employment and Treatment Order 1998 the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland is supporting financially; how many it supported in each year since 1999; and what proportion this represents of the total 2002–03 budget for supporting discrimination claims on all grounds. [98211]

Mr. Browne: In the 2002–03 financial year (up to 14 February 2003) the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland has approved support for 249 cases alleging a breach of the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998.

Since April 1999 the Equality Commission has supported the following number of cases alleging a breach of the Fair Employment and Treatment Order 1998:

	Number
April 1999-March 2000	123
April 2000-March 2001	149
April 2001-March 2002	291
April 2002-February 2003	249

Claims alleging a breach of the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 for which invoices have been received during the first 10 months of the financial year 2002–03 account for 33 per cent. of the overall legal programme spend on supporting discrimination claims on all grounds. Invoices received and paid in 2002–03 will include costs associated with previous years' approvals.

Firearms (Security Personnel)

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on which occasions Belfast International Airport officers have undergone the procedures to re-classify in relation to the carrying and use of firearms since the privatisation of the airport in 1994; and if he will make a statement. [98569]

Jane Kennedy: The dates on which officers from Belfast International Airport have received firearms/reclassification training since privatisation in 1994 are:

1995

February 2, 6, 7 and 9

November 13, 15, 16 and 20

Hospitality Association of Northern Ireland

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much public funding, including European grant aid was allocated to the Hospitality Association of Northern Ireland between 1995 and 1999; and which agencies allocated the funding. [98418]

Jane Kennedy: (a) Hospitality Association of Northern Ireland (HANI) received European funding from the Tourism and Hospitality Training Council (THTC) acting as an agent for the Training and Employment Agency (now Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) as follows:

Project	£
1. Training Resource Library	4,850.00
2. Multiskilling Programme	73,936.17
3. Multiskilling Programme 2	84,337.88
4. International Culinary Olympics, Berlin 1996	12,129.66
5. SELECT	220,935.04

(b) HANI received the following European funding from the Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB) (which is part of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment) under the NITB Marketing Support Scheme:

NITB Marketing Support Scheme £36,418.82

(c) HANI received funding from Department for Employment and Learning for sectoral training courses as follows:

Hospitality and Catering Management Projects £179,830.

(d) HANI received contractual payments as a provider to the Jobskills programme:

Jobskills £251,052.45.

Independent International Commission Decommissioning

Mr. Gregory Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much public funding has been provided for the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning, broken down by (a) categories of expenses, (b) salaries for members, (c) expenses and salaries for staff, (d) accommodation, (e) other payments made to those acting on behalf of the Commission and (f) payments made to those meeting the Commission. [95258]

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how much money has been spent in respect of the remuneration of each of the members of the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning in each year since its formation; [83100]

(2) how much expenditure has been incurred by Her Majesty's Government in respect of travel by each member of the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning in each year since its formation. [83101]

Jane Kennedy: The Government does not hold the information in the form requested. However, the Commission has agreed to make available copies of its audited accounts. Copies of these have been placed in the Library.

Local Government Finance

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consultation took place with local government representatives on the implications of the new formulae for distributing financial support to local councils through the general grant. [98366]

Angela Smith: Consultation on proposals for a new formula for the distribution of the resources element of general grant to district councils took place with a wide range of interests including local government representatives between 1 September and 13 November 2000, to consider initial suggestions, and, subsequently, on more detailed proposals, between 21 September and 17 December 2001. This was followed by consultation on the draft primary legislation between 10 and 23 May 2002 and between 19 September and 21 October 2002 on the draft regulations which give effect to the new formula.

During consultation on the proposals the Department of the Environment arranged a workshop for members of the Association of Local Government Finance Officers. Presentations were also made to the Northern Ireland Assembly's Environment Committee; individual MLAs; the National Association of Councillors, and to individual district councils, as requested. Members of the Department of the Environment's Finance Working Group, which includes representatives of the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives, the Association of Local Government Finance Officers and Local Government Audit, were regularly informed about developments relating to the new formula.

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the level of the reduction to the general grant was notified to the affected local councils. [98367]

Angela Smith: All 26 district councils were advised on 23 December 2002 of their allocations of general grant for 2003–04 under the new statutory formula for calculating the resources element of general grant. The new formula applies from 1 April 2003.

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the change of the general grant proposed for 2003–04 is as a proportion of the budget of the councils affected for 2002–03. [98368]

Angela Smith: General grant has two elements—a resources element and a derating element. The proposed changes in the resources element of general grant for 2003–04 are expressed as a percentage of district councils' estimated expenditure for 2002–03, in the table. Complete information on the proposed changes in the derating element in 2003–04 will not be available until the end of March 2003.

District council	Percentage change from 2002–03 to 2003–04
Antrim Borough Council	No grant
Ards Borough Council	-0.43
Armagh City and District Council	-4.41
Ballymena Borough Council	No grant
Ballymoney Borough Council	+ 0.40
Banbridge District Council	-1.53
Belfast City Council	No grant
Carrickfergus Borough Council	-11.08
Castlereagh Borough Council	No grant
Coleraine Borough Council	No grant
Cookstown District Council	+ 7.76
Craigavon Borough Council	-0.45
Derry City Council	+ 2.90
Down District Council	-3.49
Dungannon and South Tyrone Borough Council	+ 5.90
Fermanagh District Council	+ 9.30
Larne Borough Council	+ 2.48
Limavady Borough Council	+ 5.22
Lisburn City Council	No grant
Magherafelt District Council	+ 5.33
Moyle District Council	+ 1.43
Newry and Mourne District Council	-7.45
Newtownabbey Borough Council	No grant
North Down Borough Council	No grant
Omagh District Council	+ 7.00
Strabane District Council	+ 2.81

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will be introducing transitional arrangements for the changes to the general grant. [98369]

Angela Smith: Yes. I intend to make available financial support to assist with the transition to the new statutory formula for calculating the resources element of general grant amounting to some £3 million over the next two financial years.

Plastic Bags

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to introduce a levy on the use of plastic bags; and if he will make a statement. [96390]

Angela Smith: There are currently no plans to introduce a plastic bags tax. Instead, as the Chancellor said in his pre-Budget statement, the Government will be considering how the use of economic instruments can be extended to provide a more comprehensive and coherent framework for waste management more generally, as well as the scope for using other policies to tackle packaging and encourage producer responsibility. However, in both Northern Ireland and the United Kingdom generally, a number of positive steps are being taken to encourage a significant reduction in the use of plastic bags in order to protect the environment, decrease the amount of visible litter and reduce the volume of plastic bags going to landfill.

A key element in achieving these results is to change consumer behaviour. In Northern Ireland, I am pleased to confirm that, following negotiations with representatives of the major supermarket chains, a Retail Charter was introduced in October last year. This charter takes a pro-active approach to educating both retailers and consumers in the application of sustainable environmental policies to their shopping habits, a message which has again been promoted in recent months, in the Department of the Environment's intensive 'Wake up to Waste' and 'Reduce, Reuse, Recycle' advertising campaigns.

A further key step in changing a culture of indiscriminate use and disposal of plastic bags will be the forthcoming review of litter legislation, which will identify and address any shortcomings in the existing body of litter legislation in Northern Ireland.

Police Service

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Roman Catholic applicants entered each recruitment competition since the formation of the Police Service of Northern Ireland. [98314]

Jane Kennedy: The numbers of Catholic applicants entering each recruitment competition for the Police Service of Northern Ireland to date are as follows:

	Number
Competition 1	2,815
Competition 2	1,891
Competition 3	1,640
Competition 4	1,480

These numbers consistently represent some 35 per cent. of the total applications in each of the four competitions.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland pursuant to his answer of 11 February 2003, Official Report, column 683W, whether (a) the Special Branch Portal Unit and (b) the response unit from Strandtown PSNI station provided the initial presence at the arrest for drugs by Customs and Excise referred to in his reply; what the response time was; and if he will make a statement. [98623]

Jane Kennedy: On 19 January 2003, personnel from the Special Branch Portal Unit were in attendance at the scene along with Customs and Excise personnel when the drugs arrest was made at Belfast City Airport. No assistance was required from PSNI at Strandtown.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland pursuant to his answer of 11 February, Official Report, column 683W, on Belfast City Airport, whether (a) the Special Branch Portal Unit and (b) the response unit from Strandtown PSNI station provided the initial presence following the complaints of (i) the alleged assault in flight, (ii) three disruptive passengers and (iii) one drunk person; what the response time was in each case; and if he will make a statement. [98624]

Jane Kennedy: In relation to each of these complaints the following action was taken:

(i) Alleged assault in flight—Report of disturbance on BMI airbus, in-bound on 9 October 2002. PSNI Strandtown were contacted at 1305 hrs. Two tactical support group call signs and a PSNI Strandtown call sign were in attendance at the scene upon arrival of the flight at 1316hrs. Response time 11 minutes.

(ii) Three disruptive passengers—On 12 July 2002, a person was reported drunk on board an in-bound FLYBE flight from Gatwick. Response requested from PSNI Strandtown at 1045 hrs and arrived at 1057 hrs, before the arrival of the flight. Response time 12 minutes.

(iii) Drunk person—On 24 December 2002 there was a report of a drunken person in the terminal foyer. A PSNI Strandtown call sign was tasked at 2000 hrs and arrived at the scene at 2011 hrs. Response time 11 minutes.

Personnel from Special Branch Portal Unit, Belfast City Airport, were also in attendance at the scene of these complaints prior to the arrival of police from PSNI Strandtown.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what procedures, tests, and exercises constitute the process by which PSNI officers reclassify in relation to use of firearms; and if he will make a statement. [98394]

Jane Kennedy: The training comprises an introductory Health and Safety input, a refresher handling class, a live fire qualification shoot and an interactive lesson on Human Rights and Police Use of Firearms.

Pollution Directive

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the impact on Northern Ireland of the UK's non-implementation of the EU Directive on integrated pollution prevention and control rules; what representations he has made; what fines will be imposed; and what steps are being taken to rectify the situation. [98370]

Angela Smith: At present the Industrial Pollution Control (Northern Ireland) Order 1997 provides for an integrated approach to the control of pollution from industrial processes. This provides for a strong and effective system of control and has been successful in providing a better and cleaner environment.

However, the United Kingdom also has an obligation to comply with EC Directive 96/91 on integrated pollution prevention and control, which provides for a similar system. The delay in the introduction of the transposing legislation in Northern Ireland has meant that the United Kingdom has been unable to meet fully its obligations. The Commission has therefore brought infraction proceedings against the UK.

The necessary legislation has now been introduced in Northern Ireland with the introduction of the Environment (Northern Ireland) Order 2002 and the Pollution Prevention and Control Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2003. The United Kingdom now takes the view that it has met fully its obligations to comply with the Directive.

Translink

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of Translink's increased customer base, as set out in the latest edition of the Northern Ireland Road and Rail Transport Statistics Quarterly Bulletin, is accounted for by (a) paying customers, (b) those entitled to free travel, (c) new business and (d) ticket price increases. [98265]

Angela Smith: Translink has introduced a new integrated ticketing system on Citybus from 1 October 2001 and on Ulsterbus from 1 April 2002. The new system has not yet been implemented in Northern Ireland Railway hence information is not available to answer questions (a), nor is any information available which would identify new customers (question (c)).

For question (b) it is estimated that the increase in patronage on Citybus is mostly attributable to over 65-year-olds who are entitled to free travel, while less than half of the increase on Ulsterbus resulted from the senior citizen market. It is not thought that there has been any increase in usage of the railways by the elderly sector who are entitled to free travel.

For question (d) there was a 4.5 per cent. fares increase in public transport. Overall receipts increased by £0.9 million which was an increase of 6.6 per cent. over the period. Therefore 68 per cent. of the increase in receipts was due to ticket price increases.

Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on Northern Ireland's compliance with the Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive. [98336]

Angela Smith: The number of works complying with the Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive in Northern Ireland for the years 1999 to 2001 is:

1999—8 out of a total of 15 complied—which gives a compliance rate of 53 per cent.

2000—8 out of a total of 15 complied—which gives a compliance rate of 53 per cent.

2001—13 out of a total of 37 complied—which gives a compliance rate of 35 per cent.

The apparent fall in the rate of compliance between 2000 and 2001 reflects the phased introduction of targets under the UWWT Directive bringing more waste-water treatment works within its scope. For the year 2002, a total of 35 works have been assessed with the results still needing to be confirmed. However, the initial indication is that compliance is in the region of 50 per cent.—similar to 1999 and 2000.

There is a legacy of under-funding of Northern Ireland's infrastructure. However, the upgrading of Northern Ireland's water and sewerage services to meet EU regulations is a high priority. Over £250 million will be invested on the waste-water infrastructure over the next three years. This increased level of investment has been made possible by the allocation of an additional £180 million for the wider water and sewerage services over the next three years, as was announced in the Budget statement in December 2002. In addition, DRD is actively considering with the Strategic Investment Board the potential for delivering a sizeable Public Private Partnership (PPP) programme which could include a number of wastewater treatment works, as part of the Strategic Investment Programme.

This major increase in investment will deliver significant progress towards full compliance with the Directive.

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will reintroduce the moratorium on planning applications for developments that would (a) cause and (b) be likely to cause a breach of the Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive. [98337]

Angela Smith: Last year planning applications in a number of areas in Northern Ireland were held on a temporary basis, as a precautionary measure, as a result of concerns expressed by the Department of the Environment's Environment and Heritage Service about the environmental compliance and pollution implications of further development. There was no moratorium on the determination of planning applications.

Discussions took place between Environment and Heritage Service, Planning Service and Water Service and, as a result, Environment and Heritage Service and Water Service agreed an expanded and reprioritised Capital Works Programme to carry out the improvement works to the sewage treatment and sewerage systems necessary in order to ensure compliance with EU Directives and national standards. On the basis of the agreed programme, the Executive Committee of the Northern Ireland Assembly decided that planning applications that had been held on a precautionary basis and future planning applications in the locations affected would be processed to a conclusion. Dermot Nesbitt MLA announced the Executive Committee's decision in a statement to the Northern Ireland Assembly on 7 October 2002.

It was agreed that the Department of the Environment and the Department for Regional Development would monitor the implementation of the capital works programme and compliance with the relevant environmental standards in order to allow the agreed approach to be reviewed, if necessary.

There are no grounds for altering the policy approach agreed by the Executive Committee at this stage.

Water Service

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on whether Crown immunity is to continue for the Water Service of Northern Ireland. [98335]

Angela Smith: Water Service currently enjoys Crown Immunity from prosecution because it is an Executive Agency of a Central Government Department, the Department for Regional Development.

On 11 December 2002, the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, South (Mr. Pearson) announced our intention to introduce self-financing arrangements for Water Service, which will require the introduction of domestic water and sewerage charges. I wish to ensure that water and sewerage services are delivered as efficiently and effectively as possible to ensure that future household charges are fair and affordable. This will require reform of the arrangements for the delivery of these services, and may require a change in the organisational status of Water Service.

No decision has been taken on this issue yet, and I intend to engage in full and inclusive consultation on any proposals for change. However, should a decision be taken to move responsibility for the delivery of water and sewerage services outside Central Government, Crown Immunity would not continue for Water Service.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Cultural Identity

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she last discussed with other EU Ministers for Culture the strengthening of a common cultural identity; and what measures are being taken for this purpose. [97895]

Mr. Caborn: The Treaty establishing the European Community does not provide for strengthening a common cultural identity, but does encourage bringing the common cultural heritage to the fore while respecting regional and national diversity within the Member States. In order to achieve this the Council of Culture Ministers agreed the Council Resolution of 25 June 2002 on a new work plan on European co-operation in the field of culture. My right hon and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts attended the culture and audiovisual session of the Education, Youth and Culture Council in Brussels on 11 November 2002, accompanied by Dr Elaine Murray, Deputy Minister for Culture, Tourism and Sport in the Scottish Executive. They discussed with other European Union Culture Ministers progress on the new work plan and agreed further resolutions, e.g. on mobility of persons and circulation of works in the cultural sector (Report in Official Report, 20 November 2002, column 143W). Future meetings of European Union Ministers for Culture will discuss further progress on the new work plan.

Free Television Licences

Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many pensioners have claimed free television licences in Dewsbury in each year since 1997. [98220]

Mr. Caborn: Free television licences for the over-75s were introduced in November 2000; no free licences were available prior to that date. TV Licensing, who administer the concession as agents for the BBC, are not able to provide geographical breakdowns of the number of free licences issued. However, estimates based on the 1991 Census indicate that there were approximately 5,100 people aged 75 or over living in the Dewsbury constituency.

Gulf War Rally

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what mechanisms she will use to ensure that the numbers attending the anti-Gulf War rally in Hyde Park on 15 February will be accurately counted. [97957]

Mr. Caborn: I understand that the Metropolitan Police will make their own estimate of the numbers attending, as they usually do at these events. Our main concern, and that of the Royal Parks, is to ensure as far as possible that the rally takes place safely for all those taking part.

National Lottery

Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what Lottery money has been allocated to projects in the Dewsbury area in each of the last five years. [98362]

Mr. Caborn: The following table sets out the awards that have been made in the Dewsbury constituency since 1998 to date and is broken down by calendar year.

Year	Value of awards made to projects within the constituency of Dewsbury
1998	538,261
1999	33,915
2000	69,448
2001	743,757
2002	303,499

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

E-mail

Mr. Tyler: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for North Cornwall on 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 584W, on e-mail, what steps have been taken to meet hon. Members' concerns that legitimate communications are not being blocked; what filters are in place to block unsolicited spam messages; and if he will make a statement. [98208]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: As I indicated in my answer to the hon. Member on 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 584W, the sender of any e-mail that is blocked will be notified and invited to contact the intended recipient, who, by contacting the Parliamentary Communications Directorate (PCD) Helpdesk, can arrange for the e-mail to be swiftly unblocked. This prevents legitimate e-mails being lost.

PCD are monitoring the system, which can be easily modified in response to feedback from hon. Members and staff. For example, seven legitimate e-mails about the Sexual Offences Bill were inadvertently blocked: the filter has now been adjusted so that this does not happen. I am aware of concerns that legitimate e-mails might be blocked because they are written in Welsh; this is certainly not the case either for Welsh or for any other language.

During the first three weeks that the filter was in place, it blocked 3,465 of the 555,000 e-mails received, or about one in every 160 e-mails. The PCD Helpdesk received only 29 unblocking requests, which is less than one per cent. of the e-mails blocked. These figures suggest that the proportion of e-mails which have been incorrectly delayed as a result of the e-mail filter is around one in every 20,000 received.

Only inappropriate incoming e-mails are filtered. No filters are currently in place to block other spam. After further consultation with the relevant domestic committees to determine the views and needs of Members, PCD plan to introduce a new service to help users of the Parliamentary Network identify and manage this additional nuisance.

CABINET OFFICE

Capital Projects

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will place the evaluations for Capital Modernisation Fund projects undertaken by the Cabinet Office since 1998 in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [97019]

Mr. Alexander: The Cabinet Office has secured funds for two projects from the Capital Modernisation Fund: the development of an e-infrastructure to support the delivery of public services online and e-government (including the Knowledge Network); and a secure Business Change Programme for the intelligence community enabled through modern technology. These projects are ongoing and evaluations have not yet been undertaken.

Civil Defence

Gregory Barker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps he is taking in terms of civil defence planning in (a) London, (b) the South East, (c) England and (d) the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [96251]

Mr. Alexander: The Civil Contingencies Secretariat, Cabinet Office, is responsible for emergency planning in England and Wales. It co-ordinates the development of civil protection arrangements involving Government Ministers, Government Departments, emergency services, local authorities, voluntary organisations and others. It works closely with the Devolved Administrations, which have responsibility for these matters, to ensure coherence of arrangements across the UK.

Much of the response to emergencies is based on multi-agency local emergency arrangements, developed within the clear guidelines set out by the Home Office. However, further measures have been taken to improve the regional planning capability:

The London Resilience Team was set up following the tragic events of 11 September 2001 to ensure that London has the best contingency plans possible. It works in support of the Minister of State for Local Government and the Regions and the Mayor of London to co-ordinate the emergency planning work of the London Boroughs, transport operators, emergency services, London health authorities and other civil authorities in London.

Regional Resilience Teams are being established, including for the South East of England, to improve the capability for regional emergency planning. These teams will assist in co-ordinating emergency planning within and across regions through the creation of Regional Resilience Forums.

E-Envoy

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what the measures of success are for the performance of the Government's e-envoy; and whether these have been achieved. [97592]

Mr. Alexander: The Office of the E-Envoy has three core Objectives: to develop the UK as a World Leader for electronic Business; to make all government services available electronically by 2005 with key services achieving high level of use; to ensure that everyone who wants it has access to the internet by 2005. Each month the E-Minister my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the E-envoy (Andrew Pinder) provide a joint report to the PM. These reports set out the progress on the UK Online Strategy. These are available through the e-envoy web site on www.e-envoy.gov.uk

In November 2002 the Office of the E-Envoy published the results of independent research measuring performance against the Government's target to make the UK the best environment in the world for e-commerce by 2002. The UK was found to rank second only to the USA in the benchmarked group of leading nations. The most recent survey of online government services showed that last summer 54 per cent. of services were enabled.

UK Online Centres are an integral part of the Government's aim to ensure that everyone who wants it has access to the internet by 2005. The initial target for the introduction of UK Online Centres has been met and exceeded with the delivery of over 6,000 UK online centres at the end of 2002.

Senior Civil Service

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proportion of vacancies in the Senior Civil Service were filled through after completion; and if he will make a statement. [99097]

Mr. Alexander: The 2001/2 Annual Report of the Civil Service Commissioners states that 200 candidates were approved for appointment to the Senior Civil Service (SCS) that year following Open Competition. This represents 56% of all SCS entrants in 2001/2.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many Senior Civil Servants have spent time working in (a) local government, (b) the health service, (c) the voluntary sector and (d) the private sector (i) before they joined the Senior Civil Service and (ii) through exchange programmes; and if he will make a statement. [99098]

Mr. Alexander: From information held centrally on the experience of senior civil servants as at 1st April 2002:

(i) Prior to the Civil Service:

Experienced in Private Sector: 673 known out of 3507

Experienced in Voluntary Sector: 67 known out of 3507

Experienced in Public Sector: 392 known out of 3507

(information on local government experience and experience in the Health Service is not collected separately)

(ii) No experience prior to the Civil Service, but through exchange programmes:

Experienced in Private Sector: 67 known out of 3507

Experienced in Voluntary Sector: 7 known out of 3507

Experienced in Public Sector: 63 known out of 3507.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Arms Exports (Israel)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what types of arms were exported to Israel in each of the last five years; and if she will make a statement. [98361]

Nigel Griffiths: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) on 18 March 2002, Official Report, column 54W.

Benefit Payments

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the effect on post offices in Derbyshire of the change in payment of benefits from over-the-counter to direct bank transfer. [98893]

Mr. Timms: No such assessment has been made by the Department. The migration of benefit payment to ACT begins this year and the Post Office's strategy is to respond to that challenge with a range of banking and other services. How the migration of benefit payments affects the revenue of post offices will depend on a number of factors, not least how benefit recipients and other post office customers respond to change. The income from the various contracts Post Office Ltd. has with the spending Departments and various financial institutions, and the remuneration of sub-postmasters for banking services, is a commercial matter between the parties.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions she has had with EU colleagues regarding EU approval for the exemption from the Climate Change Levy of the coal mine methane industry; and if she will make a statement. [98508]

Mr. Wilson: The use of coal mine methane directly as a fuel in industrial processes is already exempt from the Climate Change Levy. The Department of Trade and Industry have submitted a State Aid Application to the European Commission for exemption from the Climate Change Levy for electricity produced from coal mine methane. The commission has opened an investigation under Article 88(2) of the Treaty to determine whether the proposed aid is approvable. They will be inviting comments from member states and interested parties. We have received the formal notification of this decision from the commission and DTI officials are currently preparing an initial response and considering what other action will be necessary to secure the State Aid Approval.

Coal Miners' Compensation

Jeff Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reasons a second medical examination to assess the services proportion of coal industry vibration white finger claims is required; what additional (a) resources and (b) expenditure have been set aside for this purpose; and when he expects all claims to be settled. [97968]

Mr. Wilson: In addition to the general damages paid to those suffering from vibration white finger (VWF) my Department is responsible for compensation to certain claimants who are prevented from carrying out everyday tasks such as DIY and gardening because of the severity of their VWF. Therefore, in accordance with common law it is necessary to identify to what extent VWF itself has caused these difficulties. The second medical examination is designed to identify any other conditions, or co-morbidities, that may impact upon a claimant's ability to undertake the task claimed for. The existing medical examination for VWF was not designed to identify such conditions, which is why a second medical in these circumstances is necessary.

Resources for this second medical, or Services MAP, are already being put in place. The Department announced on 6 February 2003 that Aon Health Solutions (AHS) has been appointed as the new medical provider for this process. We are now involved actively with all our contract partners towards starting medical assessments by the end of April this year. Currently there are 60 adjusters at IRISC preparing claims for the Services MAP. Resources at AHS will be updated over time in line with the volumes of claims passing through to the medical stage of the process.

It is not possible to make firm financial estimates of the cost of Services claims until the numbers of those making claims is clearer. But this is a legal liability and the Department will meet whatever it costs. As well as having financial implications, the final numbers will also impact on the time scale involved. It is hoped to have the majority of claims through the Services MAP by the end of 2005; however, this is significantly dependent on the full cooperation of solicitors in getting claims documentation to our claims handlers.

Coalmine Methane

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the Renewables Obligation will be extended to cover coal mine methane. [98509]

Mr. Wilson: The Government consider that extending the Renewables Obligation to include coal mine methane would not be consistent with the objectives of the Obligation; coal mine methane is, by definition not a renewable.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the (a) role of coal mine methane and (b) its importance in the security of UK future energy requirements. [98562]

Mr. Wilson: Although coal mine methane currently contributes some 30MW to the total 74,000MW generating capacity in the UK, the Government recognise and value the environmental benefits the industry provides by tapping the methane emissions and putting them to good use. We are very supportive of this industry and are keen to help it expand so that it can continue to reduce these emissions throughout the UK. We have already demonstrated this support through our securing exemption from the climate change levy for electricity generated from CMM in last year's budget, and this is currently being cleared with the European Commission.

The Government's conclusions on the role of CMM in the security of UK future energy supply will be made public when the White Paper is published shortly.

Cruickshank Report

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what steps have been taken to implement the Cruickshank report recommendations for regulating the charges on small businesses for credit and debit card transactions; [96650]

(2) what plans she has to establish a payments regulator within the Office of Fair Trading. [96649]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The Cruickshank report on Competition in UK Banking concluded that there was a profound lack of competition in the provision of payment services and recommended the setting up of a regulator to bring about improved competition in this sector. In his March 2000 Budget speech, the Chancellor announced that the Government would legislate to ensure the payments system is open to new competition. The Government remain committed to introducing legislation to give the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) new powers to promote effective competition in payment systems—and will do so as soon as parliamentary time allows.

Progress has already been made through, for example, reforms to the governance structures of the main UK payment systems. The Government welcome these moves by payment system participants to address the competition issues identified by the Cruickshank report and urges the industry to continue with these reforms.

The Cruickshank report did not specifically recommend regulating the charges on small businesses for credit and debit card transactions. What it did recommend, however, was that wholesale prices—such as interchange fees—should generally be derived through a process that is transparent to final users, and that prices should be based on legitimate costs and should anticipate achievable cost reductions. It is envisaged that the Government's proposed legislation will include provisions designed to promote efficient wholesale pricing. This might reasonably be expected to bring about benefits to all end-users of payment services, including small businesses.

To promote its understanding of how payment systems operate, and to help pave the way for its prospective powers, the OFT announced on 27 November that it would conduct an empirical study into recent payment system developments. The terms of reference of this study were published on 31 January 2003—and include issues related to pricing in the credit and debit card markets. The OFT has undertaken to publish a report outlining its assessment and conclusions in spring 2003.

Icelandic Trawlermen

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many former Icelandic trawlermen had their claims for compensation rejected because of breaks in service in each of the four main distant water fishing ports. [98477]

Nigel Griffiths: I regret that this information could be compiled only at disproportionate cost.

Trawlermen

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been paid out to how many trawlermen, and how many claims have been (a) rejected and (b) reduced because of breaks in service for each of the main distant water ports, under her compensation scheme for former Icelandic trawlermen. [98478]

Nigel Griffiths: At mid-February 2003, £40.2 million in compensation had been paid to 4,653 former Icelandic water trawlermen. About 2,900 claimants had been assessed as not qualifying for compensation. I regret that there are no figures about how many claims have been rejected and reduced because of gaps in service in each of the main distant water ports. This information could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the reasons underlying the treatment of (a) compulsory periods of service on North Sea fishing boats and (b) periods spent in prison in calculating service for the purposes of her compensation scheme for Icelandic trawlermen; and how (a) and (b) are treated under redundancy legislation. [98479]

Nigel Griffiths: The continuity of service rules under the Government's compensation scheme were extremely generous to claimants. In general, service was regarded as continuous regardless how many gaps a trawlerman had had between voyages on Icelandic water vessels, or how long those gaps had been, or what the reasons for them had been.

The only exception was where, during a gap of longer than 12 weeks, the former trawlerman had done other work—which included, for these purposes, other fishing work on vessels that had never made voyages to Icelandic waters. The rationale for this was that if a former trawlerman had done other work during a lengthy gap between voyages on Icelandic water vessels, it would not have been right to have regarded him as having remained dependent upon the industry during that period.

One consequence of the generosity of this aspect of the scheme rules was that time spent in prison did not break continuity, provided the former trawlerman's most recent work before going into prison had been on an Icelandic water vessel, and that he had resumed work on such a vessel after his release, having done no other work in between.

The continuity of service rules under the statutory redundancy payments scheme are different, and much stricter. In particular, there is a requirement for continuous service with the same employer (or an associated employer), whereas under the compensation scheme there was no such requirement.

Motor Transport Fuels

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will set out her policy for the adequate supply and distribution of motor transport fuels for the public service in all areas of the UK; and if she will make a statement. [98043]

Mr. Wilson: The public services are responsible for making their own provisions for obtaining transport fuels. However, the Department is responsible for contingency planning for any national emergency resulting in severe fuel shortages. These plans include measures for the supply and allocation of fuel to essential priority uses, including transport fuels for essential public services throughout the UK.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of how much radioactive material will enter the Irish Sea if (a) all spent nuclear fuel from British Energy's advanced gas-cooled reactors is stored and (b) the current reprocessing contracts continue for the remainder of the projected life of each of British Energy's advanced gas-cooled reactors. [91924]

Mr. Meacher: I have been asked to reply.

The amounts of low-level radioactivity that would need to be discharged into the Irish Sea over the long term under either of these scenarios cannot at present be quantified.

Ofgem

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the members of the Board of Ofgem and the companies they have worked for. [86189]

Mr. Wilson: The Gas and Electricity Markets Authority comprises the following members. Biographical details areas are drawn from Ofgem publications.

Callum McCarthy, Chairman of the Authority and Chief Executive of Ofgem. Former senior civil servant at the Department of Trade and Industry; subsequently Director of Corporate Finance at Kleinwort Benson; Managing Director and Deputy Head of Corporate Finance at BZW; Chief Executive Officer of Barclays Bank group operations in Japan before moving to head the Bank's businesses in North America.

Gill Whittington, Chief Operating Officer. Former Chief Executive of the media divisions of Booker plc and subsequently of Booker Services; then Director of Strategy at Guy's and St. Thomas' NHS Trust.

John Neilson, Managing Director, Customers and Supply. Senior civil servant. Dr. Eileen Marshall CBE, Managing Director, Competition and Trading Arrangements. A former stockbroker and university lecturer, Dr. Marshall has held position in the office of Electricity Regulation and the Office of Gas Supply.

Richard Ramsay, Managing Director, Regulation and Financial Affairs. Formerly with Hill Samuel; BZW; and Ivory and Sime.

Sir Keith Stuart (non-executive). Formerly Director, then Chairman, of Seeboard.

Richard Farrant (non-executive). Non-executive Chairman of the Banking Code Standard Board. Formerly Chief Executive of the Securities and Futures Authority, then Chief Operating Officer and Managing Director of the Financial Services Authority.

Professor Leonard Waverman (non-executive). Professor of Economics at London Business School. Former part-time member of the Ontario Energy Board.

James Starchan (non-executive). Chief Executive of the Royal National Institute for Deaf People. Formerly a Managing Director of Merrill Lynch.

Margaret Ford (non-executive). Chief executive officer of Good Practice Limited. Chairman of English Partnerships.

John Belcher (non-executive). Chief Executive of Anchor Trust.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will set out the term and salary of each member of the Ofgem Board. [86194]

Mr. Wilson: The Chair was appointed for a period of five years (including his previous terms as Director General of Gas Supply and Director General of Electricity Supply) to 31 October 2003. Other executive members are appointed on an ex-officio basis for renewable periods of two years. The latest annual report of the Office of Gas and Electricity Markets (2001–02) shows the salaries of executive members as follows:

£000

Executive member	Salary
Callum McCarthy	160–165
Dr. Eileen Marshall	120–125
John Neilson	95–100
Richard Ramsay	140–145
Gill Whittington	110–115

During the same period, non-executive members each received remuneration of £12,000 per annum, and are appointed for periods ranging from one to three years to facilitate continuity.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the recruitment consultants used in the appointment of the Director General of Ofgem cost; and if she will make a statement. [86202]

Mr. Wilson: Fees and expenses of £45,373.80 were paid to the recruitment consultants in 1998.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her answer of 27 January, ref.86201, if she will name (a) the firm of recruitment consultants retained by the Department under a call-off contract which assisted with the process of appointment of the combined post of Director General of Gas Supply and Director General of Electricity Supply and Chairman-designate of the Gas and Electricity Markets Authority and (b) the other appointments with which the firm assists. [94537]

Mr Wilson: PriceWaterhouseCoopers assisted the Department in this recruitment under the call-off contract. In 1998 no central records are held on other appointments on which the firm may have assisted.

Post Offices

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post offices there were in (a) the Edinburgh, West parliamentary constituency, (b) the City of Edinburgh local authority area and (c) Scotland, in each year since 1992. [87166]

Mr. Timms: I am informed by Post Office Ltd. that historic data in the forms requested are not available as the company does not require these data for operational reasons.

However, in 1999, the Post Office undertook a special exercise to determine the number of post offices in each parliamentary constituency in response to the then hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington on 29 November 1999, Official Report, column 22W. I further understand from Post Office Ltd. that it compiled a list of post offices by parliamentary constituency as of 20 April 2002 showing their classification as urban or rural offices. At the time this list was compiled, 21 post offices were listed for Edinburgh West constituency. A copy of the full list is held in the Libraries of the House.

Post Office Ltd. further informs me that data by country before 1998 is not available. However the numbers of post offices operating in Scotland over the last five financial years are as follows:

End March	Number operating
1998	2,051
1999	2,026
2000	1,999
2001	1,936
2002	1,907

I am also informed by Post Office Ltd. that revision of data has affected individual country totals.

Science Research Investment Fund

Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what formula was used to determine allocations to universities of the Science Research Investment Fund for 2004 to 2006; and what factors underlay the allocation made to (a) the University of Teesside and (b) other universities in the North East. [98809]

Ms Hewitt: Science Research Investment Fund (SRIF) allocations to 123 higher education institutions in England, including the University of Teesside and other universities in the north-east, were made using a formula based on institutions' research income.

South West RDA

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many staff work in each department of the South West RDA. [98302]

Alan Johnson: In the South West Regional Development Agency there are in each department the following:

Development: 94 staff (including two student surveyors)
Enterprise and Innovation: 71 staff
Corporate Services: 29 staff
Strategy and Communications: 36 staff

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many projects were started by the South West RDA in (a) 2000–01, (b) 2001–02 and (c) 2002–03. [98303]

Alan Johnson: Since the advent of single pot funding, i.e. from 1 April 2002—end January 2003, 219 projects have been started by, that is, received funding approval from, the South West Regional Development Agency.

The information is not available for earlier years.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Bank Accounts (Inspections)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if she will consult the authorities in (a) Jersey, (b) Guernsey and (c) the Isle of Man about the extension of the clauses relating to the inspection of bank accounts in the Crime (International Co-operation) Bill to them. [98428]

Ms Rosie Winterton: No, we have not consulted the Islands about extending the Bill to them as they customarily enact their own legislation in the area of criminal justice—for example, in the Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) (Jersey) Law 2001, the Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) (Bailiwick of Guernsey) Law 2001 and the Criminal Justice Act 1991 (of Tynwald).

The clauses referred to implement the 2001 Protocol to the Mutual Legal Assistance Convention 2000. To opt in to this Convention, and the protocol, the Islands would first need to join the 1959 Council of Europe Convention on Mutual Assistance. They have passed the necessary legislation and any subsequent decision on whether to apply further agreements is a matter for them.

A copy of the Bill will be sent to the Insular Authorities once it receives Royal Assent and becomes an Act. Then it will be a matter for the Islands' discretion as to whether they wish to introduce any similar provisions into their own legislation. I would refer my hon. Friend to the Official Report of the Grand Committee on the Bill in the other place, columns GC42-GC46 (3 February 2003).

Child Abduction

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps her Department takes to discharge its obligations in relation to rights of access under Article 21 of the 1980 Hague Convention on International Child Abduction in the circumstances where the left-behind parent is in the UK and the abducted child is with its other parent in a state that has ratified the Hague Convention. [98250]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Article 21 of the Hague Convention allows applications via the designated Central Authorities to make arrangements for organising or securing the effective exercise of rights of access. Any parent resident in England, Wales and Northern Ireland, whose child is resident in another Hague Convention country, may apply to the Child Abduction Unit (which discharges the Lord Chancellor's functions as Central Authority under the 1980 Hague Convention). The unit will transmit the application to its counterpart in the other country, monitor the case, liaise with all interested parties and assist as necessary, for example with applications for legal aid.

Freedom of Information

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if she will make a statement on progress towards Government targets for the implementation of the Freedom of Information Act 2000. [98064]

Yvette Cooper: Pursuant to section 87(5) of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 a full report on the progress being made on implementation of the Act was laid before both Houses on 28 November 2002 (HC6). In line with this requirement a further report will be laid before the House before the end of November this year. In the meantime, the Act continues to be implemented according to the timetable announced by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor on 13 November 2001, Official Report, column 457.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Diego Garcia

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what stocks of landmines were held in (a) 2001 and (b) 2002 on Diego Garcia; what stocks are held there now; whose authority they are under; and if he will make a statement. [96389]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have received assurances from the US authorities that no anti-personnel landmines were stored on Diego Garcia during 2001 or 2002. In contrast to anti-personnel landmines, anti-tank mines are not banned weapons under international law and are not subject to ban under international treaties. No anti-tank mines were stored on Diego Garcia by the British authorities in 2001 or 2002. The storing of such mines by the US authorities would be a matter for them under the various international agreements regulating their defence facility on the island.

Capita

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many meetings (a) he and his Ministers of State, and Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, (b) Foreign and Commonwealth Special Advisers and (c) Foreign and Commonwealth officials have had with Capita employees and members of the Capita board since May 2001; what the purpose was of each meeting; and if he will make a statement. [98573]

Mr. Rammell: As with previous Administrations, and in line with exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, it is not this Government's normal practice to release details of specific meetings or their content, as some of these discussions may have taken place on a confidential basis. All such contacts are conducted in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code, the Civil Service Code, and Guidance for Civil Servants: Contacts with Lobbyists. Copies of these documents are available in the Libraries of the House.

Departmental Properties

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans there are to sell the San Francisco Consulate's residence; and if he will make a statement. [98125]

Mr. Rammell: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 25 November 2002 (Official Report, column 79W). Officials will visit San Francisco again in March to assess the market and survey possible properties for purchase.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many ambassadorial and consular offices and houses have been sold since 1997; and where these were. [98126]

Mr. Rammell: In the financial years from 1996–97 to 2002–03 the FCO has sold seven overseas offices, 13 head of mission/post residences, one combined office/residence and 222 staff houses and flats, as follows:

	Number

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much his Department spent on maintaining embassies and consulates in (a) EU countries and (b) the USA in the last 12 months. [98127]

Mr. Rammell: In financial year 2001/2002 the cost of maintaining the FCO's accommodation in European Union countries and the USA was £4,107,918 and £1,850,847 respectively.

Gibraltar

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is his policy to separate the sovereignty over military interests in Gibraltar from the sovereignty of Gibraltar as a whole. [98203]

Mr. MacShane: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary in this House on 12 July 2002, Official Report, column 1165.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is his policy to withdraw the proposals for shared sovereignty of Gibraltar that he set out in his statement of 12 July 2002. [98204]

Mr. MacShane: The Government's position remains that set out by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary in his statement of 12 July 2002, Official Report, column 1165. As we have consistently made clear, any proposals that would affect the sovereignty of Gibraltar would be put to its people in a referendum and they would decide.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Spanish Government about Gibraltar since 7 November 2002; and if he will list the topics discussed. [98205]

Mr. MacShane: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has had several discussions with his Spanish counterpart on a range of issues since 7 November 2002. None of these concentrated on Gibraltar. I met the Spanish Minister for Europe on 10 February. We discussed a number of issues, including Gibraltar.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy that change to the sovereignty of Gibraltar will only be agreed by the Government after the majority of the people of Gibraltar have consented to the proposed change. [98206]

Mr. MacShane: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given on this matter by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 6 November 2002, Official Report, column 279.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to uprate the value of pensions payable to Spanish pensioners who worked in Gibraltar prior to 1969. [98420]

Mr. MacShane: Under an agreement between the British and Spanish Governments in 1996, payments to all previous Gibraltar Social Insurance Fund contributors were fixed at 100% of accrued rights at 1988 levels and HMG assumed responsibility for payments to those not resident in Gibraltar. There are no plans to change this agreement.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the responsibilities of Gibraltar Community Care Limited in offering charitable assistance to elderly people resident in Gibraltar. [98421]

Mr. MacShane: Community Care was established in 1989 as a private charitable organisation with the objective of performing a range of charitable functions for elderly people living in Gibraltar, including assistance in meeting household costs which are particularly high in Gibraltar. Community Care has received substantial funding from the Government of Gibraltar.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his assessment of relations with the Government of Spain; what representations he has received from the Government of Spain since 7th November 2002; and when he plans to discuss with the Government of Spain the issue of (a) border queues, (b) access to air travel and (c) improved communications in Gibraltar. [98422]

Mr. MacShane: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has had several discussions with his Spanish counterpart on a range of issues since 7 November. None of these concentrated on Gibraltar. I met the Spanish Minister for Europe on 10 February. We discussed a number of issues, including Gibraltar. Our relations with the Government of Spain remain close.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the five economic tests for determining whether there is a clear and unambiguous case for UK entry into the eurozone will be applied separately to the economies of overseas territories, with particular reference to Gibraltar. [98833]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The Government has made clear that a comprehensive and rigorous assessment of the five economic tests will be made within two years of the start of this Parliament.

International Criminal Court

Tony Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what countries, other than the United States, have approached him with a view to negotiating a bilateral Article 98 treaty relating to the International Criminal Court; and what his policy is regarding this. [98214]

Mr. Rammell: The United States is alone in having approached us for such an Agreement. Should we receive further requests, our response would be guided by the ICC Statute and the Principles agreed by EU Foreign Ministers on 30 September 2002.

Iraq

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to pursue the claims of UK shareholders in respect of the 1974 nationalisation of the Iraqi oil industry. [98105]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I understand that we have no record of any recent approaches on this subject from British companies which held shares in the former Iraq Petroleum company prior to its nationalisation.

Indonesia

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Indonesia about the holding of the Reverend Rinaldy Damanik in prison; and if he will make a statement. [98360]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Reverend Damanik has been charged with firearms offences which need to be investigated thoroughly and fully. It is essential that the legal process take its full course and the Indonesian courts hear all the evidence. Under international law we are prohibited from intervening in individual cases before the courts in another sovereign country. However, we continue to stress to the Indonesian Government the importance of a fair and transparent judicial system, and of applying the law in an even-handed way to all who break it. We have also offered human rights training for a number of Indonesian Supreme Court Judges. The Indonesians welcomed this training, and are keen for it to go ahead.

Saudi Arabia

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice his Department is giving to British subjects in Saudi Arabia about the motives for recent bombings against non-Saudi nationals. [96366]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 31 January, Official Report, column 1090W.

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions his Department has had with the Saudi Government regarding the human rights of Sandy Mitchell, Les Walker, James Lee and James Cottel, imprisoned in Saudi Arabia. [96367]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 6 February, Official Report, column 386W.

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department has taken to investigate claims that British nationals imprisoned in Saudi Arabia for bombings have been subjected to long periods of solitary confinement and sleep deprivation. [96368]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 3 February, Official Report column 9W.

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Saudi authorities about (a) compliance with the human and legal rights conventions Saudi Arabia has signed to and (b) the case of the detainees Sandy Mitchell, Les Walker, James Lee and James Cottel. [93699]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend, the Foreign Secretary—and Ministerial colleagues—have raised the cases of the British men detained in Saudi Arabia at the highest levels with the Saudi authorities. We remain deeply concerned about these cases. The men's welfare is our paramount concern. We continue to work hard to resolve the cases. We are in close contact with the Saudi authorities and the men's lawyers.

Saudi Arabia is a signatory to a number of international human rights conventions including the Geneva Convention on Human Rights; and the Convention Against Torture. HMG raises human rights issues regularly at all levels with the Saudi government, both bilaterally and with our EU partners.

Sudan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the government of Sudan regarding (a) the special courts and human rights violations and (b) fighting between the Baggara and the Fur Marralit tribes in Darfur. [98003]

Mr. Rammell: We are concerned about the extensive use of the death penalty in Sudan, in particular the lack of legal representation and the use of special courts. We have made representations to the Sudanese Government, most recently to the Minister of Justice on 18 January. Following the executions of 3 men on 8 January, the EU Presidency issued a statement of condemnation on 10 January and raised the case with the Under-Secretary at the Ministry of Justice on 11 January.

We are also concerned about reports of clashes between camel herders from the north and the Fur in Jebel Marra. We raised this issue most recently with General Ibrahim Suleiman, Wali of North Darfur and Head of the Darfur Taskforce, on 23 January.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to participants in the peace process in Sudan regarding the situation in Darfur. [98004]

Mr. Rammell: We have made regular representations on the situation in Darfur to the Government of Sudan in Khartoum, most recently on 18 and 23 January.

PRIME MINISTER

Anglo-French Summit

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the proposal outlined at the recent Anglo-French summit for an inter-governmental defence capabilities development and acquisition agency; and when he anticipates the agency coming into operation. [98522]

The Prime Minister: In the Defence Working Group of the Convention on the Future of Europe, the United Kingdom proposed that an intergovernmental EU agency should be established to help improve European military capabilities.

At the Le Touquet summit, France and the United Kingdom agreed to promote a co-ordinated approach to capability development through the establishment of a European defence capabilities development and acquisition agency. A copy of the Summit Communique, which outlines the envisaged functions of the agency, has been placed in the Library of the House.

The agency's efforts would complement and reinforce NATO capability improvement work, and should generate better targeted, and more cost-effective capabilities for European Security and Defence Policy.

If the proposal is agreed, the new treaty which is currently being drawn up for consideration at the Intergovernmental Conference in late 2003 or early 2004 would include an article providing for the establishment of such an agency. The new treaty will be subject to ratification before coming into force although some elements might be put in place beforehand.

Computer Crime

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Prime Minister how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft his Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside his Department. [97568]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office on 14 February, Official Report.

Gulf Forces

Harry Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister whether forces deploying to the Gulf have adopted uniform rules of engagement. [98164]

The Prime Minister: Details of rules of engagement are not routinely disclosed because they could give a potential enemy information about the permissions and restrictions imposed on our forces. As we have said many times, the Government are committed to acting in full conformity with International Law. Our rules of engagement will reflect this.

Iraq

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Prime Minister which minister gave final approval for the publication of the UK dossier on Iraq of September 2002. [98371]

The Prime Minister: This was a Government document cleared in the normal way.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Prime Minister what provisional plan he has made for the care of children in Iraq in the event of armed conflict. [98442]

The Prime Minister: Children in Iraq are already vulnerable. In the centre and south of Iraq, under-five mortality rates are 131 per 1,000 live births—worse than the Democratic Republic of the Congo or Mozambique. The situation is particularly bad in the centre and south of Iraq where conditions have been deteriorating since the 1980s. The situation in the North, which is subject to UN sanctions but not ruled by Saddam Hussein, is less serious with the under-five mortality rate of 72 per 1000 live births.

The United Kingdom has been at the forefront of the efforts of the international community to improve the humanitarian situation in Iraq. Aside from our role in the UN, UK assistance to Iraq continues both bilaterally and through the EC. Since 1991 the UK has provided over £100 million for humanitarian work. The Department for International Development's ongoing programme expects to spend £8 million this financial year.

We are holding regular discussions with the UN, US and others about ways to minimise the suffering of the Iraqi people, including in the possible event of military action. One key priority will be to re-establish the Oil For Food distribution network as quickly as possible if it is disrupted. In addition to DFID's ongoing programme we are also providing £3.5 million funding for humanitarian contingency planning and prepositioning of basic supplies by UN agencies, including UNICEF and UNHCR.

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Prime Minister if he will cite the references for statements which are not obtained directly from intelligence sources in his dossiers of evidence of Iraq's involvement in terror and weapons of mass destruction. [98861]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend (Llew Smith) Member for Blaenau Gwent on Monday 10 February, Official Report, column 583W.

Iraq

Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on matters discussed and decisions taken during his meeting with the heads of the UNMOVIC and IAEA inspection teams on 6 February. [98498]

The Prime Minister: We had a general discussion about the progress of weapon inspections in Iraq.

Online Sales/Purchases

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Prime Minister what (a) products, (b) goods and (c) services were (i) bought online and (ii) sold by his Department in each of the last five years. [97475]

The Prime Minister: My Office does not have any online buying arrangements at present.

Security and Intelligence Agencies

Harry Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what weaknesses of control in 2001–02 were identified in the security and intelligence agencies in those areas which do not comply fully with generally accepted accounting practice or the requirements of the Resource Accounting Manual; what the consequences were, including in terms of financial loss; what is being done in 2002–03 to address these weaknesses; and if he will make a statement. [98161]

The Prime Minister: It is a long-standing Government policy not to make public information relating to the accounts of the individual security and intelligence agencies. Such information is outside the scope of the "Code of Practice on Access to Government Information" (paragraph 6 of part 1). The full details of individual Agency accounts and the Comptroller and Auditor General's opinions on them are available to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee and to the Intelligence and Security Committee, who are able to scrutinise the detailed accounts on Parliament's behalf.

Parliament has already been informed that the Comptroller and Auditor General qualified his opinion on 2001–02 resource accounts of the Government Communications Headquarters, saying that he was "unable to obtain all the information and explanations that [he] considered necessary regarding the valuation of certain fixed assets, prepayments and related figures in the accounts" (HC368 of 30 January 2003, page 6). This is not a new problem and was addressed in the Intelligence and Security Committee's last Annual Report (Cm 5542) and the Government's response (Cm 5543). The Government continues to take this problem seriously, and the Director of GCHQ and Sir David Omand are taking steps to improve the situation. This shortcoming in the accounts has not had any impact on GCHQ's operations. There is no evidence that this problem, has led to any material financial loss.

Harry Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what weaknesses of control in 2001–02 were identified in the security and intelligence agencies in the areas of (a) asset management, (b) management of consultants, (c) suspense accounts, (d) records management, (e) management information and (f) contract management; what the consequences were, with particular regard to financial loss; what is being done in 2002–03 to address these weaknesses; and if he will make a statement. [98162]

The Prime Minister: It is long-standing Government policy not to make public information relating to the accounts of the individual security and intelligence Agencies. Such information is outside the scope of the "Code of Practice on Access to Government Information" (paragraph 6 of part 1). The six areas identified here, which have been made public (in HC368 of 30 January 2003, page 5) are drawn from the Agencies' individual statements of internal control, the full details of which are available to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee and to the Intelligence and Security Committee. On the matter of the shortcomings in GCHQ's management of assets and the Government's determination to correct these, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him today. Weaknesses in the other areas mentioned were of a smaller scale and steps have already been taken to improve control in these areas. There is no evidence that any of these weaknesses have led to material financial loss and there has been no impact on the Agencies' operational effectiveness.

Thames Gateway

Jon Cruddas: To ask the Prime Minister what the (a) terms of reference for and (b) members of the new cabinet sub-committee on the Thames Gateway are; and if he will make a statement. [98613]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the written ministerial statement I made on 6 February 2003, Official Report, column 19WMS.

Work Placements

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister how many university students his Department supported or sponsored with a work placement in the last year; what his policy is on work placements; what plans he has to develop such schemes; and what his policy is on paying their university fees. [98496]

The Prime Minister: My Office does not run work placements scheme for university students.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Contingency Planning

Angela Watkinson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what discussions he has had with the London Fire Brigade and the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority in forming contingency plans for a major emergency in the capital. [98983]

Mr. Raynsford: The London Fire Brigade (LFB), and the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority (LFEPA) and its predecessors, have long been closely involved in contingency planning for a major emergency in the capital. Following the events of 11 September 2001, it was recognised that an enhanced emergency planning capability involving LFB, LFEPA and other key agencies was needed to deal with the new kind of threat. In May 2002, a new strategic planning regime was set up under the London Resilience Forum, chaired by myself with the Mayor as my deputy. LFB and LFEPA are represented at a senior level on the London Resilience Forum, and secondees from LFB and LFEPA are attached to the London Resilience Team, an inter-agency team based in the Government Office for London which reports to me and which is driving forward a programme of action to increase London's preparedness against a major terrorist attack. As part of this programme, LFB, LFEPA and other key agencies have been closely involved in drawing up a new command and control structure for ensuring a co-ordinated response from the emergency services, the Government and other key players in the event of a catastrophic incident.

Angela Watkinson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what arrangements have been made to co-ordinate the activities of the emergency services in responding to a major incident. [98984]

Mr. Alexander: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) on 19 December 2002, Official Report, column 893W.

Departmental Consultations

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list consultations his Department has conducted since it was established; and when each consultation (a) opened and (b) closed. [97420]

Mr. Leslie: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was established on 29 May 2002 and a list of the consultations which have been conducted is listed in the table:

Departmental Expenditure Limit

Matthew Green: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the Departmental Expenditure Limit for housing was in each year since 2000–03. [98000]

Mr. McNulty: The Departmental Expenditure Limit for housing in each year 2000–01, 2001–02 and 2002–03 is set out in the table.

£ million

Financial year	DEL	MRA	Total
2000–01	3,599	—	3,599
2001–02	2,592	1,589	4,181
2002–03	2,961	1,561	4,522

Development (South-east)

Matthew Green: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what studies have been conducted for his Department into potential growth in the (a) Thames Gateway, (b) Ashford, (c) Milton Keynes and (d) London-Stansted-Cambridge areas. [98170]

Mr. McNulty: The East Thames Corridor Study in 1994 set out the development capacity and potential of the Thames Gateway area. This was followed by Regional Planning Guidance 9a, which defined the Gateway and set out a Planning Framework to guide future development. A further study in 2000 recommended extension of the area to include south Essex, which now forms part of the Gateway.

For the other growth areas, the following are the most recent studies that have been completed:

> a study into potential growth in the Ashford area by the Halcrow Group Ltd. was published in December 2002. The study was commissioned by Ashford borough council, in partnership with the Government Office for the South East (GOSE), South East England Regional Assembly (SEERA), South East England Development Agency (SEEDA), English Partnerships, Housing Corporation, Kent county council and Kent and Medway Learning and Skills Council; > the study by Roger Tym and Partners covering the Milton Keynes and South Midlands area was published in September 2002. It was jointly commissioned by SEERA, GOSE, Government Office for the East of England (GO-East), Government Office for the East Midlands, East of England Local Government Conference, East Midlands Regional Local Government Association, SEEDA, East of England Development Agency (EEDA), East Midlands Development Agency, English Partnerships, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire and Northamptonshire county councils, Milton Keynes council, and Luton borough council; and the Sub Regional Study by ECOTEC Research and Consulting Ltd., covering the London-Stansted-Cambridge area, was published in July 2002. It was jointly commissioned by Essex, Cambridgeshire and Hertfordshire county councils, East of England Regional Planning Body, GO-East, Government Office for London, Greater London Authority, EEDA and London Development Agency.

Election Arrangements

Mr. Cash: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many submissions have been received to the Lord Chancellor's Department/ODPM consultation paper, Combining English Local Authority, Greater London Authority and European Parliament Elections in 2004; and how many of the submissions support the proposals to move the date of the May 2004 elections. [97757]

Mr. Leslie: By the close of consultation on 31 January 2003 a total of 364 responses had been received. Of those responses expressing a view, 172 support the proposal to move the date of the May 2004 local and Greater London Authority elections and 138 are against.

Mr. Cash: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when (a) his Department and (b) the Lord Chancellor's Department have had discussions with representatives from (a) the National Assembly for Wales, (b) electoral administrators, (c) the Greater London Authority, (d) the European Parliament and Commission, (e) local government representatives and (f) the Electoral Commission concerning the proposals to combine English local authority, Greater London Authority and European Parliament elections in 2004, (i) prior to the publication of the Government consultation paper on that topic and (ii) subsequent to the publication. [97759]

Mr. Leslie: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Lord Chancellor's Department, as part of their ongoing contact with bodies interested in electoral matters, have had discussions with representatives of the National Assembly for Wales, electoral administrators, the Greater London Authority, local government representatives and the Electoral Commission about the idea of combining local council, Greater London and European Parliamentary elections. These have taken place both prior and subsequent to the publication in October 2002 of the consultation paper: "Combining English Local Authority, Greater London Authority and European Parliament Elections in 2004". The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Lord Chancellor's Department has not held discussions about this proposal with either the European Parliament or the European Commission.

Fire Dispute

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the total cost incurred by his Department as a result of the fire strikes has been. [97806]

Mr. Raynsford: The estimated cost to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to the end of January of providing emergency cover for the fire dispute is approximately £70 million. Each extra day the military remains ready to provide cover costs up to about £1 million. The figures are necessarily approximate estimates and will remain so until invoices are received and audited.

IT Contracts

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list IT contracts in his Department and its predecessors above £50 million in each of the last 10 years; what the inception date for each system was; when it became fully functional; when it became fully debugged; and what the cost of over-runs has been. [99009]

Mr. Leslie: No IT contracts have been let by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister or his predecessors over the last 10 years with a value over £50 million.

Landfill Tax Credit Scheme

Helen Jones: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what estimate he has made of the change in revenue to Warrington Borough Council as a result of the proposed changes to the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme. [98527]

Mr. Meacher: I have been asked to reply.

There should be no loss of revenue to Warrington Borough Council as a result of the changes to the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme because local authorities are prohibited from benefiting directly from that scheme.

Local Government Ombudsman

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many complaints about the clarity of literature published by the Local Government Ombudsman he has received in each of the last five years. [97939]

Mr. Leslie: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is not aware of any such complaints about publications by the Commission for Local Administration in England, two of which have in the last two years received the 'crystal mark' award for their clarity.

Looked-After Children

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when the Social Exclusion Unit will publish its report into looked-after children. [98595]

Mrs. Roche: The Social Exclusion Unit will publish its report on raising the educational attainment of children in care in the spring 2003.

Market Renewal Pathfinders

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether the status of market renewal pathfinders was conferred by application; what consultations were held in advance with the local authorities; how many applied; and why (a) nine and (b) seven were accepted. [99062]

Mr. McNulty: Low demand pathfinder projects have been established in nine areas of the country at the invitation of the Government. The nine areas are those most acutely affected by the problem of low demand housing. Informal discussions about the low demand situation generally as opposed to the establishment of pathfinder projects were held with some, but not all, of the local authorities participating in the low demand pathfinder projects.

Minimum Wage

Pete Wishart: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will estimate the impact of increasing the minimum wage (a) in line with average earnings, (b) to £4.17 per hour, (c) to £4.87 per hour, (d) to £5.00 per hour and (e) to £5.30 per hour, on the cost of salaries of departmental employees (i) in total and (ii) for each nation of the United Kingdom in the next financial year. [90601]

Mr. Leslie: Increasing the minimum wage in the manner described would have no impact on the cost of salaries for employees of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

New Deal for Communities

Matthew Green: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much funding the New Deal for Communities has budgeted for each Government office of the region in (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01, (c) 2001–02 and (d) 2002–03. [97810]

Mrs. Roche: The following table is New Deal for Communities provision for each government region.

Round 1 partnerships started their implementation phase in 2000–01 and Round 2 partnerships in 2001–02. Prior to this, expenditure was limited to setting up the partnerships, preparing a delivery plan and a small number of 'quick win' projects.

NDC provision budgeted for each Government Office Region

Regional Government

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what level of support the Regional Assembly will be given in relation to the planning of the SWAMMS report. [98304]

Mr. Jamieson: I have been asked to reply.

In addition to the £689,000 previously announced for expenditure by the South West Regional Assembly on regional planning purposes in 2003–04, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Housing, Planning and Regeneration, announced on 10 February that a further £324,000 is being provided to the Assembly in the form of Planning Delivery Grant to carry out this function. This means in all some £1,013,000 is available which will include work arising from SWARMMS.

Sangatte

Mr. Cox: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many people allowed into the UK from the Sangatte refugee camp have found (a) employment and (b) housing; and if he will make a statement. [97534]

Beverley Hughes: I have been asked to reply.

All those admitted from Sangatte were offered temporary accommodation, provided by the Home Office, on their arrival in the United Kingdom. Jobcentre Plus officials have made assessments of their skills and are referring them to job opportunities. Home Office officials are working closely with local authorities to advise on longer-term accommodation.

Sustainable Communities

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) on what statistical basis councils were chosen as Market Renewal Pathfinders, as described in the White Paper Sustainable Communities; who chose them; and what changes have been made since the Pathfinder status was announced last year. [99057]

Mr. McNulty: The then Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions chose the areas to be invited to establish low demand pathfinder projects by reference to two primary data sources:

(i) the statistical returns compiled by local authorities as part of the Housing Investment Programme; and, where available,

(ii) local housing market studies undertaken by the Centre for Urban and Regional Studies (Birmingham University) and others. On the basis of this data, the Department looked at the scale of the low demand problem across sub-regional housing markets, as well as individual local authorities. It sought to identify the most acute problems of low demand in terms of scale and intensity of the problem.

Since pathfinder projects were established last year, we have added Rossendale Borough Council to the East Lancashire project.

Sustainable Communities (East London)

Jon Cruddas: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will define the area East London as referred to in his plan for a new style urban development corporation in the Sustainable Communities Plan; and what discussions he has had in relation to the best approach for a new style urban development corporation in East London. [98617]

Mr. McNulty: The exact boundary of the East London Urban Development Corporation (UDC) will be the subject of consultation and confirmation by Parliament, but will focus on three broad locations in the London Thames Gateway: the Lower Lea Valley, Barking and Havering Riverside and Thamesmead, Belvedere and Erith. This focus has been agreed in principle with Thames Gateway London partners including the GLA, Thames Gateway London Partnership, the Mayor and the LDA.

Jon Cruddas: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister on what basis the £446 million announced in the Sustainable Communities Plan will be allocated to the Thames Gateway area; and how local authorities and other organisations operating in the Thames Gateway will access the funding. [98614]

Mr. McNulty: Following the announcement of the Sustainable Communities Plan and the allocation of £446 million for the Thames Gateway area, we are currently working up the detailed arrangements for how this money will be accessed and on what basis it will be spent.

Jon Cruddas: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he will announce further details regarding the setting up of a new style urban development corporation for East London. [98616]

Mr. McNulty: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is consulting widely with our partners in the Thames Gateway in order to fully work up proposals for the setting up of an Urban Development Corporation in East London, as signalled in the Sustainable Communities Plan announcement. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will be announcing further details soon.

Thames Gateway

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister pursuant to his answer of 6 February 2003, Official Report, column 422W, on new developments in the Thames Gateway, if he will place the Environment Agency's constraint flood maps for each zone of change within the Thames Gateway in the Library. [97849]

Mr. McNulty: The most up-to-date map of the indicative flood plain within the Thames Gateway's zone of change is available on the Environment Agency's website.

Unfair Terms Regulations

Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) how council tenants and council leaseholders will be able to receive independent advice on the implications of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations for the consultation procedures involved in any housing stock transfer; [96566]

(2) what advice has been given by his Department to local authorities and housing associations regarding the implications of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 for the housing stock transfer process. [96568]

Mr. McNulty: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister expects tenants and council leaseholders involved in a housing stock transfer to have access to independent advice through an Independent Tenant Adviser (ITA), whose role is to provide information and impartial advice on all the implications of the transfer, including the application of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations in respect of tenancy agreements.

A reference to the Regulations is included in the revised version of the Housing Transfer Manual which will be published shortly; and the Housing Corporation has issued a circular to registered social landlords about this matter.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Beef Assurance Scheme

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make an assessment of the viability of rearing an organic grass-fed herd of South Devon cattle under the Beef Assurance Scheme in the West Country; and if she will make a statement. [98358]

Mr. Meacher: It is for individuals to assess the viability of rearing organic South Devon cattle under the Beef Assurance Scheme in the circumstances particular to their enterprise. However, we are committed to a successful long-term future for organic farming in England. As announced in the Action Plan to develop organic food and farming in England published last July, this year we will be introducing additional financial support under the Organic Farming Scheme.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what measures the Government are taking to ensure that they meet their pledge to reduce national carbon dioxide emissions to 20 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2010. [98825]

Mr. Meacher: The UK Climate Change Programme (CCP), published in November 2000, sets out the policies and measures that the Government and the devolved administrations have introduced, or are planning to introduce, to reduce carbon dioxide emissions to move towards the domestic goal of a 20 per cent. reduction in the UK's emissions below 1990 levels by 2010.

Emissions reductions will come from a range of policies and measures, covering all sectors of the economy. Key policies introduced so far include the climate change levy package; the UK greenhouse gas emissions trading scheme; a target for the renewables obligation that 10 per cent. of sales from licensed electricity suppliers should be generated from renewable sources; the target to at least double the capacity of combined heat and power by 2010; European-level agreements with car manufacturers to improve the fuel efficiency of new cars; the 10-Year Plan for Transport; better energy efficiency in the residential sector; and, improving performance standards in the Building Regulations.

Coal Mine Methane

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimate she has made of how many communities have suffered environmental damage or housing problems due to coal mine methane. [95441]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 6 February 2003]: In 1996 DOE published a report "Methane and other gases from disused coal mines: The Planning Response" which discussed the problems posed by gases, including methane, from disused coal mines, in the context of town and country planning. It provided factual information for those involved with land and property such as planners, developers, owners and insurers, and is relevant to both new and existing development. The report mentions that between 1945 and 1994 there were about 75 surface gas emissions recorded, of which 70 per cent. involved methane, and in 35 per cent. of these cases the gas ignited. Half (nine) involved residential property. A copy of the report is in the House Library.

Since 1995 the Coal Authority (CA) has been recording incidents of water, gas and major collapses involving non-operational coal mines. The CA's Surface Hazard call-out system, which aims to attend a call within two hours and make safe within six hours, recorded 68 incidents of surface mine gas between 1995 and 2002 of which four were in the West Midlands. These incidents include both methane and other oxygen-deficient gases such as carbon-dioxide. Incidents are tackled urgently to avoid damage or other problems.

External Consultancy

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much (a) her Department and (b) each agency and non-departmental public body spent on external consultancy in each year from 1995–96 to 2002–03 (planned); and if she will make a statement. [92250]

Alun Michael: The information, which represents the cost of bought-in services, is as follows:

	2001–02	2002–03
Core-Defra	40,682	21,968
Agencies:
Rural Payments Agency	2,656	1,030

Milk Development Council	2,000	Not available
National Forest Company	52	45
Regional Flood Defence Committees	0	0
Royal Botanic Gardens	66	389
Wine Standards Board	0	14

Equivalent information for 1995–96 to 2000–01 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The figure for 2002–03 is an estimate.

Management Consultants

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much her Department has spent on management consultants since its creation. [93678]

Alun Michael: The information requested, which represents the cost of bought-in services for the Department and its agencies, is as follows:

2001–02: £45 million

2002–03: £24 million (estimate)

The reduction from 2001–02 to 2002–03 is mainly a consequence of the reduction in expenditure associated with the outbreak of foot and mouth disease.

Producer Responsibility (Free Newspapers)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps she is taking to apply the producer responsibility principle to the publishers of free newspapers. [97098]

Mr. Meacher: Our producer responsibility agreement made in April 2000 with the Newspaper Publishers Association set targets for the recycled content of all UK newspapers. The first target for 2001 was exceeded and recycled paper now makes up 63.5 per cent. of our newspapers.

Radioactive Waste

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to reduce the radioactive source terms at Sellafield. [95264]

Mr. Meacher: At the request of Ministers, the Environment Agency has carried out a review of the radioactive discharges from the Sellafield site. The Agency published its proposed decision in August of last year. Among the key elements it proposed are reductions to eight out of 10 of the aerial and half of the liquid discharge limits for the Sellafield site.

My right hon. Friends, the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Secretary of State for Health—the responsible Ministers under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993—are currently considering the Agency's proposed decision, and will come to their own decision later this year.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what information on the (a) conditioning and (b) chemical composition of radioactive waste included in the national radioactive waste inventory; and what plans she has to require more detailed information on the characteristics to be included. [95265]

Mr. Meacher: The 2001 UK Radioactive Waste Inventory, in reports DEFRA/RAS/02.005 to 010 (as listed), contains comprehensive information on the conditioning and chemical composition of radioactive waste. There are no plans to require more detailed information on these characteristics at present. Copies of these reports are being placed in the House Library.

Recycling (Somerset)

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the level of recycling was in Somerset county council in 2002. [98310]

Mr. Meacher: Our current figures show that Somerset county council's recycling and composting rate was 16 per cent. in 2001–02, the latest year for which data are available.

Recycled Goods

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what incentives and preventative measures are planned to encourage (a) local councils and (b) other public bodies to use more recycled goods in their service provision. [87965]

Mr. Meacher: Within Government, the Sustainable Procurement Group has considered the scope to stimulate markets for recycled goods via public procurement and will make its recommendations to Ministers within the next few weeks. The Group has sought advice from the Waste Resources Action Programme (WRAP) (which was set up to encourage market development for recycled goods) on increasing the uptake of recycled products across Government and we expect its recommendations to point the way to significant improvements in purchasing of recycled products throughout the public sector. The increasing statutory targets that currently exist for local authorities will also provide an incentive for them to ensure that there is a market for recycled goods in place.

More recently the Prime Minister's Strategy Unit report on Waste Strategy has recommended that the work that the Waste Resources Action Programme (WRAP) is undertaking with the Local Government Association and Improvement and Development Agency to promote the take-up of green procurement by local authorities be extended still further. It also suggested that formal mechanisms be put in place to roll out best practice tools developed by the Sustainable Procurement Group to local government. In Central Government it recommended targets for the use of recycled materials. Voluntary green targets were also recommended for local authorities to purchase more recycled goods, minimise waste volumes and to encourage them to recycle more of their waste. The Government aim to publish their response to that report in the spring.

Smokies

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what investigations have been undertaken by her Department into the production of "smokies" using imported contaminated carcases of goats and sheep; and what action the Government have taken to address this issue. [97126]

Ms Blears: I have been asked to reply.

The production of smokies, whether from imported or domestic carcases, is unlawful because it is a requirement under European Union law that sheep or goat carcases for human consumption be flayed immediately after slaughter.

The Food Standards Agency issued guidance on smokies to local enforcement authorities and to border inspection posts in May 2002; since when successful action has been taken on a number of occasions against both imported and domestically produced smokies.

The Government are also taking wider action to tackle illegal imports of meat. A recent progress update on this was given in the answer from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Morley) on 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 558W.

Waste Management

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what (a) grants and (b) borrowing permissions have been made available to local authorities, in each year from 1997 to date, to facilitate (i) waste minimisation, (ii) reuse of materials, (iii) recycling of materials and (iv) incineration of waste. [96476]

Mr. Meacher: The main source of revenue funding for local authority waste services is formula general grant, comprising the main Revenue Support Grant and National Non-Domestic Rates, provided by the Government under the annual Local Government Finance Settlement. This is distributed to local authorities through Formula Spending Shares. Waste services are covered by the Environmental, Protective and Cultural Services (EPCS) block of FSS which provides for a wide range of local authority services including libraries, local transport and flood defence, as well as waste. The element for waste services is not separately identified within the total, and spending decisions are for local authorities to make in the light of their own priorities and the wishes of their electorate. In total, the figures for the block are:

	£ million
2000–01	8,175
2001–02	8,601
2002–03	8,961
2003–04	9,340
2004–05	9,583
2005–06	9,896

The figures for 2000–01 to 2003–04 are those provided in the Local Government Finance Settlement for the respective years. The figures for 2004–05 and 2005–06 are those set out in SR2002. They do not include resource equalisation which took place in 2003–04 and increases to EPCS FSS by £2.230 million in each of the three years to 2005–06.

Prior to 2000–01 resources were provided to local authorities for recycling under a Supplementary Credit Approval scheme. The figure for 1997–98 was £2.159 million.

Defra's Waste Minimisation and Recycling Fund has provided £50 million in 2002–03 and £90 million in 2003–04 to encourage local authorities to expand recycling operations in their area. The Waste and Resources Action Programme (WRAP) has also been allocated £40 million from 2000–01 to 2003–04 to work on overcoming market barriers to reuse and recycling of waste. An additional £15 million was made available to WRAP for 2002–04 from the Aggregates Levy Sustainability Fund to promote increased use of alternative materials as aggregates.

The Government have also provided Private Finance Initiative (PFI) credits for waste and recycling projects of £220 million in SR 2000 and £355 million in SR 2002. So far, PFI waste projects approved by Defra have typically been large integrated waste management schemes including a variety of waste treatment options.

As part of a Local Public Sector Agreements (LPSA) the Government offers, at the outset, a pump-priming grant, unsupported credit approvals and potential relaxations in statutory and administrative requirements. To date local authorities have been awarded approximately £5 million in pump priming grants, and £16 million in Unsupported Credit Approvals to facilitate the improvement of waste minimisation and recycling. Typically, financial support has been used to improve enforcement and publicity; to develop civic amenity sites; and to initiate or expand kerb-side collection schemes.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

AIDS Vaccine (Eastern Africa)

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what funding her Department has allocated for research into HIV/AIDS subtype A vaccines in Eastern Africa; what progress is being made towards a vaccine for the HIV/AIDS subtype A virus; and if she will make a statement. [98992]

Clare Short: My Department has been funding the International AIDS Vaccine Initiative (IAVI) since 1998. Our current 5-year, £14 million, programme of support began in January 2000.

IAVI has eight vaccine constructs under development, all specifically aimed at the HIV strains most prevalent in developing countries. Trials in various phases are planned for each of these over the next 2–5 years. The candidate vaccines currently being developed by the Medical Research Council, and Oxford and Nairobi Universities are aimed at combating the subtype A strain of HIV most common in East Africa.

The Oxford-Nairobi trial is making significant progress. The vaccine candidate has progressed from the laboratory to approval for initial human testing in 18 months and is the first vaccine designed specifically for Africa to be tested in humans. Phase I and II trials are now ongoing in Oxford and Kenya. IAVI hope to move into Phase III efficacy trials by 2005.

Burma (Humanitarian Assistance)

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent assessment she has made of providing cross-border humanitarian assistance to internally displaced people in Burma. [98267]

Clare Short: We monitor the humanitarian situation in Burma and Thailand including the situation for the 140,000 refugees living in camps, an estimated 1 million irregular migrants living on or near the border and the vulnerable populations living in border areas in Burma itself. Getting relief to internally displaced people living on the Burmese side of the border is difficult and dangerous. We provide humanitarian assistance on both sides of the border through carefully selected agencies eg UNHCR and ICRC in Thailand and Burma. The ICRC is the only organisation with a permanent international presence on both sides of the border. We also support WHO's border health programme in Thailand. In addition, we support food relief assistance for refugee camps through the Burmese Border Consortium (BBC). In the current financial year 2002–03 DFID's assistance in these areas will amount to around £3 million.

Central African Republic (Medical Supplies)

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development pursuant to her answer of 4 December 2002, Official Report, column 854W, on the Central African Republic, what action is being taken to tackle the shortage of medical supplies. [98582]

Clare Short: The UN Children's Fund (UNICEF) in the Central African Republic (CAR) has now provided the health ministry with vaccines to enable it to continue routine immunisations in health facilities. The vaccines are to combat tuberculosis (TB), yellow fever, diphtheria-tetanus-whooping cough (DTW) and measles.

The nationwide immunisation campaign, initially scheduled to start by mid-December 2002, has not yet begun due to the ongoing conflict between government forces and rebels.

Chad-Cameroon Oil Pipeline

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what external audits have been commissioned for the World bank funded Chad-Cameroon oil pipeline; and whether these audits will be made public. [98272]

Clare Short: Project arrangements provide for regular audits, on the Chad-Cameroon pipeline projects' accounts, plus independent opinions from the International Advisory Group (IAG) and External Compliance and Monitoring Group (ECMG). All IAG and ECMG reports are in the public domain and are available from the project website: http://www.worldbank.org/afr/ccproj/ Financial audits are not made public.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the cost of the World Bank funded Chad-Cameroon oil pipeline. [98273]

Clare Short: The cost of the Chad-Cameroon Petroleum Development and Pipeline Project is estimated at US$3.7 billion, which is being funded largely by private industry.

The World Bank Group will provide $93 million in loans—$53.4 million for Cameroon and $39.5 million for Chad— to finance the two governments' equity share in the project, and a $100 million loan from the International Finance Corporation (IFC) to the joint-venture pipeline companies. In addition to investments in the main oilfield development/pipeline project, the World bank is funding two projects aimed at strengthening the capacity of the Chadian and Cameroonian governments in environmental management and effective monitoring of the petroleum sectors. A total of US$29.5 million is being provided by the International Development Association (IDA), the World bank's lending arm for the poorest countries, for this.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of allegations of fraud concerning the World bank funded Chad-Cameroon oil pipeline. [98274]

Clare Short: We are aware of allegations made by a former employee of Exxon-Mobil, which appear to stem from concerns over specification of equipment being procured for the project. The World Bank Group looked into the concerns raised and we are content with the response given. My Department has confidence that the World Bank's systems for monitoring the implementation of this project, and for investigating any complaints, are appropriate. We are not aware of any other allegations of fraud.

Child Soldiers (Burma)

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent assessment she has made of the number of child soldiers in Burma; and what steps she is taking to tackle this. [98266]

Clare Short: An exact figure is not known. But a recent Human Rights Watch study estimated that there could be up to 70,000 child soldiers in Burma.

The UN Security Council has now passed a resolution on Children Affected by Armed Conflict, which was based on the UNSG's report on child soldiers. In our statement on this to the Security Council, UK representative Jeremy Greenstock highlighted our concerns about child soldiers in Burma.

The issue of child soldiers was also taken up in the UK Co-sponsored resolution at UNGA last November. We will be ensuring that the issue is addressed at the UN Commission on Human Rights where the EU will be tabling a resolution on the human rights situation in Burma. In addition the UK has in place a weapons embargo and a ban on all military links with the Burmese armed forces in view of their appalling human rights record.

Child Trafficking (Togo)

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps are being taken to tackle the trafficking of children in Togo. [98587]

Clare Short: Child trafficking is an international problem requiring co-ordinated action. The British Government are one of the strongest supporters of the International Labour Organisation's Convention on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour. This complements the work carried out in West Africa by Governments and other international organisations such as UNICEF. My Department is also funding Anti-Slavery International to develop the capacity and commitment of local NGOs to end trafficking and the abuse of child domestic workers in West Africa.

Command and Staff College (Nigeria)

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the estimated cost is to the Government of funding for the Bournemouth University Disaster Management Centre course at the Command and Staff College in Nigeria. [98585]

Clare Short: The total cost of the two week Disaster Management Course and a further one week "Training the Trainer" course is £51,173. Funding is provided under the Africa Conflict Prevention Pool from resources allocated to the Ministry of Defence.

Emergency Operation Appeal (Western Sahara)

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will provide a breakdown of how the £1 million contribution to the Emergency Operation Appeal in the Western Sahara will be spent. [98583]

Clare Short: My Department is contributing £1 million to the World Food Program to provide emergency humanitarian assistance to populations affected by drought and crop failure within the Western Sahel. Assistance will be focussed mainly in Mauritania, but will also include Cape Verde, Senegal, The Gambia, and Mali. WFP has identified that 578,550 persons are affected by severe food insecurity or are in need of emergency intervention to prevent deterioration in their food and nutritional status. The operation is planned to last twelve months and will distribute 55,365 tons of food. 120,000 people in the Aftout region of Mauritania, the most severely affected area, will receive full ration enriched meals (2,100 Kcal); a further 384,550 beneficiaries in Mauritania, Cape Verde, Senegal and The Gambia will receive reduced ration meals (1,800 kcal); and 74,000 beneficiaries in the regions of Kayes and Koulikoro in Mali will receive cereal rations only (1,050 kcal).

My Department is making available a further £570,804 to Oxfam, who will act as an implementing partner for WFP. Oxfam are well established within the region and will distribute the food supplied by WFP. Oxfam will undertake targeted food distribution to 36,280 of the most vulnerable people in the Aftout region, along with the provision of seeds, tools, pesticides and fencing materials to support vegetable gardening. Further capacity building measures will include studies into safe drinking water, food security and nutritional surveillance.

Eritrea

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what development aid has been made available in each of the last two years to Eritrea. [98806]

Clare Short: Bilaterally we provided £788,000 in 2002 and £839,000 in 2001. These funds were spent on meeting humanitarian needs and also on a small grants scheme. In addition we contributed 20 per cent. of EC spending, which in 2000, the most recent year that we have figures available for, was a UK contribution of £700,000.

In addition we provided £500,000 in 2002 and £250,000 in 2001 to the UN Trust Fund for the delimitation and demarcation of the border between Eritrea and Ethiopia.

The UK does not have a development partnership with Eritrea. We will continue to make a contribution to meeting urgent humanitarian needs, and to the consolidation of the peace process. We will also continue to assess the scope for helping with economic and political reform.

Ethiopia

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether malnutrition rates in Ethiopia are increasing. [98270]

Clare Short: The latest UN assessment is that although they have not observed a general deterioration in the nutritional status of the drought affected population, there has been a slow but gradual increase in Global Acute Malnutrition (GAM) in some of the drought affected areas of Ethiopia. Some areas are now above 10 per cent. GAM allowing no margin for error. The situation therefore requires constant monitoring.

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if, at the meeting to be held with the Prime Minister of Ethiopia, Meles Zenawi, she will ask him what steps are being taken by the Ethiopian Government to investigate the detention without trial and torture and ill-treatment of (a) up to 60 demonstrators arrested in Oromia in April 2002 and (b) approximately 48 persons in the capital Addis Ababa, suspected of being members of the Oromo Liberation Front in August 2002. [98827]

Clare Short: Her Majesty's Government encourage the Ethiopian Government to handle political protest—violent or peaceful—in accordance with the provisions of their own law and relevant international conventions on human rights. I shall be discussing this issue within the context of the request for support I have received from Prime Minister Meles for transforming the Ethiopian police force into a force working with the community.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development to what extent funding to Ethiopia under the Department's Direct Budget Support system will be conditional upon an improved human rights situation in the country. [98873]

Clare Short: My Department is developing a three-year programme of direct budget support to Ethiopia to support the implementation of the Ethiopian Sustainable Development and Poverty Reduction Programme (SDPRP). This will follow up on the disbursement agreed in January 2003. We intend to measure progress by the Government against a range of indicators from the SDPRP and other Government policy statements that will be agreed between the Government and a group of interested donors, including the UK. These indicators should cover the full range of commitments in the SDPRP including issues related to democratisation, empowerment and respect for human rights—economic and social, as well as civic and political.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether, at her meeting with the Prime Minister of Ethiopia, she will raise (a) the detention without trial of thousands within Ethiopia; and (b) the likelihood of the Ethiopian Government either releasing such persons or placing them on trial as soon as possible. [98874]

Clare Short: In the Memorandum of Understanding I signed with the Ethiopian Government in January 2003, the Ethiopian Government renewed its commitment to protect the full range of human rights including economic and social rights of all Ethiopians, especially the poor. We are supporting the implementation of this commitment through our support for the Sustainable Development and Poverty Reduction Programme (SDPRP) and through regular dialogue with the Ethiopian Government, at which we raise human rights and other issues of concern. At my planned meeting with Prime Minister Meles, I expect to discuss progress on implementing the SDPRP and any issues of concern that arise.

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether the Department will be conducting training of Ethiopian police and security forces as referred to in the Department's Ethiopian Country Assistance Plan. [98828]

Clare Short: My Department will be leading a joint DFID/MOD/FCO mission to Ethiopia to discuss with Government and civil society what support might be usefully provided for security sector reform and reforming the police. The provision of training will be considered during that mission.

Global Fund (Contributions)

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has made to the US Government on contributions to the Global Fund to fight AIDS, TB and malaria. [98994]

Clare Short: The UK Government have pledged £138 million to the Global Fund to fight AIDS, TB and Malaria (GFATM) over five years and have urged other donor countries, including the US, to commit to multi year funding. The UK remains strongly committed to the fight against AIDS, TB and Malaria. In considering future contribution levels to the Fund, we will look closely at its performance and effectiveness relative to other channels of assistance, and at the extent to which the Fund is supporting health and development plans and processes formulated by developing countries.

Iraq

Mr. Laxton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what preparations are being made to (a) monitor the humanitarian impact of military action in Iraq and (b) provide the appropriate humanitarian assistance. [98600]

Clare Short: My Department is holding regular discussions with the Ministry of Defence, UN agencies and other humanitarian actors about contingency planning for a range of eventualities in Iraq.

In the event of military action, a key priority for the Government would be to minimise the suffering of the Iraqi people, who are already very vulnerable. This would include: provision of immediate humanitarian assistance by those best placed to do so; and re-establishment of the UN Oil For Food Programme distribution network. DFID is providing an additional £3.5 million contribution to support UN humanitarian contingency planning for Iraq, including the prepositioning of basic supplies, through funding to UNHCR, UNICEF, WFP, WHO, OCHA and UNSECOORD.

Mr. Laxton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what additional funds have been allocated for humanitarian relief to accompany any military action in Iraq. [98601]

Clare Short: DFID has a contingency reserve of £100 million which we will draw on for any emergency situation in Iraq.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) what steps have been taken to monitor the humanitarian situation in Iraq in the event of military action; [98880]

(2) what analysis has been conducted as to likely humanitarian needs in the event of military action in Iraq. [98882]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton) (to PQ 98600) earlier today.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what additional funds have been allocated to address the need for humanitarian relief in Iraq following military action. [98881]

Clare Short: DFID has a contingency reserve of £100 million, which we will draw on for any emergency situation in Iraq.

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what contingency plans she has made to provide assistance to the people of Iraq in the event of military action being taken against that country. [98954]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend for Derby, North (Mr Laxton) (to PQ 98600) earlier today.

IT Contracts

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list IT contracts in her Department above £50 million in each year since it was established; what the inception date for each system was; when it became fully functional; when it became fully debugged; and what the cost of over-runs has been. [99007]

Clare Short: My Department has taken forward IT projects on a step-by-step incremental basis and we have had no contracts above £50 million.

Malawi

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much aid her Department is giving to Malawi to deal with food shortages. [98271]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development has spent approximately £34 million since the onset of the crisis: on food importation and distribution, provision of wages for employment on public works programmes (cash for work), support to agricultural production (targeted inputs of seed and fertiliser for 2 million of the poorest farmers) and rehabilitation of rail and road links on the import corridors. DFID's contribution forms a significant part of the effective consortium approach developed to deal with the crisis in which the Malawi Government, donors, NGOs and the commercial sector are partners.

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what evidence has been collated by her Department on the early harvesting of immature maize in Malawi; and what assessment she has made of the effects of late planting of maize in Malawi on food stocks there. [98991]

Clare Short: Early harvesting of maize for immediate use is a regular component of the coping strategies for poor rural household in Malawi during the annual hungry season, which lasts normally from January to March. Although this may result in reduction in the grain harvest, the impact on national food security is expected to be minimal as present national maize grain stocks are higher than at any similar time during the last five years.

Although there has been some localised flooding, the general picture of the 2002–03 rainy season remains good, with the latest maize crop estimate for a harvest of 2.05 million tonnes, about 95 per cent. of national requirements.

Maximising Impact in the Water Sector

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the National Audit Office's report, "Maximising Impact in the Water Sector"; and if she will make a statement. [98975]

Clare Short: I welcome this report. It provides a welcome contribution to improving our work in the water sector as well as other areas. I was pleased to see that the National Audit Office concluded that our projects on water and sanitation have been largely successful, and that DFID is highly influential internationally. The National Audit Office's recommendations provide further impetus to strengthen our approach in areas such as evaluation and maximising the take-up of DFID research.

I also refer my hon. Friend to my written ministerial statement to Parliament on water on 28 January 2003, ahead of the forthcoming World Water Forum in Kyoto in March 2003, setting out our view of the key issues in the sector and our approach to addressing them.

Mobile Communications (Third World)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether development assistance is available to help with the expansion of mobile communications in the third world. [98808]

Clare Short: We are providing assistance in various ways to help bring the benefits of mobile communications to poorer people in developing countries. For example, the Building Digital Opportunities programme is supporting work at the policy level (e.g. by assisting regulators to develop pro-poor policy environments) and with communities (e.g. supporting local approaches to providing valuable information to poorer communities through mobile phones). Strategic interventions such as our new CATIA programme (Catalysing Access to ICTs in Africa) and the Open Knowledge Network, both include support for pro-poor mobile communication channels.

In addition, we are working to attract greater private sector participation in expanding mobile communications in developing countries. In close consultation with key private companies and the DTI, we are jointly exploring how to enable the private sector bring affordable communications services to the great majority of people in developing countries without easy access to a public telephone. Mobile communications will play a critical role in this. In addition, DFID is contributing to broader infrastructure investment funds, such as the EAIF—Emerging Africa Infrastructure Fund—which can support, inter alia, investments in mobile communications facilities.

Montserrat

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what subjects she discussed with the Chief Minister of Montserrat during his recent visit to London. [98834]

Clare Short: We discussed Montserrat's progress towards self-sufficiency, including plans for a new airport, and future DFID support.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial resources her Department (a) allocated and (b) transferred to Montserrat in each year from 1998. [98835]

Clare Short: The figures are:

UK Financial Year	Allocated (£000s) [1]	Disbursed (000s) [2]
1998–99	33,000	31,096
1999–2000	23,934	22,640
2000–01	24,100	20,811
2001–02	24,400	24,412
2002–03	[1]20,000	[2]20,000

[1] Revised

[2] Estimated outturn

In addition I recently set aside a total of £45.6 million for Montserrat over the period 2003–04 to 2005–06, which will bring our total assistance by 2005–06 to over £225 million since the onset of the volcanic emergency. This will represent, for the coming three years, an increase of around 50 percent. of the budget that was previously available to Montserrat over that period.

Palestinian Food Shortages

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on Palestinian food shortages. [98554]

Clare Short: The economic crisis has seriously compromised household welfare. Many Palestinian families have endured long periods without work or incomes, and are now dependent on food aid for their daily survival. The international community has responded to the growing crisis through a range of interventions, including the provision of food. Donor disbursements have doubled accordingly in the last two years. But unless Palestinians can move around to work and trade, the Palestinian economy will continue to stagnate and the spiral of unemployment, poverty and malnutrition will worsen.

Safe Drinking Water

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the progress towards halving by 2015 the proportion of people without sustainable access to safe drinking water. [98269]

Clare Short: Nearly two thirds of the world's population will be living in countries of significant water stress by the year 2025. 1.2 billion people currently lack access to safe drinking water and 2.4 billion people lack access to basic sanitation.

The percentage of people served with some form of improved water supply rose from 77 per cent. in 1990 to 82 per cent. in 2000. The greatest gain in improved water coverage was in South-central Asia, from 72 per cent. to 85 per cent. The percentage of people with access to basic sanitation increased from 51 per cent. to 61 per cent. in the same period. Much work, however, has yet to be done. In sub-Saharan Africa, only 58 per cent. of the population has access to improved water sources. The 2002 UN Human Development Report has indicated that nearly 25 countries, the majority in Sub-Sahara Africa, are lagging or are far behind in respect to meeting the MDG for water, with another 75 countries lacking data to effectively assess their progress. But all of the goals remain achievable if developing countries and the international community have the determination to ratchet up their efforts.

My Department is providing substantive financial support and technical assistance to initiatives that support the assessment of access to improved water supplies and sanitation, including the United Nation's Joint Monitoring Programme which provides the UN reference at both global, regional and country levels and the World Water Assessment Programme, a collective and consolidated UN system-wide assessment and reporting facility which provides analysis and data on the state of global freshwater and status review of the attainment of the water and sanitation targets.

To promote sustainable access to safe drinking water, my Department's activities at the international and national levels are looking to address the issues of political will, institutional capacity to provide and maintain services, scaling up initiatives to increase coverage, and long term sustainability incorporating cost-recovery and maintenance.

Somalia

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what development aid has been made available in each of the last two years to Somalia. [98807]

Clare Short: We provided over £2.8 million for Somalia in 2001 and over £1.5 million in 2002 This included contributions to the International Committee of the Red Cross' and United Nation's Appeals for Somalia, as well as activities such as primary health care, emergency nutrition, health assistance and water rehabilitation (through non-governmental agencies such as Action Contre la Faim, Medecins sans Frontieres, Norwegian People's Aid and World Vision).

We have also supported Somali women's participation in the peace process and local elections in Somaliland.

In addition, DFID's imputed share of EC expenditure in Somalia for 1999 and 2000 (the latest years for which figures are available) totalled £5 million.

Our engagement with Somalia focuses on three areas: (i) strengthening regions that have achieved sustained stability (e.g. Somaliland) and seeing what lessons we can help transfer to other parts of the country; (ii) supporting the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD) led peace process and (iii) the continuation of the current humanitarian programme in war-affected areas, particularly in the south.

UN Humanitarian Assessment Missions

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development pursuant to her answer of 5 February 2003, Official Report, column 291W, on Central Africa, when she expects United Nations humanitarian assessment missions to enter the zones under rebel control. [98584]

Clare Short: To date, no humanitarian NGO or UN agency has been able to access zones under rebel control to assess the humanitarian and health needs of the population. We understand that a UN humanitarian assessment mission that was due to visit rebel zones on 6 February has been postponed; we have no details on when this will be rescheduled.

Water and Sanitation Projects

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her expenditure plans are for financial assistance for water and sanitation projects, in absolute terms and as a proportion of the Department budget; and what proportion of the Departmental budget was allocated as financial assistance for water and sanitation projects, in (a) 2001–02 and (b) 2000–01. [98967]

Clare Short: In financial year 2001–02, my Department spent £87.2 million on water and sanitation related outcomes of various projects across its bilateral assistance programmes. Expenditure in 2000–01 was £90.6 million. In 2001–02, spending on water and sanitation accounted for approximately 6 per cent. of bilateral expenditure (£1,506 million). 70 per cent. of the expenditure, approximately £63 million, was spent on water and sanitation in 2001–02, being split 60:40 between urban and rural. 2001–02 was the first year in recent times that the urban sector received more support than the rural.

In terms of geographical allocation, Asia was the dominant recipient region (47 per cent. in 2001–02 and 42 per cent. in 2000–01), followed by Africa (31 per cent. and 32 per cent. respectively).

New commitments to the water and sanitation sector made during 2001–02 totalled £86.2 million.

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proportion of the Department's financial assistance for water and sanitation projects was allocated to institutional capacity and human resources in (a) 2000–01 and (b) 2001–02; and what proportion will be allocated in (i) 2002–03 and (ii) 2003–04. [98976]

Clare Short: My Department's expenditure on water supply and sanitation has remained broadly static between 2000–02, at approximately £63 million, which accounts for 70 per cent. of the total water sector expenditure. Of that, 60 per cent. was allocated to urban and 40 per cent. to rural water and sanitation programmes. Total expenditure in the water sector was £90.6 million in 2000–01 and £87.2 million in 2001–02. Figures are not yet available for 2002–03. New commitments to the water and sanitation sector made during 2001–02 totalled £86.2 million.

We are not able to disaggregate expenditure data to determine precise allocation to specific activities within the water supply and sanitation sector. However the underpinning premise of all our water and sanitation programmes is to build and strengthen institutional capacity and human resource capacity in developing countries.

In addition to our work through our Country programmes, our Knowledge and Research (KAR) programme works to encourage our engagement with Southern institutions to encourage capacity building of formal and informal poor urban communities to improve local water and sanitation services.

Additionally, through our resource centres, OASIS and WELL, my Department is actively engaging with developing countries and their supporting institutions to build human resource capacity within the water and sanitation sector.

World Food Programme (Southern Africa)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when figures for the WFP distribution of food aid for Southern Africa for January will be made available. [98823]

Clare Short: The figures for the WFP distribution of food aid for Southern Africa for January are due to be made available in early March.

I will place a copy in the House Library as soon as they become available.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent assessment she has made of food shortages in Zimbabwe. [98651]

Clare Short: The latest Zimbabwe Vulnerability Assessment Committee survey indicates that 7.2 million people are currently in need of emergency food aid. The WFP and bilateral programmes aim to target 40 per cent. of needs, with the Government of Zimbabwe and the private sector responsible for the greater part of the response. Government reports imports of around 700,000 tonnes of maize to date, but the distribution of this food is not transparent, and the private sector has been excluded from participation.

The performance of the World Food Programme and its implementing partners has improved steadily. In January 2003, 3.3 million people were fed, and another 2 million people received supplementary food through bilateral programmes. The WFP is close to meeting its revised target of feeding 4.5 million people in February 2003, and 5 million in March 2003. Contributions and pledges to the WFP emergency appeal mean that the main WFP pipeline is 83 per cent. full until June of 2003.

Prospects for the coming year are under assessment. Insufficient maize was planted and the lack of fertilizers and rainfall raise the prospect of another poor production year. The capacity of the Government of Zimbabwe to continue to import maize in quantity is of concern, and it is already clear that continued international assistance will be needed. Donors are already planning for the future, and urging Government to ease price controls, which are distorting internal markets, and to open importation to the private sector to help meet needs.

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the humanitarian effects of the outbreak of foot and mouth disease in Zimbabwe. [98993]

Clare Short: The current FMD outbreak started in August 2001 at the time of the farm invasions, when fences were destroyed and domestic cattle were allowed to mingle with wild buffalo that carry the disease. Since then the illegal movement of animals and livestock theft has widened the geographic area of the outbreak.

Although the disease is highly infectious it appears to have a lesser impact in local domestic livestock, which although they become ill rarely die. There are fears however that the disease could spread to the more susceptible dairy animals. Exports of beef, dairy and pork products have been banned, halting the country's US$ 60 million export trade.

As smallholders own most of the cattle in Zimbabwe they are exposed to restrictions on animal movements and receive lower prices for their animals from infected areas. Foreign exchange shortages are limiting efforts to vaccinate animals at risk. Despite the best efforts of the veterinary services to control the outbreak there is neither the funding nor the political will to prevent illegal movement and restore the wildlife fences.

TRANSPORT

Alternative Fuels

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether she has issued guidelines to local authorities on the installation of facilities for the provision of (a) liquefied petroleum gas and (b) compressed natural gas. [97971]

Mr. Jamieson: Planning Policy Guidance note 13 states that local authorities

> "should look favourably at proposals" to provide liquefied petroleum gas and natural gas infrastructure,

> "in order to deliver wider environmental objectives".

London Airports (Rail Access)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the level of security for rail access to London airports. [98655]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department has objectively assessed all railway stations to ensure the security requirements in place are appropriate depending on the risk.

Transport Security

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the level of security at (a) transport infrastructure facilities other than airports and (b) railways. [98654]

Mr. Jamieson: In addition to airports, the Department for Transport sets the security standards in the UK for the maritime, Channel Tunnel and railway industries. The Department's security inspectors regularly monitor the security arrangements at, for example, ports, railway stations and the Channel Tunnel to ensure that the required standards are, and continue to be, met.

My Department's approach is to manage the risk to the industries arising from the threat of a terrorist attack. The security measures imposed seek to minimise the industries' vulnerabilities while recognising operational realities. The Government's aim is to set the measures to counter the risk.

All the security programmes are kept under continuous review. It is not our practice to detail the required security measures for obvious reasons.

Zero-sulphur Fuels

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what definition the Government uses of zero sulphur road transport fuel; what the present plans are for the introduction of zero sulphur motor transport fuels in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [98045]

Mr. Jamieson: The Secretary of State for Transport has responsibility for road fuel quality matters.

A Council and European Parliament directive, adopted at 3rd Reading on 6 February 2003, sets a maximum sulphur content of l0mg/kg for all petrol and diesel sold in the EU as from 1 January 2009. Other fuel properties are also defined in this directive, which is due to be published in the Official Journal of the European Community shortly. Fuels to this quality are generally referred to as "sulphur-free" or "zero sulphur" fuel. The Government will be introducing an amendment to the Motor Fuel (Composition and Content) Regulations to incorporate the directive requirements later this year.

The directive also requires Member States to ensure that petrol and diesel fuel to this quality is available on an "appropriately balanced geographical basis" from 1 January 2005 in order that it is available for the latest technology vehicles that can take best advantage of it. The Government are considering options, in conjunction with the oil industry, as to how best to achieve this objective.

A21

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps have been taken by the Highways Agency to evaluate the potential environmental impacts of route improvements to the A21. [98055]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 3 February 2003, Official Report, columns 35–37W.

Air Transport (Consultation)

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the impact of the inclusion of Gatwick Airport in the Government's consultation exercise on the (a) scope and (b) validity of proposals at other regional airports. [98275]

Mr. Jamieson: The forecasts for regional airports outside the South East and East of England, set out in the consultation documents published on 23 July 2002, were based on a range of policy scenarios which made alternative assumptions about the total quantum of capacity in the South East airports system. Our modelling suggests that the exact location of that capacity would have only a marginal impact on prospective demand at regional airports and would, therefore, not significantly affect the validity of the proposals for those airports.

The consultation remains open in all regions and will continue to do so until four months after the revised South East consultation document is published. We will continue to welcome comments on the proposals in those documents and any serious worked up alternatives until the consultation is finally concluded.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will allow a period of two months between the issue of his response to the consultation process on the future development of air transport in the United Kingdom and the publication of the White Paper. [98276]

Mr. Jamieson: We shall publish the Government's conclusions in a White Paper later this year.

We also intend to publish a summary of the responses to the consultation. However, in view of the very large number of responses we have received, and the need to check that the summary of them is accurate and complete, we cannot give any undertakings about how soon we could publish the summary.

British Airports Authority

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he is taking to encourage the British Airports Authority in England to introduce low emission vehicles. [97980]

Mr. Jamieson: The British Airports Authority (BAA) has already introduced a number of low-emission vehicles at its airports, particularly Gatwick and Heathrow. These vehicles, which are in most cases eligible for Government grants under the Powershift programme, can make a small but significant improvement to local air quality in and around airports. BAA is also helping a number of local authorities to develop air quality action plans where its airports contribute to local air pollution problems. These action plans are likely to include further commitments to reducing emissions of pollutants from BAA's vehicle fleet.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what security measures have been put in place along the route of the channel tunnel rail link; what discussions he has had with (a) the rail industry and (b) Home Office Ministers on security on the channel tunnel rail link route; and if he will make a statement. [98023]

Mr Jamieson: My officials have held detailed discussions with London and Continental Railways, the promoters of the channel tunnel rail link, about security measures. Any further disclosure regarding these security measures would not be in the public interest.

Croydon Tramlink

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the viability of the special purpose vehicles entered into between Amey and Croydon Tramlink. [98590]

Mr. Jamieson: Croydon Tramlink is a matter for the Mayor and Transport for London. I understand from them that there is no risk to the continued operation of the system.

Cycle Helmets

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assessment he has made of the effects on incidence and severity of injuries to cyclists as a result of increased cycle helmet wearing in the UK; [98988]

(2) whether his Department has assessed the relative safety merits of (a) promoting helmet wearing for cyclists and (b) promoting helmet wearing for (i) car drivers and (ii) pedestrians. [98986]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department commissioned an independent review of the effectiveness of cycle helmets, which was published at the end of November 2002 as Road Safety Research Report Number 30. Among other things, it concluded that bicycle helmets are effective at reducing the incidence and severity of head, brain and upper facial injuries. Also, the Bicycle Helmet Initiative Trust has been running a cycle helmet promotion scheme in Reading since 1992. During that time, cycle helmet use by children has trebled and there has been a 45 per cent. reduction in the number of hospital treated head injuries.

We have not made a similar assessment for pedestrians and car occupants.

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of reports 286 and 365 published by the Transport Research Laboratory on the effects on cycle use of promotional campaigns to encourage cycle helmet wearing. [98987]

Mr. Jamieson: Cycle helmet wearing rates observed on major built-up roads have increased significantly from 16 per cent. in 1994 to 22 per cent. in 1999. TRL Report 286 is principally a study of observed cycle helmet wearing rates in 1996. The report includes an assessment of current local authority initiatives to promote cycle helmet wearing and observed wearing rates but does not provide sufficient evidence to draw any firm conclusions about the effect of promotional campaigns on the levels of cycling.

Our objectives to increase cycling and improve the safety of cyclists are complementary. A key component in making cycling more popular is to make it a safer and more pleasant activity. Cycle helmets are effective at reducing head, brain and upper facial injuries, so encouraging the use of cycle helmets is one of many approaches to improving the safety of cyclists on our roads. A number of other approaches are summarised in TRL Report 365.

English Nature

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent meetings he has had with English Nature; what was discussed; and if he will place a copy of the minutes in the Library. [97267]

Mr. Jamieson: As with previous Administrations, and in line with exemptions 2 and 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, it is not this Government's normal practice to release details of specific meetings or their content, as these discussions may have taken place on a confidential basis. All such contacts are conducted in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code, the Civil Service Code, and Guidance for Civil Servants: Contacts with Lobbyists. Copies of these documents are available in the Libraries of the House.

Freight Access Grants

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the charge in lorry miles as a result of the freezing of freight and track access grants; and if he will list the companies which will have their freight and track access grants frozen, with the dates on which the freeze will take effect. [98398]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer to the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on 13 February 2003, Official Report, column 897W.

Greater London Assembly

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what financial assistance his Department gave to the Greater London Assembly in 2002; and for what projects. [95846]

Mr. Jamieson: The London Assembly is part of the Greater London Authority. It is responsible for scrutinising and reviewing the Mayor's exercise of his statutory functions. It has particular power to investigate, and prepare reports on actions and decisions taken by the Mayor or any member of the Greater London Authority. The London Assembly's specific costs are part of the overall Greater London Authority budget which is proposed each year by the mayor and is subject to the Assembly's agreement.

The GLA grants from the Department for Transport in 2002–03 are as follows:

GLA Transport Grant £1,024.118 million.

IT Contracts

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list IT contracts in his Department and its predecessors above £50 million in each year of the last 10 years; what the inception date for each system was; when it became fully functional; when it became fully debugged; and what the cost of over-runs has been. [99006]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department is aware of two contracts meeting the criteria.

DSA let a contract for the delivery of the screen based driving theory test from the inception date of 4 January 2000 until 3 September 2004. The contract value is £80 million in total. The system was fully functional from the inception date and did not need to be debugged. There have been no cost over-runs.

The Vehicle Inspectorate Agency awarded a contract for MOT Computerisation in February 2000. The contract value is £230 million. The planned completion date for full functionality is spring 2004. Cost has overrun by £4 million.

Laptop Computers

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many laptop computers were used by (a) Ministers and special advisers and (b) officials in his Department in each year since 1995; how many were (i) lost and (ii) stolen; what their cost was; and if he will make a statement. [98707]

Mr. Jamieson: The information requested on the use of laptop computers in each year since 1995 is not available centrally or in the form requested, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Since the establishment of the Department for Transport on 29 May 2002, there has been one reported case of a lost laptop computer, at a cost of £1,011. For the figures of the Department's predecessors, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) on 29 January 2002, Official Report, Volume 379, columns 182–84W, to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell).

Light Dues

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much was raised in light dues in the latest available year; and what his estimate is of the amount paid (a) per merchant ship per voyage and (b) by each fishing vessel (i) per voyage and (ii) per year. [98409]

Mr. Jamieson: The total income from light dues for 2001–02 was £74,785,262 of which £696,566 was paid by fishing vessels and tugs.

Light dues rates for merchant vessels in 2001–02 were levied at 0.41p per registered ton. Fishing vessels and tugs paid an annual rate of £202.00 for the first 10 metres and £21.00 for each metre of length in excess of 10 metres.

The rates were reduced in April 2002 to £0.40p per registered ton for merchant vessels and a cap of 40,000 tons was introduced, making the maximum charge payable £16,000 per voyage, to reduce the burden of light dues falling on the largest vessels. The rates for fishing vessels and tugs were also reduced to an annual payment of £190.00 for the first 10 metres and £20.00 for each metre thereafter.

Once a merchant vessel has paid light dues, there is no further liability for a period of one month from that date. Furthermore, no more than seven payments are required in any fiscal year. We therefore do not hold information on merchant vessel movements beyond the seven voyage limit. Neither do we hold records on fishing vessel or tug activity.

Liquefied Petroleum Gas

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the cumulative investment by the private sector in automotive liquefied petroleum gas refuelling infrastructure; how many automotive liquefied petroleum gas refuelling outlets there are in the United Kingdom; and how many car manufacturers offer liquefied petroleum gas models in the United Kingdom. [98182]

Mr Jamieson: There are currently over 1,100 LPG refuelling sites in the UK. The financial detail of this substantial investment in the technology is commercial information, private to the companies concerned. Eight vehicle manufacturers now offer LPG cars, in addition to the cars for which conversions are available. PowerShift grants are available for both purchase of new LPG cars, and conversions, which deliver the required environmental improvements.

Ministerial Speeches

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a copy of the speech given by the Transport Minister to the Lunar Society on 8 February. [98022]

Mr Spellar: A speech text is not available—I spoke from notes.

Overweight Vehicles

Mark Tami: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the cost to (a) his Department and (b) local authorities of damage done to UK roads by overweight vehicles in (i) 1999, (ii) 2000 and (iii) 2001. [97072]

Mr. Jamieson: These figures are difficult to estimate, since they would require a detailed knowledge of the types of vehicle concerned, the extent of their overloading, the roads that they travelled on, and the distances they travelled. These figures are not available.

Two thirds of heavy goods vehicle mileage occurs on motorways and trunk roads. On these roads carriageways and bridges are designed to cater for overweight vehicles, and the effect of these vehicles is too small to quantify when compared to the cumulative effect of traffic over the life of a road.

Most modern articulated lorries are capable of carrying more than their normal operational weight safely. Overloading offences declined with the introduction of 40 tonne lorries in January 1999, and declined further when 44 tonne lorries were introduced in February 2001.

Pedestrian Crossings

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will amend the Zebra, Pelican and Puffin Pedestrian Crossings Regulations and General Directions 1997 to allow for the part-time operation of flashing beacons. [98588]

Mr. Jamieson: Zebra crossings operate 24 hours a day and part-time operation of beacons could be taken to imply that this was not the case. It would also remove an important safety element that warns drivers that they are approaching a zebra crossing. There is, therefore, a real danger that adopting this proposal would increase accidents at pedestrian crossings at times when the flashing beacons are turned off. In view of this, we have no plans to make this amendment to the regulations.

Rail Maintenance Contracts

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the maintenance contracts which have been awarded to private firms by the SRA since its inception; and if he will list the maintenance firms which have had their contracts prematurely terminated by the SRA. [98402]

Mr. Spellar: Railway asset maintenance is not dealt with by the SRA.

Rail Services

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve rail journey times between Leeds and Sheffield. [96821]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority (SRA) is working with Midland Main Line to implement the latter's franchise commitment to provide an hourly non-stop service from Leeds to London, all of which will call at Sheffield. This will represent a substantial increase in the number of non-stop services between Leeds and Sheffield, although journey times will be largely unchanged.

Railway Inspectorate

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the total value was of (a) technical and financial contracts, (b) technical consultants used on a call-off basis and (c) financial consultants used on a call-off basis, by Her Majesty's Railway Inspectorate, in each year since 1992. [93229]

Mr. Jamieson: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) does not let financial contracts and therefore has no information in respect of financial contracts or financial consultants.

The total value of work commissioned by HMRI for technical contracts in each year since 1992 is as follows:

£000

	External Research	External support via call-off arrangements
1992–93	9.3	60.9
1993–94	90.5	14.9
1994–95	143	50
1995–96	77.1	244
1996–97	214.6	55.4
1997–98	526.5	48.1
1998–99	263.3	61.1
1999–2000	878.9	24.9
2000–01	89.6	798.3
2001–02	241.5	264.5
2002–03[1]	314	127

[1] Figures cover period to 2 February 2003

Railways (External Consultants)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the total value was of (a) technical and financial contracts, (b) technical consultants used on a call-off basis and (c) financial consultants used on a call-off basis, by the Office of the Rail Regulator, in each year since 1992. [93227]

Mr. Jamieson: The table shows expenditure by the Office of the Rail Regulator for the year 2001–02 and since 1 April 2002. Figures for the period before 2001 could be provided only at disproportionate cost to the Office of the Rail Regulator.

	2001–02	Since 1 April 2002
(a) Technical and financial contracts	383,000	226,000
(b) Technical consultants, call off	351,000	458,000
(c) Financial consultants, call off	378,000	695,000

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the total value was of (a) technical and financial contracts, (b) technical consultants used on a call-off basis and (c) financial consultants used on a call-off basis, by the (i) Health and Safety Commission and (ii) Health and Safety Executive relating to railway matters in each year since 1992. [93230]

Mr. Jamieson: The Health and Safety Commission (HSC) does not commission its own work since the Health and Safety Executive (HSE), as set up under the terms of the Health and Safety at Work Act 1974, has executive responsibility for commissioning appropriate work on HSC's behalf.

The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) does not let financial contracts and therefore has no information in respect of financial contracts or financial consultants.

The total value of work commissioned by HSE (including HMRI) for technical contracts relating to railway matters in each year since 1992 is as follows:

£000

	External research	External support via call-off contract arrangements
1992–93	9.3	60.9
1993–94	90.5	14.9

2000–01	[1]95.1	798.3
2001–02	[1]248	264.5
2002–03[2]	314	421.5

[1] These figures include rail-related research commissioned by HSE's Safety Policy Directorate as well as HSE's HM Railway Inspectorate (HMRI).

[2] Figures cover period to 2 February 2003.

Renewable Energy

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what changes in unit payments for electricity have resulted from the switch by his Department to purchasing renewable energy which is exempt from the Climate Change Levy. [96488]

Mr. Jamieson: In response to Government targets, my Department has switched a number of its sites over to the purchase of electricity from renewable energy sources that are exempt from the Climate Change Levy. Where this has taken place, the actual average price was 4.07p/kWh, the 'standard' electricity price would have been [illegible] the increase due to the purchase of [illegible] energy is 0.17p/kWh or 4.3 per cent.

Road Building

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the schemes in the Government's targeted programme of improvements have been through all their statutory processes. [98021]

Mr Jamieson: There are 72 schemes in the Targeted Programme of Improvements and 28 of these, including six already delivered, have been through all their statutory processes.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the roads schemes where a full Environmental Statement under Directive 97/11/EC was produced before inclusion in the Government's targeted programme of improvements [98024]

Mr. Jamieson: A full Environmental Statement under Directive 97/11/EC was produced for the following 33 schemes, before inclusion in the Government's targeted programme of improvements; A1 Willowburn-Denwick Improvement, A1(M) Ferrybridge-Hook Moor, A1(M) Wetherby-Walshford, A2/A282 Dartford Improvement, A5 Nesscliffe Bypass, A6 Great Glen Bypass, A6 Rushden and Higham Ferrers Bypass, A6 Rothwell-Desborough Bypass, A6 Clapham Bypass, A6 Alvaston, A10 Wadesmill-Colliers End, A11 Roudham Heath-Attleborough Improvement, A21 Lamberhurst Bypass, A27 Polegate Bypass, A41 Aston Clinton Bypass, A43 Silverstone Bypass, A43 Whitfield Turn-Brackley Hatch Improvement, A43 M40-B4031 Dualling, A46 Newark-Lincoln Improvement, A63 Selby Bypass, A66 Stainburn and Great Clifton Bypass, A120 Stansted-Braintree Improvement, A249 Iwade-Queenborough Improvement, A500 Basford, Hough, Shavington Bypass, A650 Bingley Relief Road, A1033 Hedon Road Improvement, M25 J12–15 Widening, M60 J5–8 Widening, M6 Carlisle-Guardsmill Extension, A595 Parton-Lillyhall Improvement, A1 Dishforth-Leeming, A1 Bramham-Wetherby (including Wethe[illegible]ypass), A1 Leeming-Barton.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are taken by the Highways Agency to evaluate the potential effects of road building schemes on (a) SSSIs, (b) AONBs and (c) national parks before Ministerial approval. [98054]

Mr. Jamieson: All road building schemes undertaken by the Highways Agency are subject to environmental assessment. Potential effects on SSSIs, AONBs and National Parks are considered as part of this assessment process.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list completed road building programmes that have affected designated (a) SSSIs, (b) AONBs and (c) national parks in each year since 1997. [98056]

Mr. Jamieson: The following major trunk road schemes completed in or since 1997 (completion year in brackets) affected:

(a) SSSIs

A34 Newbury bypass (1998);

M5J8–9 Widening (1998);

M1-A1 Lofthouse-Bramham Link Roads (1999);

M66 Denton-Middleton Contract 1 (2000);

A13 Thames Avenue to Wennington (1997);

(b) AONBs

M25 Junctions 8–10 Widening (1998);

A417/A419 Swindon-Gloucester DBFO (1998);

(c) National parks—none.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list road schemes proposed by local authorities in England and Wales in local transport plans that will affect (a) sites of special interest, (b) areas of outstanding scientific natural beauty, (c) national parks and (d) internationally designated sites; and in each case whether a preferred route has been announced. [98057]

Mr. Jamieson: The following schemes listed, which have been accepted or provisionally accepted in local transport plans, will have some effect on such areas as indicated by an (a), (b), (c) or (d) as appropriate. Local authorities will work with the statutory environmental bodies to implement appropriate mitigation. Where a preferred route has been announced this is indicated by "PR". My Department is not responsible for road schemes in Wales.

Oakham Bypass—(a) PR

A43 Corby Link Road—(a) PR

Brunei Link & Harnham Relief Road—(a) PR

Weymouth Relief Road—(a) (b) PR

East Luton Corridor—(b)

A158 Coastal Access, Lincolnshire—(b) PR

Carlisle Northern Development Route—(d) PR

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list road building programmes by county. [98053]

Mr. Jamieson: A table containing a list of Highways Agency targeted programme of improvements road schemes by county and a list of English local authority major road schemes by local highway authority has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Road Gritting

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the authorities in England who have the direct responsibility for gritting trunk roads; and what the authorities' new responsibilities are for gritting roads. [98556]

Mr. Jamieson: The operation and gritting of trunk roads in England is the responsibility of the Highways Agency.

In England there is no explicit statutory duty on a highway authority to remove ice, but we shall introduce one at a suitable legislative opportunity.

Road Quietening Schemes

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the road quietening schemes that are being examined by his Department for the ASO. [98885]

Mr. Jamieson: The following lengths of A50 are included in the Ten Year Plan for Transport with a view to replacing the existing concrete surface with a quieter material:

Doveridge Bypass

Derby Southern Bypass

Foston, Hatton, Hilton Bypass, and

Blythe Bridge to Uttoxeter.

Rural Road Hierarchy

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the Government will implement a new rural road hierarchy. [98025]

Mr Jamieson: Following the publication of the Rural Road Hierarchy Report in November 2001 we are progressing work to improve safety across our rural road network. This includes the development of a framework to assess what speeds are appropriate together with surveys of what speeds are actually being driven on rural roads. The first results of this work should be available shortly and will feed into other work including a review of the guidance on setting speed limits due to start later this year.

Signage

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the Circular which will explain the Traffic Signs Regulations and General Directions 2002 will provide guidance to highway authorities on avoiding sign clutter in the countryside; and when it will be published. [98027]

Mr Jamieson: DfT Circular 02/2003 was published on 31 January. It explains the differences between the Traffic Signs Regulations and General Directions (TSRGD) 2002 and the TSRGD 1994 that they replace. It does not contain guidance on sign clutter. However the Department will be publishing updated guidance later this year which will remind signing practitioners that signs should be used sparingly whether in the countryside or in towns. The revised Chapter 4 of the Traffic Signs Manual, on the use of warning signs, which we expect to publish in the summer, will provide advice on how to provide effective signing while minimising environmental intrusion. Revised guidance on the use of directional signs to tourist destinations will remind local authorities of the need to minimise the environmental impacts of signs, particularly in rural areas.

Speed Limits

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the highway authorities which have a policy of adopting a 30 mph speed limit as the norm through villages; and what action the Government are taking in respect of highway authorities which have not adopted a policy of 30 mph speed limits as the norm through villages. [98026]

Mr Jamieson: This information is not held centrally. Local highway authorities have powers to set speed limits on their roads according to local needs.

The Department is however developing guidance to local highway authorities on village entry signing to assist with introducing 30mph speed limits in villages — supported by other work that is seeking to simplify the process.

Strategic Rail Authority

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which organisations provided (a) legal, (b) financial and (c) auditing services valued at over £25,000 to the Strategic Rail Authority in 2002. [98339]

Mr. Jamieson: In the calendar year 2002, the following firms provided legal, financial and audit services with a value of over £25,000:

Thames Gateway

Jon Cruddas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to establish a light rail link to Dagenham Dock and Rainham. [98711]

Mr. Jamieson: None. Light rail schemes in London are a matter for the Mayor and Transport for London.

Traffic Calming

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what guidelines and duties there are for local authorities on the imposition of traffic calming measures in mixed residential and industrial areas. [98865]

Mr. Jamieson: There is no specific duty on local highway authorities to impose traffic calming measures. However, they may wish to consider introducing them to meet their duty to have, as far as practicable, safe movement of traffic on roads within their area. Any measures implemented must be in accordance with the "Highways (Road Humps) Regulations 1999" or the "Highways (Traffic Calming) Regulations 1999", including the requirement to consult with representatives of those likely to be affected. The Department has issued guidance on traffic calming including Traffic Advisory Leaflets, and the Road Safety Good Practice Guide and has contributed to guidelines published by professional bodies.

Traffic Light Repairs

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what guidelines and duties there are for local authorities on the prompt repair of traffic lights; [98866]

(2) what (a) guidance he gives and (b) duties are laid upon local authorities, to repair defective traffic lights within a specified period. [98445]

Mr. Jamieson: Technical Standard TD24, All-Purpose Trunk Roads Inspection and Maintenance of Traffic Signals and Associated Equipment, was produced by the Highways Agency for their roads but also provides guidance to local authorities. It includes reference to non-routine maintenance. Faults causing safety hazards or unacceptable delay to road users should be attended as a matter of urgency with cover available 24 hours per day, seven days a week. Response and repair times will depend on the particular local circumstances and will be subject to contractual arrangements between local authorities and their contractors. TD24 is part of the Design Manual for Roads and Bridges and is available from the Stationary Office.

Local authorities also have a general duty to secure the "expeditious, convenient and safe movement of vehicular and other traffic (including pedestrians)" under section 122 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984.

Transport Schemes (Appraisal Review)

Jon Cruddas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce his review of the system for appraising new transport schemes; what the terms of reference are for the review; and when he hopes to complete the review. [98620]

Mr. Jamieson: The system for appraising new transport schemes is updated and revised periodically. At present, we are undertaking revisions to reflect the guidance in the Treasury's revised Green Book, "Appraisal and Evaluation in Central Government", published on 17 January 2003, and expect to issue these early in March 2003. We have undertaken research into assessing regeneration impacts following publication of the 1999 SACTRA (Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment) report, "Transport and the Economy". The results of Phase 1 of this work are published on the Department's website. We expect draft revised guidance on this topic to be issued in mid-2003.

DEFENCE

Aircraft Carrier Orders

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what proportion of the cost of designing and building the two recently ordered aircraft carriers is to be paid to (a) BAE Systems and (b) Thales; [98313]

(2) how the programme to design and build the two recently ordered aircraft carriers is to be shared between BAE Systems and Thales; and if he will make a statement. [98312]

Mr. Ingram: Our two new Future Aircraft Carriers (CVFs) have not yet been ordered. On 30 January 2003, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced the way forward for CVF. Our conclusion was that, to obtain value for money and provide the best capability, an alliance approach would offer the best meansof delivering a programme of this magnitude. We envisage that the alliance will be led by BAE Systems as the preferred Prime Contractor, with responsibility for project and shipbuilding management. Thales UK will assume a major role as the Key Supplier of the whole ship design. We intend the Ministry of Defence to take up a formal role within the Alliance. Negotiations on the alliance arrangements are now underway, and it is therefore not yet possible to state what proportion of the costs will be paid to BAE Systems or Thales. It is not intended to place the Prime Contract for the Demonstration and Manufacture phase of the CVF programme, during which the ships will actually be built, until the spring of 2004.

Biochemical Protection Suits

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of (a) Royal Navy and (b) Royal Marines personnel scheduled for deployment to the Gulf (i) have been and (ii) will be issued with CBW protection suits. [98412]

Mr. Ingram: All Royal Navy and Royal Marine personnel deployed to the Gulf will have access to sufficient CBW suits to meet our contingency plans.

Coastal Security

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the ability of the Royal Navy to (a) monitor and (b) prevent the landing of (i) terrorists and (ii) illegal immigrants from small boats on UK beaches. [98239]

Mr. Ingram: The Home Office is responsible for United Kingdom counter-terrorism policy, and the lead for domestic security lies with the civil authorities. Royal Navy ships conduct many routine operations and exercises around the United Kingdom throughout the year, and any of these ships could be diverted to meet a requirement at the specific request of the civil authorities. In addition, the Fleet Ready Escort, a Frigate or Destroyer continuously available at a high state of readiness, is at short notice to respond to any incident in United Kingdom waters.

Correspondence

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 7 November, Official Report, column 477W, when he will write to the hon. Member for Reading, East. [87217]

Dr. Moonie: I replied to my hon. Friend today.

Defence Export Services Organisation

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the purpose is of the Defence Export Services organisation; what its net cost was in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [95794]

Mr. Ingram: The purpose of the Defence Export Services Organisation (DESO) is to support legitimate defence exports, co-ordinating Government assistance to United Kingdom defence exporters and overseas customers interested in acquiring United Kingdom defence products.

The net operating costs of DESO and related support functions over the last five financial years are as follows:

Financial Year	£ million
1997–98	14.380
1998–99	16.010
1999–2000	13.735
2000–01	12.360
2001–02	11.007

These costs are more than offset by financial benefits to the Defence budget arising from DESO's activities including economies of scale generated by exports for the Ministry of Defence's own procurement.

Defence Finance

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the scope for savings in the defence procurement budget as a consequence of increased European collaboration on defence procurement; and if he will make a statement. [96643]

Mr. Ingram: Collaboration in defence programmes can bring economic benefits by sharing non-recurring costs and through economies of scale in production and, further through the life cycle, by sharing in service support and upgrade costs. Collaboration is considered in all equipment programmes when developing the procurement strategies to best meet the needs of our Armed Forces, but it is not an easy option. Harmonising requirements, aligning funding and approvals processes and meeting workshare expectations amongst anything from two partners upwards is rarely straightforward. Thus tune, cost and performance risks can be magnified in collaborative programmes. Overall, however, the benefits more than outweigh the potential disadvantages.

Defence Fire Service

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence further to his answer of 10 February 2003, Official Report, column 506, on the Defence Fire Service, who made the decision locally not to respond to requests for assistance outside the perimeter; whether this decision was made (a) with the knowledge of and (b) on the instructions of a Government Minister; when the instruction was recognised as unnecessary; and whether the order was revoked (i) on the instructions of and (ii) with the knowledge of a Government Minister. [98938]

Mr. Ingram: The decision that the fire appliances based at Kineton would not respond to requests for assistance outside the perimeter on days on which local fire brigades were taking industrial action was made by the Fire Station Commander, on the advice of the Commandant of the Depot, and an order to this effect was issued on 1 November 2002. An investigation into the circumstances at Kineton was carried out in early February and as a result the order was revoked on the authority of the Defence Fire Service (Army).

Neither the decision to issue the original order nor its revocation was made on the instructions of, or with the knowledge of, a Government Minister.

Defence Procurement

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his estimate is of (a) cost overruns and (b) delivery delays in each UK military procurement project valued at £100 million and over in each year from 1990–91 to 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [96819]

Mr Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the Major Projects Reports covering the years in question. These provide cost and delivery information on the Ministry of Defence's major equipment projects. Copies are available in the Library of the House.Information on the remaining projects from the years in question estimated to cost £100 million and over is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost. Exemption 9 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information applies.

Eurofighter

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer on 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 638W, on the Eurofighter, if he will make a statement on the procedure for the booking and use of designated areas for testing Eurofighter jets; and if he will publish the rules covering supersonic flights. [96760]

Mr. Ingram: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Fleet Readiness

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions since May 1997 the Royal Navy has not had at least one aircraft carrier immediately available for active service. [98229]

Mr. Ingram: There has not been an occasion since May 1997 when the Royal Navy has not had at least one aircraft carrier available for active service.

Friendly Fire

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent measures the Royal Marines have adopted to avoid friendly fire incidents by (a) UK and (b) allied forces. [98238]

Mr. Ingram: As stated in the answer given on 18 December 2002, Official Report, column 807W, to the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch), tactics, techniques and procedures, situational awareness and target identification complement each other and form a triad of measures designed to achieve Combat Identification and minimise the risk of fratricide. In relation to possible operations in the Gulf, we are working closely with allies to establish robust arrangements on Combat Identification that maximise interoperability, and we will acquire additional equipment in time for any potential conflict to enable our forces, including the Royal Marines, to operate effectively alongside coalition forces.

Heathrow (Military Deployment)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether armed forces personnel deployed to secure London Heathrow airport have been deployed with suits and respirators in preparation for a possible chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear attack. [98652]

Mr. Ingram: The deployment of the armed forces and their equipment is determined by a number of factors including the task to be undertaken, the environment in which they are to operate and the threat that they face. In the case of the recent operation at Heathrow airport, the police and military personnel were not deployed with Chemical, Biological, Radiological or Nuclear equipment.

Helicopters

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many helicopters there are in the (a) Navy, (b) Army and (c) Air Force, broken down by type. [98292]

Mr. Ingram: The number of helicopters in the Navy, Army and Air Force, broken down by type, as at 12 February 2003, are provided in the following table.

Helicopter	Actual operating fleet	Sustainment fleet[1]	Disposal[2]	Comments
Navy
Merlin Mk 1	28	15	0	—
Sea King AEW Mk 2/7	9	4	0	—

Notes:

[1] The sustainment fleet includes helicopters undergoing scheduled base maintenance, those awaiting repair to accident damage, those that are in development and those held in reserve.

[2] Helicopters awaiting disposal

[3] Includes nine aircrat that are the School of Army Aviation assets.

[4] Wessex Helicopters are no longer operationally in service.

[5] Includes six aircraft recently purchased from Republic of South Africa to ensure enduring sustainability.

Hunting with Dogs

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what reports he has received of proposals for hunting with dogs on (a) Ministry of Defence land and (b) at the Colchester Garrison; and if he will take action to prevent such activity; [98399]

(2) what his policy is towards allowing Ministry of Defence land to be used for hunting with dogs; and if he will make a statement. [98400]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence has issued 27 licences for hunting with dogs on the Defence Estate for the 2002–03 season, including one for the Colchester area. In the absence of a statutory ban, my Department has no legal grounds on which to stop this activity, which has been undertaken under licensed conditions for many years on its estate. However, mindful of all the issues involved, foxhunting is restricted to those hunts that have traditionally held licences or enjoyed such rights on the Defence Estate.

The current foxhunting season, (which began on 1 September 2002 and which ends on 30 April 2003), is being conducted under strict terms and conditions, agreed with the Master of Foxhounds Association.

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the last time hunting with dogs was permitted on (a) Ministry of Defence land and (b) at the Colchester Garrison; and on how many occasions since May 1997 such activity has taken place. [98401]

Dr. Moonie: The information regarding the number of times hunting with dogs has taken place on Ministry of Defence land is not held centrally. Hunting has taken place in the Colchester Garrison area on eight days since May 1997, the last occasion being 14 December 2000.

Incremental Acquisition

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implications of the practice of incremental acquisition for (a) the cost of ownership of warships and other major vessels, with particular reference to the depreciation or write-off rate applied to equipment replaced by enhanced items, (b) adjustments to the base cost for the purpose of calculating annual carrying charges and (c) the calculation of depreciation bases generally. [98240]

Mr. Ingram: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

International Military Services

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what claims for payment against the Government of Iraq in respect of contracts with International Military Services are outstanding. [99075]

Mr. Ingram: There are no claims for payment outstanding against the Government of Iraq in respect of contracts with International Military Services.

Land Mines (Gulf)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the (a) possession and (b) possible use of landmines by Allied forces in the Gulf. [93939]

Mr. Ingram: The United Kingdom as a State Party to the Ottawa Convention does not possess operational anti-personnel landmines and will not use them. Allies' intentions are a matter for them. United Kingdom Forces will not provide any assistance for the use of anti-personnel landmines.

Land-Attack Cruise Missiles

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the value of equipping future Type 45 destroyers with land-attack cruise missiles. [98236]

Mr. Ingram: As was made clear in the SDR New Chapter in July 2002, in post-Cold War conventional military operations there has been an increased emphasis on the need for precision in the use of force, to minimise unintended casualties and accidental damage.

The ability to conduct covert stand-off reconnaissance and surveillance, the accurate pin-pointing of targets, the updating and communication of targeting information in near real time and the ability to strike hard with a high degree of precision, will all be important. Land attack cruise missiles can play a key role in such a scenario. This capability is presently provided by submarine-launched Tomahawk missiles.

The principal role of the Type 45 Destroyers will be Anti-Air Warfare. However, they are being designed and built with significant space and weight margins to enable incremental acquisition, should an emerging requirement necessitate a different equipment fit. Our requirements are being kept under review and, under such circumstances, the design could be modified to incorporate improved land attack capabilities, including a land attack cruise missile system.

Landmines Act

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to review Section 5 of the Landmines Act 1998. [98818]

Mr. Ingram: None.

Military Secondments

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many United Kingdom military personnel, broken down by rank and service, are currently (a) seconded to, (b) attached to, (c) under the operational command of and (d) on personnel exchanges with units or ships of the United States armed forces that (i) are deployed in South West Asia, the Gulf region or the Middle East, (ii) are on route to that region and (iii) have been ordered or alerted to deploy to that region. [98718]

Mr. Ingram: As at 14 February 2003, 31 United Kingdom military personnel serving as British Exchange Officers with United States units were either deployed or warned to deploy to South West Asia, the Gulf Region and the Middle East.

I am withholding information on the service and rank of these individuals under Exemption 1 (defence, security and international relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements are in place for United Kingdom military personnel who are (a) seconded to, (b) attached to, (c) under the operational command of and (d) on personnel exchanges to armed forces in countries which become party to an armed conflict that the United Kingdom is not a party to. [98719]

Mr. Ingram: Decisions on the arrangements for such United Kingdom military personnel would be made in the light of the circumstances pertaining at the time.

MRAV Programme

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on delays to the MRAV programme; and for what reasons he plans to procure fewer vehicles than was originally envisaged. [97189]

Mr. Ingram: The tri-national MRAV programme remains within its original time and cost approvals. However, there have been delays to the delivery of the first prototype vehicle and the Integrated Logistics Support programme. All partners are only contractually committed to the end of the development phase of the MRAV programme. No formal decisions on the number of MRAV vehicles to be procured have yet been made. Our plans for all acquisition programmes are continually under review and MRAV is no exception.

Nancekuke

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 10 February 2003, Official Report, columns 513–14, on RAF Portreath, what studies excluding environmental surveys have been undertaken by (a) the Government or (b) agencies on behalf of the Government with respect to (i) past and (ii) current activities at Nancekuke in Cornwall in the last 30 years. [98384]

Dr. Moonie: I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Libraryof the House.

Naval Deployment

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportions of (a) Royal Navy and (b) Royal Marines (i) personnel and (ii) equipment are scheduled for (A) despatch to the Gulf, (B) other duties and (C) maintenance, repair and refit. [98247]

Mr. Ingram: As at 18 February 2003, some 27 per cent. of Royal Navy surface ships and submarines, 15 per cent. of Royal Navy and 45 per cent. of Royal Marine trained personnel were deployed, or en-route, to the Gulf region. This compares with around 41 per cent. of Royal Navy surface ships and submarines, 14 per cent. of Royal Navy and 6 per cent. of Royal Marine trained personnel deployed on other tasks, including Operation Fresco. Some 32 per cent. of surface ships and submarines are currently in maintenance, repair or refit.

No further major Royal Navy or Royal Marine deployments are currently scheduled for the Gulf.

Naval Refits

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in establishing estimated through-life costs of warships and other RN and RFA vessels; whether the estimates will be published in the Annual Major Projects Report; and when key stages on the route to publication will be reached. [98242]

Mr. Ingram: Whole life cost estimates are being developed for all major Royal Navy and Royal Fleet Auxiliary vessels as part of the Ministry of Defence's Through Life Management Planning process. The first phase of this work is due to complete in March 2003. A note on progress in developing whole life cost information was contained in Major Projects Report 2002, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. It is planned that Major Projects Report 2003 will include whole life cost data on the 20 projects for which the main investment decision has been taken. This will include the Astute submarine, the Type 45 Destroyer and the Landing Ship Dock (Auxiliary). The National Audit Office expect to publish their report at the end of the year.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the HMS Glasgow refit will be complete; how much it will cost; whether it is on budget; what the target date is for completion; when the ship will be ready for service; and if he will make a statement. [98848]

Mr. Ingram: HMS Glasgow has not undergone a refit. The ship was in extended readiness and regeneration work has been carried out in preparation for her re-joining the Fleet, to ease the short-term programming gap created by HMS Nottingham's unavailability. This package of work cost approximately £2.5 million, and was completed in December 2002 and within budget. On the return of ship's personnel from Operation Fresco, HMS Glasgow will undergo Sea Trials and training requirements before returning to the Fleet.

This regeneration work will enable HMS Glasgow to be available for operations until HMS Nottingham returns to service in November 2004, after which, on current plans, she will be in Extended Readiness.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the cost is of the repairs being carried out on the HMS St. Albans; when it will be ready for service; and if he will make a statement. [98849]

Mr. Ingram: The final cost of the incident involving HMS St. Albans, including her repair, is not yet known, but it is estimated to be less than £5 million. The repair work has been completed and the ship commenced harbour training on 11 February 2003. Although the crew from St. Albans have been assisting in Operation FRESCO, the ship is currently able to undertake some basic sea safety training, prior to the start of Operational Sea Training, scheduled for the end of March. This training is planned to complete in the summer and the vessel will then be available for operational tasking.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the (a) HMS Monmouth and (b) HMS Campbeltown refit will be complete; how much it will cost; whether it is on budget; what the target date is for completion; when the ship will be ready for service; and if he will make a statement. [98341]

Mr. Ingram: HMS Monmouth's refit at Rosyth is planned for completion in June 2003 and following associated sea trials she is expected to be ready for operational deployment later that month. The final refit costs will be determined once all work is completed, but are expected to remain within budget and be in the region of £19 million.

HMS Campbeltown's refit at Devonport is planned for completion in March 2003 and following associated sea trials she is expected to be ready for operational deployment in April 2003. Like HMS Monmouth, her final refit costs will be agreed once all work is completed, but are expected to remain within budget and be in the region of £10 million.

Both refits involve necessary equipment refurbishment and enhancements to their operational and support systems.

Naval Rules of Engagement

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to change the rules of engagement as they apply to Royal Navy warships facing suicide attack by small craft. [98234]

Mr. Ingram: Rules of engagement are classified as their disclosure could give an enemy information about the permissions and restrictions imposed on our forces. I am therefore withholding details in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Naval Vessels (Handover)

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the (a) revenue received from Romania for and (b) cost of modernising and preparing for handover (i) HMS Coventry and (ii) HMS London. [95887]

Mr. Ingram: The value to the United Kingdom of the first phase of the agreement is £116 million and includes the cost of modernisation and preparation of the ships for handover. I am withholding the details of the information requested in accordance with Exemption 13 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information as it is commercial in confidence.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the main items to be (a) removed, (b) replaced and (c) upgraded in preparing (i) HMS Coventry and (ii) HMS London for handover to Romania. [95888]

Mr. Ingram: The Seawolf missile system, the towed array sonar and a number of smaller sensitive equipments will be removed from ex-HM Ships Coventry and London prior to handover to Romania. A medium range gun will be fitted together with an associated fire control system. Refurbished gas turbine units will be refitted into the ships and, in addition, the Command and Control System will be modified to take account of the weapons fit. No other major systems will be upgraded during the preparation phase.

Old Military Equipment

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his Department's policy is on recycling old military equipment. [98299]

Mr. Ingram: Surplus and obsolete items are sold via the MOD's Disposal Services Agency (DSA) on a Governments-Government basis, through either competitive tender or a marketing partnership with Industry to achieve the maximum return for the taxpayer. The DSA has sole delegated authority to sell military equipment declared as surplus by the Armed Forces. Surplus equipment is sold either for re-utilisation for its original (military) purpose, for a secondary (commercial) purpose or for scrap.

Procurement

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when the orders for the second batch of Astute class submarines will be placed; and for how many boats; [98245]

(2) whether the schedule for ordering later batches of Astute class submarines has been affected by the delayed building of the first batch. [98244]

Mr. Ingram: An agreed programme for the first buy of Astute is a pre-requisite of any future orders. On current plans, a decision on the timing and detail of future submarine orders is expected later this year.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Defence Procurement Agency expects to award a contract for the 5.56 mm light machine guns; how much these guns will weigh; how many units will be produced; when the guns will come into full service; what the length is of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [98350]

Mr. Ingram: The Light Machine Gun requirement is for a weapon system with ancillaries that weighs less than 20 kg when loaded with a belt of 200 rounds. A contract for around 2,500 weapons is expected to be placed before the summer to achieve an approved in service date of 2004. The contract will take up to three years to complete.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to award a contract for the Light Forces Anti-Tank Guided Weapon System; how many units will be produced; what part of the Army will use it; when it will come into service; what the length is of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [98351]

Mr. Ingram: The Light Forces Anti-Tank Guided Weapon System contract, for in excess of 350 systems, was placed on 7 February 2003 and is expected to be completed in 2010.

The system is expected to enter service with the Joint Rapid Reaction Forces and the Mechanised Infantry in 2006.

Research and Development

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his estimate is of his Department's total expenditure on military research and development in each year from 1990–91 to 2003–04 (planned); and if he will make a statement. [96644]

Mr. Ingram: Research and Development figures for the years up to and including 2000–01 are published by the Defence Analytical Services Agency (DASA) in "UK Defence Statistics" and before 1992 were reported in "Volume 2 of the Statement on the Defence Estimates" (both of these are available in the Library of the House). All figures are net of receipts and include recoverable VAT, the Technology Demonstrator Programme (TDP) and certain other minor research items.

On this basis the figures covering expenditure by the Ministry of Defence on Research and Development for 1990–91 to 2000–01, as published in UK Defence Statistics, are given as follows:

Current prices in £ million

Year	Research expenditure	Development expenditure
1990–91	412	1,926
1991–92	466	2,091
1992–93	513	1,568
1993–94	654	1,625
1994–95	665	1,366
1995–96	676	1,394
1996–97	705	1,440
1997–98	656	1,655
1998–99	620	1,476
1999–2000	584	1,761
2000–01	558	1,821

The Ministry of Defence does not have a specific research and development budget. There is a research budget covering non-nuclear research known as the Research Building Block. Separately, the MOD has a much larger budget for the acquisition of equipment within which some expenditure may be regarded as equipment development and some as equipment production. The development element of the acquisition expenditure is not used as a control total. The amount that is statistically counted as development (rather than production) in any one year is largely a consequence of the stage of the procurement cycle at which major equipment projects happen to be in the year in question. Expenditure on 'development' for 2001–02 to 2003–04 is therefore not yet separately identifiable.

Research figures for the years 2001-02 to 2003–04 have been compiled according to the principles of Resource Accounting and Budgeting (RAB). The figures as follows are for the Research Building Block expenditure and forecasts. All the above figures for these three years exclude recoverable VAT, the Technology Demonstrator Programme (TDP) and other minor research items.

MOD Research Expenditure covering years 2001–02 to 2003–04 (inclusive):

£ million

Year	Research expenditure
2001–02	414 (actual)
2002–03	418 (forecast)
2003–04	421 (provisional)

Royal Naval Vessels

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the Royal naval vessels (a) scrapped, (b) sold, together with revenue received and (c) downgraded to reserve status in each of the past five years. [92961]

Mr. Ingram: The major former Royal Naval vessels (named capital ships) sold by the Ministry of Defence's Disposal Services Agency (DSA) in the last five years are listed as follows:

Year	Vessels sold as scrap
2000–01	HMS Birmingham, HMS Beaver, RFA Olwen, RFA Olna
2001–02	HMS Herald
	Vessels sold (or otherwise transferred) on a Government-to-Government basis or commercially
1998–99	HMS Soberton, HMS Egeria, HMY Britannia
1999–2000	HMS Kellington
2000–01	HMS Wilton, HMS Bicester, HMS Orkney
2001–02	HMS Bulldog, HMS Berkeley, HMS Orwell
2002–03	HMS Beagle, HMS London, HMS Coventry, HMS Shetland, HMS Alderney, HMS Anglesey, HMS Lindisfarne, HMS Guernsey

The net revenue to the MOD received from these sales is approximately £26.5 million.

As well as these larger ships, numerous minor vessels have been sold commercially by the DSA or via the DSA's marketing agreements, such as tugs and marine support craft.

Additionally, Canada has acquired the four ex-RN Upholder class submarines. The acquisition takes the form of an eight-year lease with an option for outright purchase. The first of the submarines was handed over to Canada on 6 October 2000 with the second submarine being handed over on 4 October 2001. The third submarine is to be handed over to Canada on 21 February 2003, with the fourth boat following later in 2003. Canada has exercised its option to purchase outright the first of the submarines, ex-HMS Unseen. The value of the lease to buy arrangement with Canada (undertaken by the MOD's Upholder Programme), which includes the submarines, training and initial spares, is some 610 million Canadian dollars.

No Royal Naval vessels were put in reserve in any of the last five years.

Sea Harriers

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent Naval FA2 Sea Harriers are capable of operating in an air defence role in the climatic conditions normally found in the Gulf. [98246]

Mr. Ingram: FA2 Sea Harriers of Joint Force Harrier are able to operate in the climatic conditions usually found in the Gulf. However, at hotter times of the year (between April and September) and dependent on the time of day of the operation, there are restrictions relating to the weight of ordnance the aircraft can bring back on vertical landing.

Strategic Tanker Aircraft

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to award a contract for the Future Strategic Tanker Aircraft programme; and what delays there have been to the originally forecast in-service date. [97187]

Mr. Ingram: Final bids for this prospective PFI project are expected from two consortia on 30 April 2003. We will be doing all that we can to down select a preferred bidder by the end of this year and aim to sign a contract by the end of 2004, although the precise timing will depend on a range of factors including a period of bankers' due diligence. We have delayed the planned introduction of the PFI service by one year from 2007 to 2008, to allow time for the PFI negotiations to be completed.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the MOD is expected to award a contract for the RAF's Future Strategic Tanker Aircraft; how many aircraft will be commissioned; how they will be deployed; what the projected costs are; when the aircraft will come into service; what the length of the contract is; and if he will make a statement. [97493]

Mr. Ingram: Final bids for this prospective 27-year PFI contract are expected from two consortia on 30 April 2003. We will be doing all that we can to down select a preferred bidder by the end of this year and aim to sign a contract by the end of 2004, although the precise timing will depend on a range of factors including a period of bankers due diligence. The number of aircraft needed to meet our service-based requirement varies between the commercial solutions. However, a total fleet size of up to 20 aircraft is anticipated. Operational deployments will be undertaken under the Command and Control of the Royal Air Force. The project has an estimated through life value of around £13 billion and is scheduled to enter service in 2008.

Submarine Refits

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the S and T class submarines which (a) have completed, (b) are undergoing and (c) will in future undergo major upgrades together with the (i) completion and (ii) due completion dates in each case. [98241]

Mr. Ingram: Upgrades to S and T class submarines are generally undertaken during docking periods of maintenance lasting six months or during major refit and refuel periods lasting three years. These are known as Upkeep Periods. All S and T Class submarines will undergo a number of Upkeep Periods throughout their lives, and those whose last Upkeep Period included an upgrade, and which are not currently undergoing an Upkeep Period are:

Submarine	Completion date[1]
HMS Splendid	Spring 1998
HMS Superb	Summer 1998
HMS Tireless	Summer 1999
HMS Triumph	Winter 1999
HMS Trafalgar	Summer 2000
HMS Turbulent	Spring 2002
HMS Sovereign	Autumn 2002
HMS Torbay	Winter 2002

[1] Dates shown are when the submarine rejoined the fleet.

Submarines currently undergoing an Upkeep Period and upgrade are HMS Sceptre and HMS Spartan, both of which are due to rejoin the fleet by summer 2003 and HMS Trenchant, which is due to rejoin the fleet by autumn 2003.

The next planned refit and upgrade is that of HMS Talent which is expected to commence in spring 2003 and take approximately three years to complete including post refit trials and training. Details of Upkeep Periods beyond 2003 are classified, and I am withholding this information in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which relates to defence, security and international relations.

Swiftsure Class Submarines

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Swiftsure class submarines are non-operational; and for what reasons. [98248]

Mr. Ingram: Three Swiftsure Class submarines are currently non-operational. HMS Sceptre and HMS Spartan are both in the final stages of refit. They are shortly planned to undergo sea trials before formally joining the fleet later this summer. HMS Superb is currently undergoing a period of inspection before starting a planned maintenance period. She is expected to rejoin the fleet in the first half of 2004.

Technology Readiness Assessments

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the Technology Readiness Assessment of each of the candidate unmanned air vehicles for Watchkeeper; with which allied armed forces each of the candidate UAVs for Watchkeeper will be interoperable; which weapons are cleared for use from each of the candidate UAVs for Watchkeeper; how many of these have been used in combat; and if he will list the countries of origin of the candidate UAVs for Watchkeeper. [97192]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence's written statement to the House on 7 February 2003, Official Report, columns 21–22WS.

The Technology Readiness Assessment and the ability of the competitors to achieve a mature integration of the technology will feature as discriminators in choosing the final solutions. I am therefore withholding this information in accordance with Exemption 13 on the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which relates to third party's commercial confidences.

There are many levels of potential UAV interoperability that require different degrees of compatibility of air vehicle, ground segment equipment and data links. To optimise UAV interoperability, the United Kingdom is contributing to the development, in association with our NATO allies, of standard UAV interfaces.

The United Kingdom has not cleared any weapons for use with the candidate UAVs for Watchkeeper. Current requirements for Watchkeeper do not call for the solutions to be able to carry weapons. The Ministry of Defence is not aware of any weapons being cleared, by any other nation, for use with those UAVs now being considered by the Watchkeeper programme. Neither are we aware of them having been used in combat.

Component parts of the candidate UAVs for Watchkeeper, including the ground segment, the on-board sensors and the air vehicles, have their design origins in a number of countries. The current candidate air vehicles are derived from designs with origins either in the US or Israel.

Trimaran Hulls

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent assessment his Department has made of the suitability of trimaran hulls for future types of warship. [98237]

Mr. Ingram: A number of studies have been undertaken in recent years to examine the suitability of the trimaran hull form to meet future naval capability requirements. These studies have indicated significant potential advantages over more conventional hull forms for many naval roles. This led to the design and build of the 97 metre demonstrator RV Triton, which has recently completed an extensive and very successful trials programme. The data gathered will be shared with industry in support of possible trimaran solutions for future defence requirements.

Watchkeeper Competition

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement on the winner of the Watchkeeper competition; and for what reasons there has been a delay in the down select decision. [97191]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence's written statement on 7 February 2003, Official Report, columns 21–22WS. We expect to select a single successful contractor for the demonstration and manufacture phase by mid-2004. Watchkeeper is a complex programme, involving the integration of aerial vehicles with a ground control segment and wider connectivity to future communication systems such as Bowman. Therefore it was important to ensure that those companies selected for the remainder of the assessment phase can deliver a solution that will meet our operational requirements, at price we can afford and within the required timescales. After initial assessment of the bids, we sought clarification on a range of issues from each of the four bidders in December 2002. The decision and subsequent announcement was then made as quickly as possible following receipt of each bidder's response to these additional points of clarification.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers, who have been refused asylum status, have been removed from the country in (a) the last year for which figures are available and (b) the previous five years. [97638]

Beverley Hughes: Data on those people who have been removed after seeking asylum at some stage are given in the table.

Removal of asylum seekers[1]

	Principal applicants	Dependants[2]
1997	7,165	N/a
1998	6,990	N/a
1999	7,665	N/a
2000	8,980	N/a
2001	9,285	[2]1,495
January to September 2002[3]	7,780	1,825

[1] Includes persons departing "voluntarily" after enforcement action has been initiated against them and persons leaving under the assisted voluntary return programmes run by the IOM.

[2] Data for dependants removed only shows those removed from April 2001 onwards. Data on dependants was not collected prior to this date.

[3] Provisional data subject to change.

Note:

Figures are rounded the nearest five.

Information on the number asylum seekers removed in the period October to December 2002 is due to be published on 28 February 2003 on the Home Office website: www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/whatsnew1.html.

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans his Department has to house asylum seekers in Pyrford Court, Pyrford Common Road, Woking, Surrey. [97679]

Beverley Hughes: Pyrford Court, Pyrford Common Road, Woking Surrey has not to date been considered by the National Asylum Support Service (NASS) for emergency accommodation, dispersal accommodation or as an induction centre.

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people seeking asylum are registered as living at the Hinton Hotel, Fareham; and if the hotel provides accommodation to asylum seekers by arrangement with the National Asylum Support Service. [97680]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The voluntary sector use the Hinton Hotel as emergency accommodation to house asylum seekers. However, Fareham is not a cluster area for the dispersal of asylum seekers.

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government plans to renegotiate the UK's treaty obligations with regard to asylum seekers. [98769]

Beverley Hughes: Our obligations to asylum seekers are governed by the 1951 Refugee Convention and its 1967 Protocol and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). We have no plans to withdraw from either convention unilaterally or to renegotiate our obligations.

However, we will not be afraid to review relevant international obligations if current measures to tackle asylum are not effective.

Mental Illness (Prisoners)

Tom Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reduce the number of people with mental illness in prison. [98767]

Hilary Benn: We are tackling excessive delays in arranging transfer to hospital for the most seriously ill. We are also working to improve the mental health services available to the majority of prisoners who are not so ill that they require hospital care.

Freight Search Technology

14. Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress made in the introduction of UK-provided freight search technology in ports in (a) Northern France and (b) Belgium. [98770]

Beverley Hughes: We have already deployed detection equipment at both Calais and Coquelles. There is now the capability to screen 100 per cent. of freight vehicles embarking from Calais. We will shortly be placing equipment at those key continental ports in France and Belgium, such as Dunkirk, Cherbourg, Ostend and Zeebrugge, vulnerable to the displacement of clandestine entry following the tightening of security at Calais.

Burglary (Sentencing)

15. Angela Watkinson : To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the deterrent effect of custodial sentences for household burglary. [98772]

Hilary Benn: Domestic burglary is a serious offence, as has recently been made clear by the Government and the courts. As a rule, it should attract a custodial sentence unless it is a first time offence and there are clear mitigating circumstances. Sentences act as a deterrent in a number of ways, including restricting opportunities to re-offend and by tackling the causes of an individual's offending behaviour.

Police Officers (Paperwork)

16. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reduce the paperwork of police officers. [98773]

Mr. Denham: We have set up a steering group, co-chaired by the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) and the Home Office, to take forward the recommendations of Sir David O'Dowd's Bureaucracy Taskforce, whose report was published last September. Amongst the achievements so far, the necessary provisions to introduce street bail are in the criminal justice bill; the Metropolitan Police Service has made 306 forms obsolete and we hope that the Custody and Case Preparation applications will be rolled out to all forces by April 2006.

Policing (North Yorkshire)

17. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on policing in North Yorkshire. [98774]

Mr. Denham: North Yorkshire Police had 1,417 officers on 31 March 2002, a record number. The force will receive over £70 million in general grant for 2003–04 and this will be supplemented by funding for a range of specific initiatives, including over £2 million from the Rural Policing Fund.

Police Forensic Services

18. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the future of police forensic services. [98775]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Forensic science is an increasingly valuable tool in the fight against crime and its successful exploitation is key to the delivery of police reform. The use of DNA, in particular, has revolutionised crime investigation and also provides an invaluable source of intelligence.

As announced by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on 23 July 2002 the principal provider of forensic science services to the police, the Forensic Science Service, is currently the subject to an independent review which is looking at the delivery, performance and responsiveness of the Service and the ways in which we can maximise its contribution to the work of the police and through them to the wider criminal justice system.

Street Crime

19. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on recent measures to combat street crime. [98777]

Mr. Denham: The Street Crime Initiative was launched in April 2002 in the 10 police force areas with the highest rates of recorded robbery during 2001–02. Its key aims are to increase the detection rate for street crime cases, increase the proportion of offenders charged and brought to justice, and speed up the process between arrest and sentence.

This practical and partnership driven approach from the Government, police and other agencies had, by the end of September 2002, reduced the overall number of street crime offences by 16 per cent since its inception. At the end of last September: robbery, the more violent street crime offence, was down 25 per cent compared to the month immediately preceding the start of the initiative.

Barry Probation Office

21. Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the proposed closure of Barry probation office; and if he will make a statement. [98778]

Hilary Benn: To date I have had no representations specific to the Barry Probation Office, though there have been local stakeholder discussions and I have received representations more generally on the property strategy of the South Wales Probation Board.

The decision to close the main probation office in Barry, and relocate staff to Cardiff, was made by the local employer, the South Wales Probation Board. This decision was made in the wider context of improving effectiveness in dealing with offenders. The Board's strategy is to release resources to redirect into staff, particularly new staff to deliver successful Drug Treatment and Testing Orders (DTTOs) and to introduce the more effective "enhanced community punishment".

Better targeting of public funds is an important aspect of improving public protection and reducing re-offending. The decision to double the planned number of DTTOs over the next two years underpins the success of their approach.

Council Tax Precept (Police Authorities)

22. Mr. Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average increase in council tax precept for police authorities in England and Wales for 2003–04 is, expressed as a percentage of 2002–03 levels. [98779]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: This information is not yet available. Police Authorities have until 1 March to set their budgets and precept levels for 2003/04 and until 8 March to report this to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

I shall write to the hon. Member when the information is available.

Teenage Offenders

23. Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of offenders convicted in 2002 between the ages of 16 and 18 left school with no qualifications. [98780]

Hilary Benn: The information is not available in this precise form, but the Youth Justice Board's last general education audit, published in November 2001, showed that of juveniles who went into custody at least 71 per cent. had left school without any significant literacy or numeracy qualifications.

2 Marsham Street

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a building research establishment environmental assessment method document has been prepared for the redevelopment of 2 Marsham Street. [96413]

Beverley Hughes: The Building Research Establishment Environmental Assessment Method (BREEAM) is being applied to the redevelopment of 2 Marsham Street. The contract requires progress to be regularly reported. The most recent report on progress of the project using BREEAM (98) criteria estimating project performance indicates that an excellent rating is likely to be achieved. The BREEAM certificate will be issued after building completion when the achieved rating will be confirmed.

Ashfield Young Offenders Institution

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the recent report on Ashfield Young Offenders' Institution; [97036]

(2) what sanctions he has imposed on Recruit as a result of the Ashfield Report; and what plans he has to encourage them to reform their recruitment policies; [97039]

(3) what discussions he has had with Recruit regarding (a) their record at Ashfield and (b) other prison contracts they are responsible for. [97037]

Hilary Benn: The operating contractor of Ashfield young offender institution is Premier Prison Services which also operates Doncaster prison and young offender institution, Dovegate and Lowdham Grange prisons. I have not had discussions with Premier about any of these prisons, but I visited Ashfield on 29 August 2002 because of the concern that had been expressed about its performance. I am also regularly informed by the Prison Service about significant developments there and elsewhere in the Service.

No sanctions have been imposed on Premier directly as a result of the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons. However the Prison Service has made deductions from the fee payable to Premier totalling £350,305 during the period November 2001 to October 2002 for failures to deliver acceptable levels of performance.

Premier has recently introduced a new employment package for existing staff and new recruits in response to Prison Service concerns. The initial signs are encouraging in that the rate of staff resignations is falling.

The Director General of the Prison Service made the following statement on 3 February in response to the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons on Ashfield young offender institution also published on 3 February:

> Ashfield has been struggling for some considerable time to provide an environment for young people which is safe and constructive. Premier's failures were so significant that in May 2002, some time before the Inspectorate's visit, I considered closing it and would have done so were it not for the population pressures we were facing. Instead, I took the unprecedented step of imposing a public sector governor and he made significant improvements. As Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons (HMCIP) report acknowledges, a new, more constructive and safer regime, some weeks in the design stage, was successfully launched shortly after the HMCIP visit.
> But these early improvements were not built upon as I had hoped. Since then I have personally intervened to help Premier recruit, in Vicky O'Dea, one of the most talented, committed and inspirational governors in the Prison Service. I have immense confidence in her and at last I am beginning to see signs of fundamental change for the better.
> Premier runs good prisons at Doncaster and Lowdham Grange and is fast improving Dovegate prison. However, the company is under no illusion that if the recent improvements at Ashfield are not built upon I will have to consider terminating the contract by inviting Premier's bankers to appoint another private sector company to run the prison. Failing that, I will have to consider bringing Ashfield into the public sector. For the time being, we will only be using half the places at Ashfield and paying Premier only part of its monthly fee.
> The introduction of the private sector into the running of prisons has brought immense benefits. My best prison is probably a private sector prison. But Ashfield, by some measure, is the worst. Sustained improvement is now vital if I am to be persuaded to leave the management of Ashfield in Premier's hands.

Capital Projects

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place the evaluations for the Capital Modernisation Fund projects relating to (a) crime reduction, (b) national police radio programme (PSRCP), (c) IT integration in criminal justice system, (d) DNA databases, (e) active communities prison pressures, (f) national strategy on police information systems, (g) government technical assistance centre, (h) video recording police interviews, (i) DNA database population, (j) video-links: modernising the court process, (k) post-release support hostel for prisoners after drug treatment, (l) electronic "chipping" of goods, (m) Project Lion, (n) firearms forensic database, (o) secure units for juvenile offenders, (p) security for small business, (q) detecting concealed people, (r) prison capacity and juvenile accommodation and (s) counter-terrorism in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [97024]

Mr. Denham: Of the projects listed in the question, only one has so far been completed. An evaluation report on the court video-links project is due in June. Evaluation reports for the eight demonstration projects under "electronic chipping of goods" will be available at the end of November.

Communications Data

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the comments of the Surveillance Commissioner in his annual report (HC 68), on what obligations are on public authorities when seeking access to communications data; and if he will make a statement. [97067]

Mr. Blunkett: I am not aware of any such comments in the Surveillance Commissioner's annual report (HC 68). If my hon. Friend has any further information I would be happy to consider it.

Computer Fraud

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of computer (a) hacking, (b) fraud and (c) theft his Department recorded in 2001–02; and on how many occasions computer systems have been illegally accessed by computer hackers (i) within and (ii) outside his Department. [97560]

Mr. Denham: Official records compiled under the government scheme for reporting Information Technology (IT) security incidents, the Unified Incident Reporting and Alert Scheme (UNIRAS), show the following figures.

The number of incidents of computer hacking was 0 in 2001 and 0 in 2002.

The number of incidents of computer fraud was 0 in 2001 and 0 in 2002.

The number of incidents of computer theft recorded was 14 in 2001 and 14 in 2002.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he intends to reply to the letter to him dated 18 November from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. A. Z. Majid; [97087]

(2) when he intends to reply to the letter to him dated 18 November 2002, from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. A. Z. Majid. [98965]

Mr. Blunkett: I wrote to my right hon. Friend on 20 February 2003.

Crime (Humberside)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners underwent treatment for drugs dependence in (a) Haltemprice and Howden, (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire and (c) England and Wales in each of the past five years. [97719]

Hilary Benn: Data on how many prisoners underwent treatment for drug dependency are only available from 2001–02 onwards and are as follows.

		Type of intervention
	CARATs	Detoxification	Rehabilitation
Haltemprice and Howden
2001–02	345	349	32
2002–03[1]	358	94	58

2001–02	39,279	40,865	4,691
2002–03[1]	37,251	36,651	3,099

[1] Denotes 1 April–31 December 2002 data available only.

CARATs refers to counselling, assessment, referral, advice and throughcare services.

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been issued in the past 12 months in (a) Haltemprice and Howden, (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire and (c) the Humberside Police Authority area. [97726]

Mr. Denham: The number of notifications received by the Home Office of Anti Social Behaviour Orders (ASBO)s issued, from 1 October 2001 up to 30 September 2002 (latest available), within the Humberside Magistrates Court Committee area, (which includes the East Riding of Yorkshire local authority, in which the Haltemprice and Howden constituency is located), are shown, by local authority, in the table.

We are aware that the numbers of ASBOs made nationally have been consistently under reported in returns made by magistrates' courts and are considering how reporting can be improved.

The number of ASBOs as notified to the Home Office, by Magistrates' Courts Committee and local authority area for Humberside, 1 October 2001—30 September 2002

	Total issued
Humberside MCC/Police Force Area	4

Departmental Budget

Annette Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the principal components of the changes in the budget of the Home Office from 2002–03 to 2005–06; and if he will make a statement. [96901]

Mr. Blunkett: I refer the hon Member to chapter 10 of Her Majesty's Treasury publication "2002 Spending Review, New Public Spending Plans 2003—2006", Cm 5570, published in July 2002.

Departmental Consultations

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list consultations his Department has conducted since 1997; and when each consultation (a) opened and (b) closed. [97423]

Hilary Benn: The Home Department holds central records on issued consultations from 1997 for the Home Office, its non-departmental public bodies and agencies. Current consultation papers can be found on the website on http://www. homeoffice.gov.uk/consultations/consult_papers.htm. Archived consultation papers can be found on http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/atoz/consuarchive.htm

Determining all the details requested in the question for the archived records would require access to records at a disproportionate cost. However, the online archive does contain details of the consultation period for most of the consultation documents listed.

In order to give the fullest reply I have listed the details available for 2001/2002 Home Office consultation exercises.

Domestic Violence

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department has separate strategies for tackling domestic violence against (a) men and (b) women; and if he will make a statement. [96380]

Mr. Denham: The Government's policies are designed to ensure thatvictims of domestic violence receive help and support irrespective of gender, whilst recognising that this is a crime which predominantly affects women. Women are more likely to experience such violence over a lifetime, more likely to experience repeat victimisation, more likely to be injured and seek medical help, and more likely to experience frightening threats. Ministers have therefore emphasised that all forms of domestic violence are unacceptable and must be recognised and treated seriously, but have retained the policy focus on domestic violence against women, and children affected by domestic violence. This focus for the immediate future was agreed by the Ministerial group on Domestic Violence.

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statistics his Department has collated on the extent of domestic violence against (a) men and (b) women; and if he will make a statement. [96381]

Mr. Denham: Domestic violence is not separately identified in recorded crime statistics collected by the Home Office.

The British Crime Survey (BCS) provides information on the number of incidents of domestic violence in England and Wales. It estimated that there were 122,000 incidents of domestic violence against men and 514,000 incidents against women in interviews in 2001/2.

The BCS figures are derived from a sample and so are subject to sampling error. Moreover, the BCS is carried out by face-to-face interviews and some respondents may be unwilling to reveal experience of domestic violence to interviewers. The 1996 BCS included a self-completion component on domestic violence to encourage disclosure. Results were published in Home Office Research Study No. 191—copies are available in the Library. This more confidential approach to measurement revealed that the proportion of women that were victims of domestic assault in the last year was over three times higher than in the main BCS. It found that six per cent of women and five per cent of men had been threatened or assaulted by a current or former partner in the last year.

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent research his Department has commissioned on domestic violence suffered by (a) men and (b) women; and if he will make a statement. [96382]

Mr. Denham: Research commissioned by the Home Office is listed. The number of men included in samples is usually too small for any meaningful analysis to be conducted.

Findings from the British Crime Survey Inter-Personal Violence Module. A specialist self-completion module was included on the national British Crime Survey in 2001 to measure the prevalence and extent of domestic violence, rape and sexual assault and stalking. The questions were addressed to both men and women. The findings from this survey will be reported in the summer of 2003.

Crime Reduction Programme: Reducing Violence against Women Initiative (VAWI) is part of the national evidence-led Crime Reduction Programme which funds and independently evaluates multi-agency interventions to find out which approaches and policies are effective in reducing crime. Some 34 victim focused projects were funded as part of the Violence Against Women Initiative (25 specifically addressing domestic Violence) in July 2000, and these projects are still being evaluated to assess their impact and cost. Findings are due to be reported later this year.

Angela Watkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the timetable is for the Green Paper on domestic violence. [97614]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The consultation paper, setting out proposals to prevent domestic violence, deal with perpetrators and provide increased support to victims, will be published by Summer 2003. It will aim to generate a comprehensive response from the public, voluntary sector and others, to ensure the widest possible agreement on what needs to be done to prevent and deal with domestic violence.

Domestic Violence (Immigrants)

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the outcome of discussions between his Department, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Cabinet Office to address the issue of support for victims of domestic violence who are subject to immigration control. [97320]

Mr. Denham: We have widened the types of evidence acceptable to enable a victim of domestic violence to benefit from the concession under which a person in this position can apply for indefinite leave to remain. If evidence in the form of a court order or police caution is not available, we will accept more than one form of evidence from the following list:

a medical report from a hospital doctor confirming that the applicant has injuries consistent with being the victim of domestic violence;

a letter from a family practitioner who has examined the applicant and is satisfied that the applicant has injuries consistent with being the victim of domestic violence;

an undertaking given to a court that the perpetrator of the violence will not approach the applicant who is the victim of the violence;

a police report confirming attendance at the home of the applicant as a result of a domestic violence incident;

a letter from a social services department confirming its involvement in connection with domestic violence; and a letter of support or report from a women's refuge.

The domestic violence concession was incorporated into the Immigration Rules in November 2002. This will ensure that domestic violence cases attract a right of appeal and that the facts of the case leading to the decision can be considered by the Appellate Authorities.

The Government is continuing to consider the issue of access to public funds.

E-mail Addresses

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by what e-mail address members of the public may contact (a) him and (b) each of the Ministers in his Department; and for each e-mail address if he will state (i) the date it became active and (ii) the number of e-mails received in each month since activation [97436]

Mr. Blunkett: The address used for all contact by e-mail to the Home Office is public.enquiries@homeoffice.gsi.gov.uk, and has been in use since 1999. No separate addresses for individual ministers are maintained. Details of the number of emails received each month are not available, but rough estimates have been kept on an annual basis since 1999 as follows:

1999	17,500
2000	37,000
2001	51,600
2002	86,000

These figures do not however include the large volumes of campaign emails received regularly by the Home Office. Forensic

A new Correspondence Tracking System is being introduced currently which will more accurately track and monitor public and ministerial correspondence. From June 2003 the system will also be able to track and monitor public emails.

Forensic Computing Units

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what budget was allocated for forensic computing units for each of the last three years; and what the proposed budgets are for each of the next three years; [97542]

(2) how many whole-time equivalent staff were working in the field of forensic computing in each constabulary, in each of the last three years. [97541]

Mr. Denham: The information sought by the hon. Member is not held centrally.

It is the responsibility of chief officers and police authorities to decide on the number of staff and proportion of their funding which they allocate to the operation of forensic computing units.

In 2001/02 the Home Office provided £25 million over three years, over and above general police funding, for the purpose of fighting hi-tech crime; £10 million of which is being used to enhance the powers of local police forces to investigate criminal activity online and to examine computer data forensically. In terms of staffing this sum to date has resulted in the training of a further 54 network investigators and seven forensic investigators across forces.

Forensic Pathology

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons in each year since its introduction have sat the examination for a Diploma of Forensic Pathology; how many have passed; if he will place in the Library a copy of the syllabus and learning structure for teaching the Diploma; what qualifications are required to teach this Diploma; and how many persons are qualified. [97782]

Mr. Denham: The Diploma in Forensic Pathology run by the Royal College of Pathologists commenced in 1995, for candidates who are in full-time forensic practice, and hold Membership of the Royal College of Pathologists.

The structure of the examination consists of two parts. The regulations and syllabus relating to the Diploma in Forensic Pathology, detail the examination structure and requirements for admission; copies of which will be placed in the Library.

There have been 10 persons awarded the diploma since its inception but a breakdown by year is not available.

Examiners are senior forensic pathologists appointed by the Royal College of Pathologists.

Immigration Offences

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women were detained in prisons in England and Wales for immigration offences on 1 February; and if he will make a statement. [98094]

Beverley Hughes: Data on the number of people held in prisons for offences under the Immigration Act are not available.

The latest available data show that at 28 September 2002 there were 220 people held solely under Immigration Act powers in Prison Service establishments in the United Kingdom, information on the reasons for detention would only be available by examination of individual casefiles at disproportionate cost.

Data for the period October to December 2002 are due to be published on 28 February 2002 on the Home Office website: www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/whatsnew1 .html

Kent Policing Model

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 5 February, Official Report, column 329W, on Kent Policing Model, what assessment he has made of the function of non-intelligence focused police patrol within the Kent Policing Model. [97598]

Mr. Denham: The deployment of patrol officers within Kent is an operational matter for the chief constable. A framework of inspections and performance measurement is in place for Kent, as it is for all other police forces.

Medical Jurisprudence

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons in each year since its introduction have sat the examination for a Diploma of Medical Jurisprudence; how many have passed; if he will place in the Library a copy of the syllabus and learning structure for teaching this diploma; what qualifications are required to teach this diploma; and how many persons are qualified. [97783]

Mr. Denham: The first Diploma in Medical Jurisprudence was awarded in 1962 by the Society of Apothecaries of London. The examination; which consists of two parts, was designed for registered medical and dental practitioners who have had experience of medico-legal practice.

The regulations and syllabus relating to the Diploma in Medical Jurisprudence, detail the examination structure and requirements for admission; copies of which will be placed in the Library.

The total number of diplomas awarded to date are 238. A breakdown of diplomas awarded, is available for the last 10 years and is detailed in the table:

	Candidates
Year	In the UK	Abroad	Total
1992	6	8	14
1993	4	7	11
1994	5	3	8
1995	1	3	4
1996	3	9	12
1997	0	2	2
1998	2	1	3
1999	2	3	5
2000	3	4	7
2001	2	2	4
2002	1	1	2

The Diploma is a self-learning course and there are no specific requirements to be an examiner. They are nominated by the British Association for Forensic Medicine (BAFM).

MI5 (Right of Access)

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many subject access requests have been made to MI5 since the right of access was afforded; and how many have been granted. [97713]

Mr. Blunkett [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The Security Service has received 127 Subject Access requests under the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998. The Security Service has disclosed personal data in 25 cases.

Nadhmia Auchi

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has given to the application for the extradition to France of Nadhmia Auchi. [98315]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: For good and obvious reasons, it is our policy and practice not to comment, ahead of any arrest, on whether an extradition request for a particular individual has been received or is under consideration.

Neighbourhood Wardens

Annette Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Neighbourhood Wardens Initiative schemes have been established in England and Wales since 2000; where such schemes have been in operation; and how many people are employed as neighbourhood wardens. [98186]

Mrs. Roche: I have been asked to reply.

Since 2000, 207 Neighbourhood Warden schemes have become active. We are currently bringing forward a further 38 schemes. Employment figures for these schemes stand at a total of 1,464 wardens.

There are 245 wardens schemes distributed across the following regions:

East of England	17
East Midlands	12
North-West	49
London	43
West Midlands	29
Yorkshire and Humber	24
South West	16
South East	29
North East	21
Wales	5

Annette Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research has been undertaken to assess whether Neighbourhood Warden Initiative schemes (a) have reduced crime, (b) have provided public reassurance and (c) are an effective deterrent to anti-social behaviour; and if he will make a statement. [98187]

Mrs. Roche: I have been asked to reply.

The research of the Neighbourhood Warden schemes funded by my department began in 2001 and involves a series of national and local quantitative surveys as well as in-depth qualitative investigations into case study areas. The evaluation of Neighbourhood Wardens is ongoing. Evaluation of the Street Warden programme, is in its early stages and interim reports are not yet available.

Copies of the 'Neighbourhood Wardens Scheme Evaluation Case Studies—Preliminary Report' and the 'Implications Paper' have been placed in the library of the House. The indications from these and other interim reports are that warden schemes are contributing to a reduction in levels of crime, provide public reassurance and are effective in deterring anti-social behaviour.

Non-Custodial Sentences

Annette Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent research his Department has undertaken into public opinion on community based alternatives to prison. [98192]

Hilary Benn: A public perception survey of the Probation Service was commissioned by the National Probation Directorate from Mori Social Research Institute. This primarily related to those community sentences which are the responsibility of the Probation Service. It reported on public awareness and the perceived effectiveness of the service in its various roles.

The results and report, "Perceptions of the National Probation Service", were circulated within the National Probation Service in September 2002. It is available to download from the probation pages of the Home Office website, and I will arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library.

Online Sales/Purchases

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) products, (b) goods and (c) services were (i) bought and (ii) sold online by his Department in each of the last five years. [97437]

Beverley Hughes: The Home Department has not sold any goods or services on line in the past five years. The department has however purchased low value items on line during 2002 which are as follows:

Goods	Services
Stationery and office consumables	Training courses
IT consumables	Temporary staff
Publications

Police Numbers (Nottinghamshire)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers there were in the Nottinghamshire Constabulary in each year since 1997; and how many there will be in each year for which projections are available. [98325]

Mr. Denham: Information on police strength for Nottinghamshire Police is set out in the table.

Year (as at 31 March)	Police Officer Numbers	Civilian Support Staff Numbers
1997	2,323	1,003
1998	2,322	987
1999	2,225	1,039
2000	2,204	1,024
2001	2,212	1,039
2002	2,330	1,087

Under the Crime Fighting Fund (CFF) recruitment initiative Nottinghamshire Police have been allocated an additional 157 recruits over and above the force's previous recruitment plans for the three years to March 2003. Funding for these officers will continue in 2003–04. The CFF will continue in 2003/04 and we will fund 75 per cent of the cost of new recruits through CFF rather than 100 per cent as in the past three years. Nottinghamshire Police Authority has been allocated £96,000 which on the basis of 75 per cent funding should be sufficient for the force to recruit a further 17 police officers through this fund.

Apart from ring-fenced provision for a particular purpose, such as the Crime Fighting Fund, decisions about the police budget and the allocation of resources, including numbers of officers, are matters for the Nottinghamshire Police Authority and the Chief Constable (Stephen Green QPM). It is therefore not possible to provide estimates of Nottinghamshire's police strength in future years.

Police Officers (Sickness)

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average number of working days lost through sickness among police officers in England was in 2002, broken down by (a) constabulary, (b) rank and (c) gender. [96744]

Mr. Denham: The average number of days lost through sickness absence for police officers in England and Wales for the year 2001–02, (the latest figures that are available) is 11.5. The national average for male and female officers is 11 days and 15 days respectively. Broken down by constabulary, the average number of days lost through sickness absence per officer are:

Force	Average days per officer	Per Male Officer	Per Female Officer

(Figures published in the Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) Annual Report published on 19 December 2002)

One of the aims of the Strategy for a Healthy Police Service, published in October 2002, is to identify and address the disparity in levels of sickness absence between different groups within the police service.

Sickness absence data are not collected by rank.

Police Recruits (Compulsory Freemasonry Declaration)

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made on inserting compulsory disclosure of membership of the Freemasons in the contracts of new police recruits. [97185]

Mr. Denham: A scheme of voluntary registration was introduced in 1999. We continue to review its effectiveness—there are no current proposals for compulsory disclosure.

Prison Sniffer Dogs

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the adequacy of provision in prisons of sniffer dogs for the purpose of preventing drug use. [98521]

Hilary Benn: The availability of specialist drug dogs within the Prison Service has increased significantly following investment from the Comprehensive Spending Review 1997 and Spending Review 2000. All prisons now have access to both active and passive drug dogs. There are currently 261 active drug dogs and 212 passive drug dogs deployed across the Prison Service.

Prisoners (Escort Services)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken to reduce (a) delays and (b) late arrivals of prisoners from court; what steps are being taken to improve the information received by prisons from escort contractors; and what assessment has been made of potential benefits of placing the responsibility for escort services on the Prison Service. [93329]

Hilary Benn: The delivery of prisoners to court on time has been affected by the recent increase in the prison population. The Prison Service is trying in a number of ways to improve performance and service delivery.

A recent pilot exercise at Pentonville prison streamlined the escort contractor's work so as to prioritise the delivery of prisoners to court, according to the needs and timings of court business; this resulted in an 11 per cent. improvement in performance in London. The pilot may be extended across the wider Prison Service estate, subject to further findings.

The number of courts linked to the video link system is also increasing, with 123 magistrates' courts and one crown court currently using the service. A further 30 crown courts are to receive video link equipment by the end of August 2003, with funding currently being sought for a further 50 crown courts to be linked to the system. This use of the video links system between courts and prisons, which results in a decrease in the number of prisoners having to attend court in person, should help to release contractors' resources and so reduce delays in the movement of prisoners.

The Prison Service is also reviewing the internal working practices of some of those prisons that serve the courts to see if a closer correlation between those arrangements and court business hours could be achieved.

The contracting out of prisoner escort arrangements has offered better value for money, a reduction in the number of escapes and has freed up prison officers to concentrate on their core duties. A recent Prison Service review confirmed that the service should continue to be contracted out. It also concluded that existing contracts, which are planned to become operational in 2004, should be replaced with more flexible ones to allow the Prison Service to respond more quickly to future business needs. The Prison Service is developing this approach and, together with the relevant agencies in the criminal justice system, is considering how all involved can work together to improve the service.

Prisoners (Foreign Nationals)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women detained in prisons in England and Wales on 1 February were foreign nationals who had completed their prison sentence and were awaiting deportation from the United Kingdom. [97774]

Beverley Hughes: This information is not held centrally and would be available only at disproportionate cost.

Prisons Minister

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which prisons the Prisons Minister has visited since his appointment. [97775]

Hilary Benn: The establishments I have visited since my appointment as Parliamentary Under Secretary for Community and Custodial Provision on 29 May 2002 are given in the table. Further visits will take place in due course.

Retail Industry Crime

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his Answer of 14 January, Official Report, column 585W, on retail industry crime, how many small retail businesses in (a) Lancashire and (b) the North West of England have (i) applied for and

(ii) received a grant from the Government to improve security on their property; and when the new survey of crime affecting retail and manufacturing industry will be published. [97569]

Mr. Denham: Funding under the Small Retailers in Deprived Areas Initiative is allocated directly to regional Crime Reduction Directors, whose responsibility it is to distribute the money to Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships (CDRPs) covering the 10 per cent most deprived wards in the region. Proposals invited from CDRPs have to meet the scheme's strict criteria, and are worked up in close conjunction with the regional Crime Reduction Director, who submits them to me for approval. All proposals submitted to me in the first two years of the initiative have been approved without exception.

In the first year of the initiative (2001–02), over 80 small businesses in Lancashire benefited from funding of £73,234. In 2002–03, over 111 retailers and small businesses in the county stand to benefit from funding of £251,453.

For the North West of England, over 420 small businesses benefited from the 2001–02 allocation of £470,670, and over 1140 retailers and small businesses stand to benefit from the 2002–03 allocation of £942,209.

We expect the results of the new survey of crime affecting retail and manufacturing business, which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced in April last year, to be published in the summer.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 14 January, Official Report, column 585W, on retail industry crime, if the report on the consultation on the means of creating and maintaining effective partnerships to reduce opportunities for crime against business will be (a) published online and (b) placed in the Library. [97779]

Mr. Denham: The consultation period on the business crime consultation document closes on 28 February 2003. We hope to publish a report on the outcome in the summer. The report will be published on the Home Office website and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 14 January, Official Report, column 585W, on retail industry crime, what the average size is of a grant made available from the Government to businesses for improving the security of small retail businesses. [97780]

Mr. Denham: In the first year (2001–02) of the Small Retailers in Deprived Areas Initiative, the average grant made available was £1,074 per small retailer. In the second year (2002–03), this has increased to £1,272 per individual business.

Sickness Absence

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the rate of staff (a) absenteeism and (b) sickness was in his Department and each of its agencies and non-departmental public bodies in each year from 1990–91 to 2002–03; what the target set is for his Department; and if he will make a statement. [93502]

Mr. Blunkett: Information on absenteeism is not collected centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Information on Sickness Absence can be found in the annual report "analysis of sickness Absence in the Civil Service" published by the Cabinet Office. The average number of lost working days owing to sickness is as follows:

1997	11.4
1998	10.4
1999	11.1
2000	11.2
2001	8.0*

* This figure is currently being re-assessed and any corrections to the published figure for 2001 will be included in the 2002 report.

Figures for 1991–1996 are not available and figures for 2002 will be announced in due course.

The Home Office have introduced new guidelines, policies and procedures with a view to meeting its target to reducing sickness absence, published in its Service Delivery Agreements for April 2001 to March 2004.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many days were lost due to sickness absence in the Department in 2002. [90533]

Mr. Blunkett: Information on Sickness Absence can be found in the annual report "Analysis of Sickness Absence in the Civil Service" published by the Cabinet Office. The most recent report for the calendar year 2001 was announced by Ministerial Statement on 19 December 2002 and copies placed in the Library. The figures for 2002 will be announced in due course.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many working days have been lost due to illness in his Department in (a) 2002 and (b) each of the preceding five years. [90974]

Mr. Blunkett: Information on Sickness Absence can be found in the annual report "Analysis of Sickness Absence in the Civil Service" published by the Cabinet Office. The average number of working days lost owing to sickness is as follows:

1997	11.4
1998	10.4
1999	11.1
2000	11.2
2001	8.0*

The figures for 2002 are not yet available and will be announced in due course.

* This figure is currently being reassessed and any correction to the published figure for 2001 will be included in the 2002 Report.

Special Advisers and Press Officers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) special advisers and (b) press officers have been employed by his Department in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and at what cost in each year. [92444]

Mr. Blunkett: With regards to Special Advisers I refer the hon. Member to the answer provided by my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Alexander) on 31 January 2003, Official Report, column 1056W. Press officer numbers are listed in the following table:

Year	Number of press officers	Cost £ thousand
1996–97	16	369,000
1997–98	13	332,000
1998–99	13	329,000
1999–2000	16	345,000

Staff numbers for the press office increased when a Newsdesk was established in 2000. This was one of the recommendations from the independent external consultants who carried out a review of the structure and operation of the press office in 1999. One of the benefits of has been that media calls to the press office are being answered within four rings 90 per cent of the time. Previously there were occasions wh[illegible]o 40 per cent of media calls were lost.

Information prior to 1996/97 was not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Terrorist Attacks

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on (a) the stock of equipment and (b) its whereabouts to deal with an NBC terrorist attack in (i) London and (ii) East Sussex; and what plans he has to increase this stock. [96253]

Mr. Blunkett: The Government are taking precautions to ensure that emergency services, local authorities and Government Departments and agencies are prepared to respond to a Chemical, Biological, Radiological or Nuclear (CBRN) incident and that the emergency services have the right equipment and stocks.

The National Health Service (NHS) has increased its preparedness and nationally has 360 mobile decontamination units sent to key points around the country for use by Ambulance Service and hospital Accident and Emergency Departments. 7,250 personal protection suits have been distributed to key health workers. 2,350 police officers have been trained and equipped to deal with CBRN incidents and this programme is continuing.

It has been agreed that fire fighters will work alongside ambulance services by decontaminating people at a CBRN incident and £56 million has been allocated by the Government to buy equipment to do this in 2003.

Medical countermeasures are also stockpiled in strategic locations.

I cannot give details of the location of this equipment and stocks, as this information would self-evidently be of use to terrorists.

Violent Crime

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his estimate is of the proportion of violent crimes in each of the last five years where (a) alcohol and (b) illegal drug use were involved. [98173]

Mr. Denham: Police-recorded crime statistics can not provide information on the proportion of violent crime where alcohol and/or illegal drug use are involved. The British Crime Survey (BCS) reports on the victim's perception of offenders in violent incidents. Violent crime measured by the BCS can be classified into four sub-groups: domestic, mugging, stranger and acquaintance violence. The following tables show the proportion of violent incidents in which victims felt that the offender/s was under the influence of drink or drugs, firstly for all violence reported to the survey and then separately for the breakdown by individual types of violence. It should be noted that sweeps of the BCS were not conducted in 1997 or 1999.

West Yorkshire Police

Jon Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the percentage change was in West Yorkshire Police Authority's (a) aggregate budgets, (b) expenditure on uniformed police, (c) expenditure on other police officers and (d) other expenditure between 1997 and 2002. [96624]

Mr. Denham: The information is set out in the table.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Capital Programmes (Funding)

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much funding was available for capital programmes in (a) rural and (b) urban areas in (i) 2001–02 and (ii) 2002–03. [98300]

Mr. Miliband: We do not hold information in the form requested.

The following table shows the total central Government support for capital investment in school buildings for each local education authority area in England, by type of authority.

Classroom Replacement (Somerset)

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what assistance he plans to make available to Somerset county council to help with replacement of classrooms in 2003; [98282]

(2) what assistance is available in the county settlement for 2003 for classroom replacement. [98284]

Mr. Miliband: The Department currently allocates most capital funding for schools to local education authorities (LEAs) by needs-related formulae, and it is for authorities to assess and prioritise the capital needs of their school buildings through their asset management planning process, in consultation with local schools. Individual LEAs will therefore hold information on how much capital investment is being directed towards replacing classrooms in their area.

Central Government support for capital investment in school buildings in Somerset LEA totals £15 million (including Voluntary Aided schools) in 2002–03, rising to £19.2 million in 2003–04, with further allocations shortly to be announced. This forms part of the total capital investment for England of £3 billion in 2002–03, rising to over £3.8 billion in 2003–04.

Construction Industry Training Board

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to exclude plant hire organisations from the scope of the CITB levy. [97912]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: I have received a proposal from the Hire Association Europe Ltd (a trade association for the hire and rental sector) to exclude the hire and rental sector from the scope of the CITB. I am currently considering the proposal and will be consulting more widely before making a decision.

Education (Havering)

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on (a) class sizes and (b) teacher retention in the London borough of Havering. [94206]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: Over the last five years, average class sizes in maintained primary and secondary schools in Havering LEA have been very similar to the national average, as shown in the table. In September 2002, Havering achieved full compliance with infant class size legislation.

Retention of good quality teachers in Havering, as elsewhere, is a key priority and we are aware that some schools in some areas are still experiencing problems. However, the new National Agreement signed by the Department and its key partners will enable us to take forward our plans for remodelling the teaching profession. This in turn will address the key recruitment and retention issues of workload and bureaucracy. Taken together with our work on improving pupil behaviour and strengthening leadership within schools, we believe this will lead to a further increase in new teachers in London and elsewhere and encourage more existing teachers to remain in the profession.

E-mail Addresses

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills by what e-mail address members of the public may contact (a) him and (b) each of the Ministers in his Department; and for each e-mail address if he will state (i) the date it became active and (ii) the number of e-mails received in each month since activation. [97450]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The Secretary of State and Ministers at the Department for Education and Skills can be contacted by members of the public by email at dfes.ministers@dfes.gsi.gov.uk—this email address has been active since 24 April 1999. Examinations

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his answer of 3 February, Official Report, column 87W, on examinations, what reasons he has researched as to why the costs were the same in 2001 and 2002; and how the costs relate to the number of pupils that took the tests in each year. [97850]

Mr. Miliband: The cost given in my earlier reply for printing, distributing and marking the Year 7 progress tests in 2001 was incorrect. The correct figure is £1.7 million, 300,000 more than the 2002 cost of £1.4 million. The additional 300,000 in 2001 was due to higher marking costs because of the greater number of pupils entered in that year, and initial set-up costs in the first year of progress tests for the external marking agency.

In 2001, 79,458 pupils took the English Year 7 progress test and 94,351 the mathematics Year 7 progress test. In 2002, 61,827 took the English, and 76,221 the mathematics Year 7 progress tests.

Health and Safety

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether his Department and its agencies have met the commitment arising from Action Point 13 of the June 2000 strategy statement on Revitalising Health and Safety to summarise health and safety performance and plans in annual reports from the year 2000–01 onwards. [89502]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: There was insufficient time for my Department to include a contribution on Health and Safety to the Department's annual report for 2000–01. We did include a contribution on performance and planning progress in 2001–02 and are currently preparing a more detailed entry for the 2002–03 report.

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what information he has on the application to his Department and its agencies of the checklist, circulated by letter by Sir Richard Mottram, referred to under Action Point 12 of the Revitalising Health and Safety strategy statement; and if he will make a statement. [89504]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: My Department's existing health and safety policy and procedures already incorporate many of the recommendations summarised in the ministerial checklist. The updated policy now under preparation will review existing provisions; update systems and approaches as necessary; establish new baselines against rigorous targets for reductions in work-related accidents and ill-health; and ensure that the Department can fully demonstrate compliance with these recommendations in addition to continuing to meet all of our statutory requirements.

Higher Education

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to reduce the level of (a) regulatory requirements and (b) numbers of administrative staff in further education colleges; and if he will make a statement. [97923]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 13 February 2003]: We are reducing and will continue to reduce the burden of unnecessary red tape on further education colleges. We have already announced plans to reduce the number of separate budget lines for the Learning and Skills Council from 45 to five, and to consolidate targeted funds for pay and staff training into colleges' core funding, and to introduce three year funding for colleges, from this year.

The Government and the Learning and Skills Council are committed to implementing in full the recommendations of the Bureaucracy Busting Task Force, chaired by Sir George Sweeney, which reported in November 2002. In particular, we will establish powerful scrutiny arrangements to keep in check demands on colleges, remove the requirement for all colleges to have an annual external audit of their Individual Learner Records, and work across government agencies to avoid repeat requests to colleges for the same information.

We are determined to go further. In particular, we are working with the Inspectorates to introduce more co-ordinated inspection arrangements, for example for colleges providing both FE and HE, and lighter touch inspection arrangements for better performing colleges. We will also assess, in 2003, the regulation of FE institutions through a review of the Instrument and Articles of Government.

FE institutions are independent corporations responsible for their own staffing and employment policies. As administrative burdens reduce, college managers will be free to make their own decisions about how they allocate resources within their own institutions.

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimates were used in establishing the costs of raising student bonds to cover a delay in repayment times, in drawing up the proposals in the policy document, The Future of Higher Education; and if he will make a statement. [98133]

Margaret Hodge: Raising bonds to cover a delay in repayment times of student loans is not part of the policy set out in the White Paper. We decided not to pursue bonds as an option because the gains from a Government issue of bonds were not clear, and the cost of borrowing by higher education institutions (to fund the lending involved in a bonds option) would inevitably have been higher than borrowing by Government. Forecasts of Government net debt are published bi-annually in the pre-budget report and the financial statement and budget report.

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimates were made of the extra income tax an average graduate earning £400,000 more than the average non graduate would pay if they were (a) a standard rate tax payer and (b) a higher rate tax payer, in drawing up the proposals in the policy document, The Future of Higher Education; and if he will make a statement. [98134]

Margaret Hodge: We said in the White Paper, The Future of Higher Education, that those with higher education qualifications earn around 50 per cent. more than non-graduates. Since graduates earn more than non-graduates, they also pay more tax. The amount of extra income tax they would pay over a working life will depend on how personal allowances, tax rates and thresholds change over time.

In drawing up the proposals in the White Paper, no specific estimates were made of the extra income tax that graduates would pay over their working lives compared to non-graduates. The underpinning analysis was based on the principle of balancing the contribution from the taxpayer with the contribution from the student, bearing in mind the substantial benefit which is derived from having a degree.

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate of the funding gap in higher education his Department used in drawing up the proposals in the policy document, "The Future of Higher Education"; and if he will make a statement. [98145]

Margaret Hodge: Recent studies into the capital requirements of higher education institutions concluded that there was a need for some £8 billion of investment in infrastructure. The Secretary of State receives regular confidential advice from the Higher Education Funding Council for England and others on the financial needs of the sector against the background of the 36 per cent. real terms fall in spending per higher education student between 1989 and 1997. The announcements made in the White Paper "The future of higher education" and in the annual grant letter to the Higher Education Funding Council for England show the Government are increasing spending on higher education in England by an average of over 6 per cent. a year above inflation in the three years to 2005–06.

Higher Education (Family Incomes)

Mr. Keith Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many families with at least one child in higher education had an income of less than £10,000 in each of the last five years. [94440]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 30 January 2003]: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynn Jones) on 6 February 2003, Official Report, column 358W. Historic data are not available for students from families with parental residual[1] income below the threshold for means-tested tuition fee support. The current student support scheme introduced in 1998–99, provides students with full fee support if their income is below the threshold. Under the mandatory awards scheme in operation up to 1997–98, students received a full means-tested maintenance grant if their residual income was below the threshold. The threshold is reviewed and uprated annually.

The following table shows the numbers of students entitled to full support (as outlined above) under each scheme for the academic years 1996–97 to 2000–01 and the relevant residual income thresholds in each year.

[1] Residual income is gross income less the allowances detailed in my Department's guidance, "Financial Support for Higher Education Students".

[1] The table shows awards made by local education authorities in England and Wales to students normally domiciled in their area.

[2] Provisional.

[3] New students in 1998–99 received support for maintenance through income-assessed grants (comprising about a quarter of the support available) and non income-assessed student loans (about three quarters of the support available). From 1999–2000, students who entered higher education from 1998–99 onwards received support for maintenance entirely through loans, of which approximately three-quarters of the value was non income-assessed.

[4] Data in 1998–99 include an estimated 15,000 student support scheme students in England and Wales who, because they did not expect to receive a contribution to their support from public funds did not make an application to their local authority.

[5] Data for academic year 2000–01 are provisional.

[6] Student support scheme funding arrangements in higher education came into effect from the start of the 1998–99 academic year, thus accounting for the apparent steep rise in student numbers through the academic years.

[7] Most new students in 1998–99, 1999–2000 and 2000–01 were expected to contribute up to £1,000, £1,025 and £1,050 respectively towards the cost of their tuition depending on family income.

[8] Students who entered higher education up to 1997–98 and those who entered in 1998–99 to whom the mandatory scheme funding arrangements applied received support for maintenance through income-assessed grants.

[9] Totals may not add through due to roundings.

Maintenance Grant

Jeff Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the cost to his Department of introducing a maintenance grant of (a) £1,000 per annum, (b) £1,500 per annum and (c) £2,000 per annum for higher education students from households in the lowest (i) quartile and (ii) decile of annual income. [96393]

Margaret Hodge: The estimated costs of providing maintenance grants of (a) £1,000 per annum, (b) £1,500 per annum and (c) £2,000 per annum to students in the lowest (i) quartile and (ii) decile of annual income in 2001–02 are presented in the following table.

Estimated costs of maintenance grants in academic year 2001–02
£ million

	Residual income
Level of grant	Lowest quartile	Lowest decile
£1,000	200	80
£1,500	300	120
£2,000	390	160

Note:
Figures have been individually rounded

These estimates are based on projected student numbers for English and Welsh domiciled students in UK Higher Education Institutions in 2001–02. As numbers increase so would the cost of providing grants to a fixed percentage. The figures in the table assume that all students either the lowest 25 per cent. or 10 per cent. qualify for the full amount of the grant and that those above these levels get no grant. In practice, means tested grants are almost always tapered out more gently above the threshold for entitlement of the full grant. This increases the costs.

National Behaviour and Attendance Strategy

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on his national behaviour and attendance strategy. [97152]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: We are investing £470 million over the next three years in the national behaviour and attendance strategy to help tackle poor behaviour and absence from school, as well as introducing Fixed Penalty Notices and extending the use of Parenting Orders for persistent truancy offences.

£73 million will be spent on a universal element that will, through the behaviour and attendance strand of Key Stage 3, provide all secondary schools in England with behaviour and attendance auditing materials, training materials designed to help staff manage unacceptable behaviour, and a support structure. A further £396 million will be used to provide targeted packages through the behaviour and attendance strand of Excellence in Cities that will enable around 400 secondaries and approximately 1500 primaries to have multi-agency education and support teams for pupils and their families, police involvement with schools and more truancy sweeps.

Network Learning Communities

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many designated specialist schools are involved in the network learning communities organised by the National College for School Leadership. [98029]

Mr. Miliband: There are 105 specialist schools involved in networked learning communities.

Renewable Energy

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what changes in unit payments for electricity have resulted from the switch by his Department to purchasing renewable energy which is exempt from the Climate Change Levy. [96480]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: In 2001–02 my Department purchased 10 per cent. of its electricity from renewable sources which were exempt from the Climate Change Levy. The overall bill was 0.06 per cent. higher than if no renewable electricity had been purchased.

School Exclusions

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many problematic drug users (a) were temporarily excluded from school, (b) permanently excluded from school and (c) have one or more GCSEs in the last year for which figures are available. [98149]

Mr. Miliband: The information requested is not available centrally. The Department's regular data collections on pupils in schools and exclusions from school—mainly the Annual Schools' Census—do not record whether or not pupils are drug users. Similarly, pupil attainment data do not record this.

Following a review of data collected on exclusions, the department is planning to collect information from Local Education Authorities on both fixed term and permanent exclusions on a termly basis from this summer. We expect that this will capture the reason for exclusion.

Secondary Schools (Haltemprice and Howden)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the class sizes for (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in Haltemprice and Howden in each of the last five academic years. [94304]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The information requested is shown in the table:

Skill Shortages (Suffolk)

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the skill shortages experienced by employers in Suffolk. [97384]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: My Department has funded a number of surveys of employers to assess their current and future skill needs. The Employers Skill Survey, funded by my Department, interviewed 27,000 employers across England in 1999 and in 2001, and was carried out on a smaller scale in 2002. The survey results provide evidence on trends in skill shortages, including headline measures at the level of local Learning and Skills Council boundaries.

The role of assessing detailed skill needs in regions and localities is the responsibility of Regional Development Agencies and the Learning and Skills Council respectively. However, the Employers Skill Survey 2001 showed that 2.1 per cent. of employers in Suffolk reported skill shortages compared to 3.7 per cent. across England as a whole.

Skills Training

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether the forthcoming review of the funding of adult education will include a review of provision for those private individuals who fund their own skills training. [97958]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Review of Funding of Adult Learning has a remit to consider all funding for adult learning post 19, including how the Government's various support mechanisms for learning could be more effectively deployed to provide incentives to employers to engage in training; cause institutions to be responsive to employer needs, building their capacity to work with employers; widen participation in learning by the low skilled; and enable Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) to play their full and effective role in developing and implementing regional skills strategies. The outcomes of the Review will form part of the Skills Strategy, to be published in June 2003.

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assistance he intends to give to private individuals who meet the cost of skills training from their own resources as opposed to their employer's; and if he will make a statement. [97959]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Government is not yet in a position to make a statement about the assistance that will be given to private individuals meeting the costs of learning. As part of the fundamental Review of the Funding of Adult Learning that is currently being undertaken, we are looking at all possible options for funding the acquisition of skills, from the points of view of both individuals and employers. The outcomes of the Review will form part of the Skills Strategy, to be published in June 2003. The Strategy will set out how different government programmes and policies will contribute to raising the skills of the population.

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what recent representations he has received from learning providers about (a) the need for higher level IT skills and (b) the Government's policy on this issue. [97965]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: I have not received any significant representations from learning providers on the need for higher level skills in the Information Technology (IT) sector in recent months. However, we remain aware of their ongoing importance and committed to the policies we have introduced to meet these needs. Skills deficits in the sector have declined from their peak in 1999 when the Stevens report, "Skills for the Information Age" highlighted these issues. Since that time, an £8 million programme of measures has been put in place to improve the image of the IT industry, build greater understanding of the labour market and strengthen links between education and industry.

Recent developments include establishing New Technology Institutes to provide high quality teaching facilities and progression routes into honours degrees, based on partnership between universities, colleges and employers. And currently, e-skills-UK are in the final stages of development to becoming the Sector Skills Council for the industry. They will provide a vital lead in articulating employers' requirements and helping to ensure there is high quality and relevant provision available.

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether the skills strategy about which he has recently consulted will include provision to encourage private individuals to meet the costs of their own skills training in higher level IT skills and other skill areas. [97966]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Government will publish the Skills Strategy in June 2003; one element of that Strategy will be the consideration of how individuals can be encouraged to meet the costs of learning at higher levels. The Review of Funding of Adult Learning—the outcomes of which will feed into the Skills Strategy—is currently considering ICT issues, including how ICT skills might be delivered, and how training to acquire those skills might be supported through funding.

Social Policy Research

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what evaluation has been made of social policy research commissioned by Government agencies at (a) the University of York and (b) other universities; and if he will make a statement. [94591]

Margaret Hodge: The Department evaluates all its research projects using systematic criteria. The process also includes holding feedback meetings with research contractors after completion and publication of the contracted work. The findings from research link directly to departmental policy development and programme evaluation.

The Department has run five projects with the University of York in the last four years. Four projects have been completed and have fully met the Department's requirements. The fifth is still in progress.

Information received from the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) states that

"The ESRC evaluates all of its research projects using systematic criteria".

Since 1990, the council has funded 301 social policy research projects at UK universities, including 12 projects at the University of York. All this work has been evaluated by the ESRC's research evaluation committee, and the results have been used to guide the development of the council's research strategy.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to expand social policy research on a regional basis, commissioned to educational institutions within that region; and if he will make a statement. [94592]

Margaret Hodge: The Department has no plans to expand its research in any particular region.

The Department's research projects are normally commissioned through competitive tendering exercises. Universities across the UK, as well as other research organisations are invited to express an interest in tendering for individual research projects through the Department's research website. Contractors are then invited to submit a tender.

In the financial year 2002–03 the Department has 84 projects contracted to universities with a total contract value of £20 million.

Information received from the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) states that

"The ESRC will continue to fund social policy research through its grant awarding boards and has no plans to allocate funds on a regional basis."

Special Needs

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many children are enrolled in special needs education establishments; and how many schools with special needs provision there are (a) in England and Wales and (b) in each local education authority. [96625]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The information requested has been placed in the Libraries.

The information provided includes the number of special schools and the number of pupils in those schools. It also includes the number of pupils with a statement of Special Education Needs (SEN) and the number of pupils with SEN, but without a statement in maintained primary and secondary schools. In keeping with the SEN Code of Practice 2001 the special educational needs of children will normally be met in mainstream schools or settings.

For information on Wales I refer the hon. Member to the Welsh Assembly.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the annual total cost is of special needs education in England and Wales, broken down by local education authority. [96626]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The information requested is not held by the Department in this form. The following table details the amount each LEA spends on SEN funding as reported in its Section 52 BudgetStatement. This includes the LEA central spend and the amount delegated to schools that is notionally for SEN. Information is also given showing how much each LEA receives through SEN Standards Fund grant:

[1] Includes from Table 1: Total central spend by LEAs on SEN which covers Educational Pyschology Service/Assessments and statementing, provision for pupils with statements, specialist support: Pupils with and without statements, promoting good practice/collaboration/integration; and ISB for special schools.

[2] Also includes from Table 2A of the budget statement funding delegated to primary and secondary schools identified as "notional SEN" (figures are only indicative of the amount that might be spent by schools on SEN).

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what steps his Department is taking to ensure special needs provision is available for children with autism; and if he will make a statement. [96803]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Schools and local education authorities have duties under the Education Act 1996 to identify, assess and make suitable provision for children with special educational needs, including those with autism. Provision for children with autism is made in mainstream schools with support; autism units attached to maintained schools; generic special schools; independent, non-maintained or maintained autism specialist schools or through home-based provision.

To help schools, local education authorities and others develop and audit appropriate provision, my Department, in partnership with the Department of Health, published good practice guidance on autistic spectrum disorders last year. Among other things, this reflected the work of the Department for Education and Skills-funded West Midlands SEN Regional Partnership which has been focusing on a regional, multi-agency approach to creating a range of provision to meet the range of autistic children's needs.

Stage 3/GCSE

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the effect of in-school variation on value added standards of achievement at key stage 3 and GCSE. [96714]

Mr. Miliband: There is evidence of wide variation in pupil progress in schools. The Department plans to publish a Statistical Bulletin later this year analysing value added at each key stage by pupil characteristics. This will for the first time link the new Pupil Level Annual School Census data with value added data.

Student Loans

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what his estimate is of the annual cost of the collection of student loan repayments; what sum is paid by his Department to the Inland Revenue for this work; and if he will make a statement. [95379]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 3 February 2003]: There are two types of student loan. Borrowers under the pre-1998–99 scheme of mortgage style loans repay their loans direct to the Student Loans Company (SLC). Most borrowers under the current income-contingent loans scheme repay their loans through the tax system.

The SLC will spend around £12 million in the 2002–03 financial year on collecting repayments on mortgage style student loans not sold to the private sector, and on those income-contingent loans not collected by the Inland Revenue—voluntary repayments and repayments from borrowers outside the UK. The Inland Revenue is expected to charge around £1.9 million for collecting income-contingent loan repayments through the tax system in 2002–03. These costs are shared between England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Study Support Schemes

Annette Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what research has been commissioned by his Department to assess the benefits of youth action groups established with funding through partnerships of study support schemes; whether youth action groups have helped to reduce anti-social behaviour in school age children; and if he will make a statement. [98185]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Partners for Study Support scheme is being evaluated by the University ofSunderland and their report will be published in April 2003. Only one of the 134 projects funded through this scheme involved youth action groups. Crime-reduction projects in other school-related schemes are being evaluated as part of those schemes.

Teacher Vacancies (Portsmouth, South)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teacher vacancies there were in Portsmouth, South in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [98097]

Mr. Miliband: Vacancy figures are available only at local authority level. The table provides information available for Portsmouth LEA since it was created in April 1997.

January	Teachers[1]	Vacancies[2]	Vacancy Rate[3] (percentage)
1998	1,220	23	1.9
1999	1,390	16	1.2
2000	1,310	19	1.5
2001	1,330	59	4.5
2002	1,250	35	2.8

[1] Full-time teachers in post in the maintained schools sector.

[2] Advertised vacancies for full-time permanent appointments (or appointments of at least one term's duration) in maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special schools. Includes vacancies being filled on a temporary basis.

[3] Vacancies as a percentage of teachers in post.

Training and Skills (Financial Support)

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much financial support he is giving in 2002–03 for training and skills in (a) rural and (b) urban areas. [98305]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: This is a matter for the Learning and Skills Council. John Harwood, the Council's Chief Executive, will write to the hon. Gentleman with the information requested and a copy of his reply will be placed in the Library.

Tuition Fees

Jeff Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the additional income that would be raised by increasing the payment towards tuition fees under the existing arrangements to £1,500 per annum. [96394]

Margaret Hodge: Assuming that the means tested element of tuition fees for Academic Year 2002/03 had been set at £1,500 rather than £1,100, we estimate that English Higher Education Institutions would have received additional fee income of £310 million in the Financial Year 2002–03, made up from

(i) approximately £160 million of public contributions and,

(ii) approximately £150 million of private contributions.

The residual income[1] threshold[2] at which private contributions to fee support begin and the level of residual income at which the public contribution to fees reaches zero, are both assumed to be unchanged. Therefore the steepness of the taper (private contribution per £ of residual income) is assumed to increase. It has been further assumed that the changes to fees and means-testing have no impact on the number of students going to higher education, nor on their distribution by residual income.

These estimates are based on projections of student numbers for 2002/03 derived from actual data for academic year 2000/01. Private contributions have been estimated from 2000/01 LEA income assessment data and assumed growth rates in annual earnings.

[1] Residual Income is gross income less the allowances detailed in my Department's guidance, "Financial Support for Higher Education Students"

[2] £20,480 for dependent students and £17,715 for independent in 2002/03.

Universities (Access)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how he will ensure students will not be excluded from universities who charge higher tuition fees. [97414]

Margaret Hodge: Any university which wishes to charge variable fees will be required to have an Access Agreement which will be approved and monitored by the Access Regulator. The Regulator will monitor admission arrangements to ensure they promote fair access and will seek to extend current good practice through, for example, bursary schemes. The maximum fee will be capped in real terms for the duration of the next Parliament at £3,000. Additionally no student or family will have to pay fees before or while they are studying. Students will be able to defer their fees as for the current maintenance loans. No interest above inflation will be charged on either loans for maintenance or fees, and the threshold at which repayment starts will be raised to £15,000 to make repayment easier for everyone. Students from low income backgrounds will be eligible to have up to £1,100 of their fees paid, and student grants of £1,000 will also be introduced for those from low income families.

University Entrants

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the number of students expected to enter university in (a) 2003–04 and (b) 2004–05. [98062]

Margaret Hodge: The latest data from the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) show UK and overseas applicants for entry into English universities are up by 1.7 per cent. from 300,000 in 2002–03 to 305,000 in 2003–04. These are very early figures as the applications cycle is only just beginning, but we welcome the increase in applicants. It is too early to say what the final picture will be as it is final acceptance figures, not early application figures, which are the most important indicator of entry to HE.

Detailed estimates of the number of students expected to enter university in 2004–05 are not available.

Vocational Training

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his answer of 3 February 2003, Official Report, column 98W, on vocational training, if he will set out his plans for the programme to ensure two weeks of work experience with employers or other organisations is available for all pupils in Key Stage 4. [96764]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Over 95 per cent. of school pupils already undertake work experience placements in their last years of compulsory schooling to develop the skills and attitudes essential for the world of work. About 75 per cent. of these placements are for two weeks or longer. The Department provides £25 million a year, via the Learning and Skills Council (LSC), for school/business links activities. Around £10 million goes towards the costs of the work experience programme, which aims to ensure that all Key Stage 4 pupils can undertake at least two weeks' high quality work experience. In addition, a range of guidance and support is provided by the Department and the LSC to help local partners meet this objective. Independent evaluations of work experience show that placements are generally satisfactory and well-received by schools, pupils and employers.

HEALTH

Child Protection

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his role in maintaining accurate child protection records. [98758]

Jacqui Smith: In December 1999, the Secretary of State published Working Together to Safeguard Children, a guide to interagency working to safeguard and promote the welfare of children, using his powers under Section 7 of the Local Authority Social Services Act 1970.

"Working Together to Safeguard Children" includes guidance to agencies and professionals in relation to record keeping. It makes clear that good record keeping is an important part of the accountability of professionals to those who use their services, and that well kept records provide an essential underpinning to good child protection practice.

Records should be accessible and comprehensive, with judgments made, and actions and decisions taken being carefully recorded. They should use clear, straightforward language, should be concise, and should be accurate not only in fact, but also in differentiating between opinion, judgements and hypothesis.

The Social Services Inspectorate performance monitors the implementation of the Working Together to Safeguard Children guidance (and other relevant Government guidance) through its programme of inspections of children's services.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is taking to improve joint working between Multi-Agency Public Protection Panels and Area Child Protection Committees to safeguard children. [96063]

Jacqui Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on Monday 10 February 2003, Official Report, column 587–88W.

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many allegations in terms of the Children's Act 1989 were made by health trusts in respect of child protection issues in each of the last five years. [98343]

Jacqui Smith: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent discussions he has had with (a) representatives of the NSPCC on child protection and (b) the Fostering Network on care of children. [98487]

Jacqui Smith: The Department works closely with voluntary organisations which have an interest in safeguarding children.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has had no recent discussions. However, I meet with relevant voluntary organisations to discuss these issues.

Imported Infections

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how he intends to take account of the views of clinicians and community-based organisations working with vulnerable populations in the inquiry into imported infections; [97092]

(2) from which key stakeholders evidence will be sought for the inquiry into imported infections. [97091]

Ms Blears: The Cabinet Office is co-ordinating an internal review of immigration and infectious diseases and access to the National Health Service, involving relevant government departments including the Department of Health. The review will establish the facts on the impact of imported infections on public health and NHS resources and report to Ministers. There are no plans at this stage of the review to seek views from external stakeholders.

Acute Psychiatric Beds

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many acute psychiatric beds in each strategic health authority are occupied by patients aged (a) over 65, (b) over 75 and (c) over 85. [97673]

Jacqui Smith: The Department does not routinely collect such information.

Ambulances

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many fully operational ambulances were stationed (a) during the day and (b) at night at each of the ambulance stations in the Ribble Valley and Fulwood in each year since 1997. [97670]

Jacqui Smith: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Area Child Protection Committees

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what resources are (a) available and (b) proposed for area child protection committees; [96065]

(2) if he will make a statement on future arrangements for Area Child Protection Committees. [96040]

Jacqui Smith: Area child protection committee (ACPC) expenditure, is a matter for local agreement. As a multi-agency forum, the ACPC should be supported in its work by its main constituent agencies, reflecting the investment of each agency in activities which are of benefit to all, in particular inter-agency training.

The Joint Chief Inspectors' report Safeguarding Children, published on the 14 October 2002, contains a recommendation that the Department of Health should review the current arrangements for ACPCs to determine whether they should be established on a statutory basis to ensure adequate accountability, authority and funding.

The Government have welcomed the publication of this report, and will respond in full to its recommendations, together with those of the Victoria Climbie Inquiry in the Children At Risk Green Paper in the spring.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on placing Area Child Protection Committees on a statutory footing; and if he will make a statement. [98594]

Jacqui Smith: The Joint Chief Inspectors' report Safeguarding Children, published on 14 October 2002, contains a recommendation that the Department of Health should review the current arrangements for area child protection committees, to determine whether they should be established on a statutory basis to ensure adequate accountability, authority and funding.

The Government have welcomed the publication of this report and will respond in full to its recommendations, together with those of the Victoria Climbie Inquiry, in the Children At Risk Green Paper in the spring.

Audiologists

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many audiologists are employed by each NHS trust; [97878]

(2) how many vacancies for audiologists there are in the NHS. [97888]

Jacqui Smith: Information on numbers of audiologists employed in National Health Service trusts and vacancies for audiologists in the NHS are not separately available; they are included in physiological measurement staff. The information available has been placed in the Library.

Building Capacity Grant

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to organise a further round of funding of the building capacity grant. [97043]

Jacqui Smith: The Building Care Capacity Grant 2002–3 represents the final year of this funding to local authorities. Funding for building capacity was absorbed within the overall personal social services settlement for 2003–04. Furthermore, the Access and Systems Capacity Grant 2003–4 is a new grant, intended to expand the capacity and range of community based social care services for older people, and is being distributed according to the new older people's formula for social services.

Cancelled Operations

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 28 January 2003, Official Report, column 803W, on cancelled operations, what monitoring will be undertaken centrally to ensure that hospitals are meeting the guarantee set out in the NHS Plan. [95858]

Mr. Hutton: In line with the NHS Plan cancelled operations guarantee, data are collected on the numberof patients still waiting for an operation 28 days after their operation was originally cancelled by the hospital for non-clinical reasons on the day of surgery. As part of these data returns, from Quarter 4 2002–03, National Health Service trusts will be required to submit full data on where patients, who are breaches of the NHS Plan guarantee, have been treated; for example, at the same NHS trust, at another NHS Trust, in the private/independent sector or abroad.

Cancer Plan

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment has been made of the effectiveness of the money allocated for palliative care in the cancer plan. [97084]

Ms Blears: Estimates from Help the Hospices show that the level of statutory funding for voluntary hospices has increased by 14 per cent, in cash terms over the past two years. However, it is clear that only slow progress has been made towards meeting our commitment in the NHS Cancer Plan of an extra £50 million for specialist palliative care by 2004. That is why we are setting up a central budget for the £50 million from 2003–04. I refer my hon. Friend to the response I gave him today.

Cancer Research

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money was spent on average in each of the last five years on research into (a) the prevention of cancer and (b) the link between diet and cancer in the UK. [97321]

Ms Blears: The information requested is not available. However, in April 2001 the Government established the National Cancer Research Institute (NCRI) in partnership with the charities and the pharmaceutical industry.

The NCRI's first strategic analysis, which was published in October 2002, was an overview of the £257 million a year of cancer research in the United Kingdom that is directly funded by the NCRI's fifteen partner organisations. This analysis showed an apparently small investment—2 per cent.—in research into cancer prevention. But this category only included research aimed at the direct application of strategies to prevent cancer, and several other facets that inform preventive strategies are covered by other categories, such as aetiology, which includes diet.

The real investment in research relevant to future cancer prevention strategies was therefore larger than 2 per cent., but was still relatively low. The NCRI partner organisations agreed that the scale of research into cancer risk would benefit from closer joint examination. The NCRI has established a strategic planning group to carry out a much more detailed analysis of the research activity in this area, to discuss any potential opportunities and to identify any further action necessary.

Teenage Cancer

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many beds are available for teenage cancer patients on exclusively teenage wards in (a) the North West of England and (b) Lancashire. [98512]

Jacqui Smith: Information on bed numbers is not collected centrally at the level of detail requested.

Child Abuse/Neglect

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children were recorded as having died in each of the last 10 years following suspected or confirmed (a) abuse and (b) neglect. [94029]

Jacqui Smith: Information detailing the number of children who have died in each of the last ten years following abuse or neglect is not held centrally.

However, by revamping its databases of serious cases, the Department of Health has a record of serious case notifications from 1 April 2002. Of the 119 notifications between 1 April 2002 and 31 January 2003, 91 were of deaths and 28 were of serious injuries.

Information detailing the number of children under 16 years old, who are currently recorded as being victims of homicide (a category which covers murder, manslaughter and infanticide) over the last ten years has been placed in the Library.

Children's Database

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) which agencies and organisations have access to the Department of Health's computerised database of deaths and serious injuries of children; [94621]

(2) what use is made of the information on the Department of Health's computerised database of deaths and serious injuries of children. [94627]

Jacqui Smith: No outside organisations have routine access to the database. However, data derived from this database and its predecessors have been made available to bona fide researchers and others with a legitimate basis for their inquiry.

The data will inform policy development and the biennial overview of Serious Case Reviews (the first of which was published in June 2002), thus ensuring that important lessons from case reviews are put into the professional and public domain without compromising the confidentiality of vulnerable children, such as siblings of children who have died as a result of child abuse.

Chiropodists/Podiatrists

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what discussions there have been between the Department of Health and the Health Professions Council on how the public will differentiate between the different clinical competencies and qualifications of individual chiropodist and podiatrist practitioners; [95643]

(2) if he will make a statement on the efficacy of using the titles chiropodist and podiatrist to differentiate between the clinical competencies and qualifications of different chiropodist and podiatrist practitioners; [95644]

(3) what plans the Department of Health has to recommend to the Health Professions Council that they institute a sub-register for current chiropodists who may decide not to join the Health Professions Council's register; [95645]

(4) what plans his Department has to recommend to the Health Professions Council that they create protected titles other than chiropodist and podiatrist. [95646]

Ms Blears [holding answers 12 February2003]: My right hon. Friend the Minister of State met the President and Chief Executive of the Health Professionals Council (HPC) on 4 December 2002, at which meeting all aspects of the HPC's proposals were discussed.

The HPC consulted about which titles should be protected by law and has undertaken extensive market research to understand the public's perception of titles currently in use by healthcare professionals. The HPC's decision to propose the protection of both chiropodist and podiatrist reflects the general perception that these titles are used interchangeably. The titles indicate that those registered have met HPCs standards of competence. All applicants for registration will be expected to meet standards of proficiency, whether they are applying through the transitional arrangements, as international applicants or as UK applicants who have completed an approved course.

The HPC proposes using subsections of the register to distinguish between modalities of care but believes that to distinguish between skill levels would be confusing and unnecessary. The HPC has no plans to introduce a sub-register for those practitioners who do not meet the Council's standards of proficiency and who would not therefore be able to use the protected titles. Ultimately, it is for the HPC to propose and the Privy Council to determine the protected titles that will be associated with parts and subsections of the Health Professions Register.

Clinical Competence

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken and commissioned on the appropriateness of a three years out of five rule to assess clinical competence; and if he will make a statement. [94233]

Mr. Hutton: None. The three years out of five years rule is drawn from European Union Directives on recognition of qualifications for all professions which require a relevant qualification.

Correspondence

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Salford (Ms Blears), will reply to the letters of 25 October 2002, 9 December 2002 and 13 January 2003, from the hon. Member for West Suffolk concerning Mr. Dominique Porché, a constituent. [95900]

Ms Blears [holding answer 6 February 2003]: A reply was sent to the hon. Member on 12 February 2003.

Delivery Unit

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many officials in his Department have been assigned to do specific work (a) with and (b) for the Delivery Unit since June 2001; [94366]

(2) when Ministers from his Department last met members of the Delivery Unit; and on how many occasions since its establishment Ministers have met members of the Unit; [94327]

(3) which announcements made by his Department since June 2001 have been cleared in advance with the Delivery Unit; [94365]

(4) which Ministers and officials from his Department have visited areas outside London accompanied by Members of the Delivery Unit; [94364]

(5) when the Permanent Secretary in his Department last met members of the Delivery Unit; [94369]

(6) how many reports his Department has been comissioned to produce by the Delivery Unit in the next (a) 12 and (b) 24 months; [94367]

(7) if he will list the reports made since June 2001 by his Department to the Delivery Unit; [94368]

(8) what targets have been set for his Department by the Delivery Unit since June 2001; and what progress has been made in meeting such targets; [94371]

(9) when Ministers from his Department last met (a) the Prime Minister and (b) officials to discuss targets set by the Delivery Unit; and what plans there are for further meetings. [94370]

Mr. Lammy: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is responsible for meeting the Department's Public Service Agreement targets set out Cm 5571, copies of which are available in the Library.

The Delivery Unit was established to strengthen the capacity of Whitehall to deliver the Government's key objectives. It works closely with us to help us deliver our PSA targets, and we are in regular contact with members of the Unit.

Information about internal meetings is not disclosed under Exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Elderly People (Patient Transfers)

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the effect on their health of transferring elderly people between residential or nursing homes. [98862]

Jacqui Smith: The Department recognises that moving into and between care homes can be difficult and stressful for any long-term resident, particularly vulnerable older people.

Such moves, including ones made as a result of care home closures, should be handled as sensitively and appropriately as possible. Proper arrangements should be made for the safe and satisfactory transfer of all residents to other suitable homes. There should be adequate time for this to be done, in a way that allows both residents and their relatives a choice in where they are to move to, and which creates the minimum possible discomfort to all concerned.

Epilepsy

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on progress towards an action plan for reducing sudden death by epilepsy; [97982]

(2) what guidance he gives to consultants of patients with epilepsy to ensure that those patients are fully informed about the risks of sudden death from the complaint. [97983]

Jacqui Smith: We are committed to improving services for people with epilepsy. We have published an epilepsy action plan in response to the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) sponsored national clinical audit of epilepsy-related death and recommendations in the chief medical officer's 2001 annual report. The action plan is available in the Library.

The audit report and action plan draw the attention of local National Health Service clinicians and organisations to the need to establish or review policies and practices regarding the management of epilepsy and epilepsy related deaths.

Fluoridation

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the compatibility of fluoridation of the public water supply with the European Convention on Human Rights. [96811]

Ms Blears: In our view fluoridation is compatible with the Convention. It is a valuable health measure and fluoridation schemes can only be implemented where the local population has been consulted and have indicated their support.

Food Labelling

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve food labelling; and if he will make a statement. [95549]

Ms Blears [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The Food Standards Agency has adopted a wide-ranging action plan to tackle the issues consumers have identified as priorities for improving food labelling. The Agency is pressing for a number of important changes in European law; for example on country of origin labelling, nutrition labelling and health claims. It is also working closely with stakeholders on a range of voluntary initiatives, including clearer labelling, appropriate use of claims like 'fresh', 'natural' and 'pure' and more extensive, clearer country of origin labelling.

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will require food products which contain artificial sweeteners and display a label indicating that they are sugar free to display details of the artificial sweeteners in the same typeface as the sugar free declaration. [95550]

Ms Blears [holding answer 13 February 2003]: Foods containing artificial sweeteners are required by law to be marked or labelled with the indication "with sweetener(s)" or "with sugar and sweetener(s)" as appropriate, if they carry a 'sugar free' claim. There is no requirement for this indication to be in any particular size or type of lettering, but it must be clearly legible.

Labelling rules are set at European Union level and are currently being reviewed by the European Commission. In the meantime, the Food Standards Agency is reviewing its labelling guidance and plans to advise that sweetener declarations should be given due emphasis.

Greater London Assembly

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what financial assistance his Department gave to the Greater London Assembly in 2002; and for what projects. [95849]

Ms Blears: The Department does not provide financial assistance to the Greater London Assembly.

Health Chief Executives

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list Chief Executives of health bodies who have left their posts over the last 24 months; if he will give the reason in each case; and what financial package arrangements were made in each case. [97096]

Mr. Hutton: The Department does not collect information centrally on the number of chief executives leaving their posts, the reasons for leaving nor on the payments made.

Health Professions Council

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the professional advisory committees; and what discussions he has had with the Health Professions Council on its proposals for professional liaison groups. [94230]

Mr. Hutton: I met with the President and Chief Executive of the Health Professions Council (HPC) on 4 December 2002, when all aspects of the HPC's proposals were discussed.

Under the Professions Supplementary to Medicine Act 1960, the Council for Professions Supplementary to Medicine (CPSM) had permanent standing uni-professional advisory committees. The Health Professions Order 2001 allows the Council to set up professional advisory committees to advise the Council or its statutory committees on matters affecting relevant professions. Any advisory groups or committees may be multi-professional with flexibility to provide profession specific advice as and when required. Ultimately, it is for the HPC to decide how best to obtain the necessary advice and also the mechanism for supplying it.

Home Care

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which local authorities have a zero rating policy for charging for home care. [97792]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 13 February 2003]: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Home Care Charges

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, by local authority area in England, the (a) average and (b) maximum home care charges made by local authorities. [98318]

Jacqui Smith: Information on individual council's home care charging policies is not held centrally.

The Department of Health issued statutory guidance to local councils for home care charges in November 2001. The guidance states that when assessing a person's income, charges should not reduce users' incomes below basic levels of income support plus a 25 per cent. buffer, and when setting an overriding maximum charge councils should consult users.

Homeless People

Mr. Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on how access to the health services of homeless people living in (a) hostels and (b) bed and breakfasts is being encouraged. [87437]

Ms Blears: National Health Service services are available free to anyone who is ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, including anyone who is homeless. Primary care trusts (PCTs) have a duty to ensure appropriate and timely access to healthcare for everyone in their area, including the homeless and those living in hostel accommodation.

In addition, the new requirement on local authorities to carry out a review of homelessness in their area and develop a homelessness strategy with local partners, such as the PCT, will help to identify gaps in services and ensure that there is appropriate mainstream and specialist health care for homeless people.

We have in place a range of initiatives to improve access to primary care services for homeless people. These include the development of a model general medical service local development scheme for PCTs and the promotion of locally agreed personal medical services (PMS) contracts with a similar focus. There are now nearly 90 PMS pilot schemes which include the homeless as a priority objective. In addition, we are generally trying to improve access to NHS services for all through a variety of different access routes, for example, through walk-in-centres, diagnosis and treatment centres and one-stop primary care centres.

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what support is offered to homeless people to help them register with general practitioners; and what duty general practitioners have to register homeless people; [96872]

(2) what action the Government have taken to alleviate the problem of homeless people not registered with general practitioners. [96873]

Mr. Hutton: National Health Service medical primary care services are available free to everyone who is ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, including anyone who is homeless. The Department is taking a range of actions to improve access for such people.

These initiatives include developing targeted personal medical services pilot schemes, a model general medical services local development scheme, the provision of NHS walk-in centres and, most recently, reminding GPs, in the monthly GP newsletter for February 2003, that a patient does not need to have a permanent address to register for services.

Hospital Acquired Infection

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the implications of hospital acquired infections for delayed discharge rates; and what representations he has received from care homes refusing to take residents from NHS trusts who have MRSA. [97691]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 13 February 2003]: Data on the impact of hospital acquired infections on discharge from hospital are limited. However, it is estimated[1] that patients who acquire an infection in hospital remain in hospital on average an extra 11 days.

We have not received evidence that refusal to take patients because of methicillin resistant staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) is a significant problem. MRSA is not a contraindication to admission to a residential or nursing home and a Department of Health leaflet, entitled "MRSA—What nursing and residential homes need to know", provides advice on this topic.

Hospital Beds

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the change in the total number of hospital beds was in 2001–02. [88749]

Mr. Hutton: The average daily number of available general and acute beds in National Health Service hospitals increased in 2001–02 by 789 to 136,583 compared to the previous year.

The Chief Executive's Report published on 20 December demonstrates where increased resources have led to an improved system of care. A system that is flexible and where increased activity happens outside the traditional inpatient hospital stay—in outpatients or in primary care. In the mental health sector, services for users are developing to provide prompt assessment and treatment round the clock for people with acute mental health needs who would otherwise have to be admitted to hospital. New services have been developed with an increase in patient contact with assertive outreach teams, crisis resolution teams and early intervention teams over the last year.

Hospital Building Programmes (London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much public funding is available for NHS hospital building programmes within the Greater London area. [95231]

Ms Blears: National health service capital allocations for the period 2003–04 to 2005–06 were announced on 8 January 2003. The capital allocations provide funding for the NHS hospital building programme and other capital investment within the NHS.

The amount allocated to the NHS organisations in London was £307million for 2003–04, £340 million for 2004–05 and £374 million for 2005–06. A breakdown is shown in the table.

This investment will be supplemented by additional public capital funding that will be issued in the future, and by investment from the Private Finance Initiative.

Hull and East Yorkshire Hospitals NHS Trust

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many delayed discharge patients there were in the Hull and East Yorkshire Hospitals NHS Trust in the last year for which figures are available. [94300]

Jacqui Smith: Delayed transfer of care figures are published quarterly on a primary care trust basis and are available in the Library.

Hydrotherapy

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which hospital trusts have hydrotherapy pools; and if he will make a statement. [97508]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not collected centrally.

International Advice Line

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 17 December 2002, Official Report, column 794W, on the international advice line, how many calls were received on 08458 50588 in (a) December 2002 and (b) January 2003. [97342]

Mr. Hutton: The overseas nurses' advice line received 12 completed calls in December 2002 and 23 completed calls in January 2003.

National Cancer Plan

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much of the National Cancer Plan money that has been allocated so far for palliative care has been received by (a) voluntary based hospices and (b) NHS hospices. [97389]

Ms Blears: The NHS Cancer Plan, published in September 2000, pledged that the National Health Service contribution to the costs of specialist palliative care, including hospices would increase by £50 million by 2004.

Estimates from Help the Hospices show that the level of statutory funding for voluntary hospices has increased by 14 per cent, in cash terms over the past two years. To enable faster progress towards the commitment to increase NHS investment in specialist palliative care by £50 million by 2003–04, we have made available an extra £10 million from central budgets for specialist palliative care for 2002–03.

A central budget of £50 million per annum for the year 2003–04 to 2005–06 has been set up for specialist palliative care. I refer the hon. Member to the response I gave to my hon. Friend, the hon. Member for Jarrow (Stephen Hepburn) today.

National Care Standards Commission

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what qualifications are held by National Care Standards Commission inspectors relevant to their work in inspecting residential nursing homes. [98014]

Jacqui Smith: All inspectors employed by the National Care Standards Commission are required to hold a professional qualification and have a minimum of three years' experience working in a nursing, social care or health setting, to enable them to undertake their work as inspector.

Neuroleptic Prescribing

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of the incidence of inappropriate neuroleptic prescribing in nursing and residential homes; and if he will make a statement; [97209]

(2) what steps he has taken to reduce the over-medication of older people in (a) residential and (b) nursing homes; and if he will make a statement; [98033]

(3) what estimate he has made of the number of older people who are inappropriately prescribed (a) traditional and (b) atypical antipsychotic medication. [98032]

Jacqui Smith: Estimated numbers of prescription items for antipsychotics (all antipsychotics and atypical antipsychotics) are shown in the table.

Prescription Cost Analysis (PCA) data

Information is not available about prescribing specifically in care homes.

The Government are aware of concerns about the possibility of inappropriate prescribing of antipsychotic medication in care homes and of the results of a recent survey on this issue. A number of developments should help ensure that antipsychotic medication is used only when appropriate. In particular, implementation of the medicines management supplement of the older people's national service framework and the requirements in the care homes national minimum standards around management of medication should ensure that any problems are picked up.

NHS Beds

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the baseline was for the target for extra beds by 2004 in general and acute wards announced in the NHS plan. [97813]

Mr. Hutton: The baseline for the NHS Plan target was the average daily number of available beds in general and acute wards open overnight in 1999–2000.

Nurses and Nursing Agencies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 5 February, Official Report, column 225W, on international nurse recruitment, in what form each agency responded to the allegations; what methods were used to verify the information given by (a) the agency and (b) the overseas nurse who instigated the complaint; and what appeals procedures are in place if one party disagrees with the findings of the Department's ruling. [97285]

Mr. Hutton: In all cases the allegations have been received in writing and the agencies have responded in writing. After consideration of the allegation and the responses the Department has, again in all cases, decided no further action was necessary. No party has this far expressed any disagreement with the Department's decision. Should there be a disagreement, the Department would consider a higher level internal review.

Palliative Care

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many homeless people were not registered with a general practitioner in (a) Jarrow constituency, (b) South Tyneside, (c) Tyne and Wear and (d) England in each year since 1997. [96871]

Mr. Hutton: The Department does not hold information on the number of people, whatever their circumstances, not registered with a general practitioner.

The data on registered patients do not allow homeless people who are registered with a GP or personal medical service pilot provider to be separately identified.

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how much of the £50 million allocated for palliative care will be given to South Tyneside; [96875]

(2) what the criteria are for hospices to qualify for funding allocated for palliative care under the cancer plan; [96876]

(3) what plans there are to speed up the allocation of the £50 million allocated for palliative care in the cancer plan. [96874]

Ms Blears: A central budget of £50 million per annum for the year 2003–04 to 2005–06 has been set up for specialist palliative care. This ensures that the pledge in the NHS Cancer Plan of an additional £50 million per annum by 2004 is met. South Tyneside Primary Care Trust (PCT) has provisionally been allocated £173,000.

Before any allocations can be made from the central budget, the agreed cancer network plans will need to be approved by the strategic health authority—which will oversee the process and retain its monitoring role—and then be submitted to and approved by the National Partnership Group.

The National Partnership Group is chaired by Professor Mike Richards, the National Cancer Director. It includes representatives from all levels of the National Health Service and a wide range of voluntary organisations. Network plans must be submitted to the National Partnership Group by 31 March at the latest and the group will approve plans as soon as possible after that. Allocations will be made as soon as plans are approved. The £50 million is to help tackle inequalities in access to specialist palliative care and to enable the NHS to make a realistic contribution to the cost hospices incur in providing agreed levels of service. The money is for specialist palliative care services in their entirety and not for voluntary hospices alone although, as they play an essential role and provide two thirds of all specialist palliative care, it is reasonable to expect they will get a fair slice of this extra money. Information about this process, about the criteria and of the provisional allocation for each PCT has been placed in the Library and is available on the Department of Health's website at www.doh.qov.uk/cancer/palliative 03 06.htm.

Patient Records

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what procedures are in place for correcting false records relating to patients in the NHS. [98120]

Mr. Lammy: Patient records should reflect the observations, judgements and factual information collected by the contributing health professional. Incorrect factual information should be corrected by those responsible for maintaining the record and the Data Protection Act 1998 provides a legal basis for enforcing such corrections when appropriate. An opinion or judgement recorded by a health professional, whether accurate or not, should not be subsequently amended however as it is essential for understanding the clinical decisions that were made and to audit the quality of care.

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what procedures are in place for preventing a health trust (a) destroying records within its possession and (b) failing to disclose information. [98121]

Mr. Lammy: Each National Health Service trust and health authority is legally responsible for managing records and complying with legislation and guidance on disclosing information.

In the NHS, guidance and governance arrangements have been designed to assure compliance with law and good practice, while minimising the overheads of managing and auditing detailed procedures. Independent authorities, such as the Audit Commission, Health Service Commissioner and Information Commissioner, oversee the governance arrangements and may impose sanctions where there is a significant failure to comply.

Trusts keep records to support patient care and other legal requirements, but it is also necessary to destroy records when they are of no further value. Destruction should be controlled by formal retention and disposal arrangements based on the NHS Retention and Disposal Schedule issued by the Department of Health.

Trusts are legally obliged to give patients access to their own personal information, and are expected to be open about their organisation, policies and processes. But there are also circumstances when it is right to withhold information. Such circumstances are set out clearly in published guidance on data protection and openness.

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in whom rests final authority to (a) retain and (b) destroy patient records and associated documentation. [98122]

Mr. Lammy: Final authority for retention or destruction of National Health Service records rests with the individual NHS trust, primary care trust or heath authority concerned.

NHS patient and administrative records are public records. The Public Records Act 1958 requires everyone handling public records to manage them responsibly from the time they are created to their eventual destruction or selection for permanent preservation.

Destruction of records should only be carried out according to formal retention and disposal arrangements, based on the NHS Retention and Disposal Schedule issued by the Department of Health, but varied by agreement with senior clinical and administrative staff to suit local conditions.

The Department of Health last issued guidance on record keeping, with a revised NHS Retention and Disposal Schedule, in 1999. The guidance and disposal schedule are availableon the Department of Health web site at http://www.doh.gov.uk/nhsexec/manrec.htm

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether it is permissible for medical records to be released on an unsolicited basis by one health trust to another. [98128]

Mr. Lammy: Health records are held in confidence, subject to common law obligations of confidence and the requirements of the Data Protection Act 1998.

It would be permissible for a health trust to release medical records to another trust on an unsolicited basis where — there is a legal requirement to do so;

there is a public interest in such a disclosure e.g. where child protection issues have arisen;
the patient has requested or otherwise consented to the release;
the record has been effectively anonymised.

Public Bodies

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those public bodies for which his Department is responsible where provision is made in the job description of the chairman that the policies of the body are compatible with those of the Secretary of State. [97243]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 12 February 2003]: The job descriptions for the chairs of the following bodies state they should ensure that their board observes the Secretary of State's policies and priorities.

National Health Service trusts
Strategic health authorities
Primary care trusts
The Dental Practice Board
The Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health
The NHS Appointments Commission
The National Institute for Clinical Excellence

Respite Care (Disabled People)

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government have for increasing (a) the numbers of carers and (b) the effective use of respite care for the disabled. [97984]

Jacqui Smith: The Department has committed funding of £1.5 million, to the national social care recruitment campaign, launched in October 2001. The campaign comprises national advertising, leaflets, posters, local and national public relations activity, a helpline, and a website. The materials produced are available to local employers to support their own recruitment and retention efforts to reduce vacancy rates in the social care workforce.

The effective use of respite care for the disabled is supported by the carers' grant, introduced in 1999 to support councils in providing short breaks for carers to enable them to continue to care whilst maintaining their own health and wellbeing.

Secure Hospitals

Mr. Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prisoners with mental health problems were awaiting transfer to a secure hospital on the last day of 2002, broken down by prison establishment. [98524]

Jacqui Smith: Data are not currently collected in the form requested.

Sexual Assault

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many sexual assault referral centres in the UK the Department funds (a) alone and (b) jointly with another agency, at premises other than at hospitals; [97123]

(2) how many sexual assault referral centres the Department funds (a) alone and (b) jointly with another agency. [97240]

Ms Blears [holding answer 12 February 2003]: The Department does not directly fund sexual assault referral centres (SARCS). We understand that there are currently six SARCs in England but that their funding is a matter for the local police force and or authority and the local primary care trust and National Health Service trust.

However we are aware that the Home Office, through the crime reduction programme—violence against women initiative, is funding a nurse forensic examiner project at St Mary's SARC in Manchester. It is also funding a project to examine the impact that SARCs may have on attrition rates for sexual offences; comparing SARC areas with areas where no SARC is available. These are research projects, and interim data are currently being analysed. The findings will help inform decisions about future SARC development.

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the Department's policy is on locating future sexual assault referral centres at (a) hospitals and (b) separate premises; [97121]

(2) what steps are being taken by the Department to support the establishment of sexual assault referral centres; [97238]

(3) how many sexual assault referral centres there are in the UK at hospital premises. [97241]

Ms Blears [holding answer 12 February 2003]: People who have been raped or sexually assaulted require access to a variety of services including forensic examination, counselling and treatment to prevent sexually transmitted infections and pregnancy. We are aware that sexual assault referral centres (SARCs) have been developed in a number of areas to provide a 24 hour comprehensive service under one roof. Information on numbers of SARCs is not collected centrally however we understand that there are currently six across England. A number of different models exist, which include centres located within or attached to hospitals.

We will work with the Home Office to support the further development of SARCs and other service options.

Skin Conditions

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact on long-term conditions, with particular reference to eczema, psoriasis and acne, if they are omitted from the National Service Framework on long-term conditions. [97981]

Jacqui Smith: The national service framework for long-term conditions will have a particular focus on neurological conditions, and brain and spinal injuries.

But in so doing, it will also tackle some of the common issues which are relevant to a wider range of people with long-term conditions generally and help to drive up the quality of treatment and care.

In September 2000, the NHS Modernisation Agency established the Action on Dermatology programme. Around £35 million has been invested in capital projects since then. Action on Dermatology—Good Practice Guidance was published on 20 January 2003 and issued to dermatology departments in primary care trusts and strategic health authorities. This will help ensure that people with dermatological conditions have access to appropriate services and support across the country.

In December 2001, the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) issued Referral Practice, a guide to appropriate referral from general to specialist services. The booklet includes the suggested referral practice for atopic eczema in children and psoriasis. A copy of the booklet is available at http://www.nice.orq.uk/pdf/Referraladvice.pdf

Social Services

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 9 January 2003, Official Report, column 328W, how many older people received each category of community based social services in each year since 1997. [96775]

Jacqui Smith: The figures quoted in the answer of 9 January 2003 come from the Key Statistics (KS1) return that is used to calculate the social services performance assessment framework (PAF) indicators. This information is contained in the publication 'Social Services Performance Assessment Framework Indicators 2001–2002' which is available at http://www.doh.gov.uk/paf. The indicator 'C32–Older people helped to live at home' provides the total number of older people receiving community-based services as at 31 March for the years 1998–2002. However, a breakdown of individual services is not available.

Social Work Degrees

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to minimise tuition fees costs for people wanting to undertake a three-year social worker degree. [98591]

Jacqui Smith: The bursary for social work students, which we are introducing in September 2003, will include the contribution for tuition fees which the local education authority has assessed the student should meet.

Social Work Diploma

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of specialisation in child care and child protection practice will be included in the new three year Diploma in Social Work. [96106]

Jacqui Smith: The training for the new social work degree has an emphasis on learning for practice. There is a requirement for students to spend a minimum of 2002 days learning in practice in at least two settings, to include statutory social work tasks involving legal intervention and of providing services to at least two user groups. Training providers must also ensure that students undertake specific learning in a number of key areas including communication skills with children, adults and those with particular communication needs. Partnership working and information sharing across professional disciplines and agencies must also be covered. I have placed a copy of the Requirements for Social Work in the Library.

On qualification there are opportunities for further training in specialist areas such as childcare. As part of the reform of social work education, the General Social Care Council (GSCC) is undertaking a review of the current framework for post-qualifying training for social work. This will include a review of the PQ Child Care Award.

Social Workers

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has issued on the training of unqualified staff as social workers from in-house local authority social services departments. [96076]

Jacqui Smith: I have not issued any guidance regarding the training of unqualified staff as social workers. However, at the Association of Directors of Social Services (ADSS) conference in October 2000 my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, announced funding for a three-year student support scheme for those studying for first level professional social work qualifications.

The funds for this scheme were put into a ring-fenced sub-programme of the Training Support Programme Grant and they have been used to enable employers to develop their experienced care staff by putting them forward for training in the Diploma in Social Work (DipSW). This year the funds can also be used to support staff who commence the new three year degree in social work in September 2003. The funds available in this TSP sub-programme are as follows:

2001–02	£3 million
2002–03	£13 million
2003–04	£13 million

In 2003–04, £6 million will be allocated to ensure that each local council area has a Trainee Social Worker scheme. Some councils already have schemes to 'grow their own' social workers through trainee social worker schemes. The programme we are proposing will ensure that a scheme will be operating in all areas.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to increase the number of applications to be social workers in (a) London and (b) the UK. [97585]

Jacqui Smith: To make social work a more attractive career choice, a new degree level qualification in social work is being introduced from September 2003. It will make newly qualified staff more confident, competent and better equipped for the realities of social work practice. Also, for September, a non-means tested bursary is being introduced to encourage more students to enter social work training. It will be payable to new and existing students, who ordinarily reside in England and who are not funded by their employer.

Both developments are supported throughout, by the national social work recruitment campaign, launched in October 2001, backed by funding of £1.5 million. Applications for social work courses have risen for the first time in seven years, by 8.3 per cent, on the numbers for 2001.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many vacancies he estimates there are for social workers in (a) the Portsmouth area and (b) England; and if he will make a statement. [98344]

Jacqui Smith: We do not hold central information on social worker vacancies in each local authority area. A survey undertaken by the Employers Organisation found that, across all local authority social services in England as at 30 September 2001, around 10 per cent, of all field social worker posts were vacant. Regional variations show that, as of 30 September 2001, the south west has vacancy rates of 8.5 per cent.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to increase the number of social worker applications in (a) the Portsmouth area and (b) England; and if he will make a statement. [98345]

Jacqui Smith: To make social work a more attractive career choice a new degree level qualification in social work, is being introduced from Sept 2003. It will make newly qualified staff more confident, competent and better equipped for the realities of social work practice. Also, for September, a non-means tested bursary is being introduced to encourage more students to enter social work training. Applications for social work courses have risen for the first time in seven years, by 8.3 per cent, on the numbers for 2001. The action taken by the Department of Health is to increase the number of social worker applications in England. It is for local employers to take other specific action locally.

Strokes

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research has been carried out to assess how many patients admitted to hospital as a stroke patient were admitted to the stroke unit during their stay at any time in (a) the UK, (b) England and (c) the Lancashire and Cumbria Strategic Health Authority; and if he will make a statement; [97864]

(2) what plans he has to expand follow-up treatment to help increase the numbers of stroke patients who have a return to normal blood pressure six months after discharge; and if he will make a statement. [97853]

(3) what research has been carried out to assess the number of stroke patients for whom it would be appropriate to be assessed in their own home prior to discharge that undergo such assessment in (a) the UK, (b) England and (c) Lancashire and Cumbria Strategic Health Authority; and if he will make a statement; [97857]

(4) what research has been carried out to assess (a) the number of stroke patients discharged into residential or nursing home care, having been previously independent, in (i) the UK, (ii) England and (iii) Lancashire and Cumbria Strategic Health Authority and (b) the reasons for most patients being discharged into such residential or nursing home care; and if he will make a statement; [97856]

(5) what plans he has to increase the aftercare and secondary prevention on stroke patients following their discharge to include (a) hypertension management, (b) lipid lowering and (c) modification of behavioural risk factors; and if he will make a statement; [97863]

(6) what assessment has been made of the change in the numbers of stroke patients who have brain imaging within the two day target of the National Service Framework for Older People; what plans he has to (a) increase these numbers and (b) achieve a 100 per cent. target rate; and if he will make a statement; [97855]

(7) what research has been carried out to identify the reasons for the number of stroke patients for whom it would be appropriate to be assessed in their own home prior to discharge that do not undergo such an assessment; and if he will make a statement; [97851]

(8) what plans he has to increase the number of stroke physicians in hospital trusts; and if he will make a statement; [97899]

(9) what targets the Department sets for assessment of stroke victims by (a) swallowing assessment within 24 hours, (b) visual fields recorded within 24 hours, (c) weighing the patient and (d) brain imaging assessment criteria; and if he will make a statement; [97862]

(10) what research has been carried out to assess the number of patients admitted to hospital as a stroke patient who (a) spend no time within the stroke unit during their stay and (b) are admitted to the stroke unit during their stay and who receive 50 per cent.or more of their treatment within the unit in (i) the UK, (ii) England and (iii) Lancashire and Cumbria Strategic Health Authority; and if he will make a statement; [97854]

(11) what research has been carried out to assess the numbers of stroke patients who have a return to normal blood pressure six months after discharge in (a) the UK, (b) England and (c) Lancashire and Cumbria; and if he will make a statement; [97852]

(12) what plans he has to improve the effectiveness of stroke units and to increase the capacity of units; and if he will make a statement. [97898]

Jacqui Smith: We do not collect routinely information on stroke services at the level of detail requested in these questions. The most comprehensive source of information is the National Sentinel Stroke Audit, carried out by the Royal College of Physicians. The audit was commissioned by the National Health Service in 1998 and was last updated in 2002. The results can be found at http://www.rcplondon.ac.uk/pubs/strokeauditQ1-02.pdf.

The audit contains information covering discharge arrangements, and clinical assessments including swallowing assessments and visual fields. The 2002 audit shows that 73 per cent. of trusts who participated had a stroke unit, compared to 56 per cent, three years earlier. In addition, 83 per cent, of patients receive brain imaging—the highest ever level. The audit shows that 80 per cent, of trusts that participated have a consultant physician with specialist knowledge of stroke who is formally recognised as having principal responsibility for stroke services. While it is recognised that some services need to increase their capacity, the audit notes that very significant improvements have already been made.

Our major vehicle for further improving standards for stroke services is through the older people's national service framework (NSF), which sets specific milestones for improvement by 2004 of stroke services in primary care trusts (PCTs), specialist services and general hospitals that care for people suffering from a stroke. Our document, Improvement, Expansion and Reform, which sets for the NHS a priorities and planning framework for 2003–6, makes clear that implementation of the older people's NSF is a top priority and that the 2004 milestone around specialist stroke services is a key target.

We monitor progress against the key milestones in the NSF. From the information gathered so far, we know that 83 per cent, of the hospitals who have replied now have plans to have a specialist stroke service in place by April 2004.

Under the NSF, PCTs will need to ensure that every general practice can identify and treat patients identified as being at risk of stroke because of high blood pressure, atrial fibrillation or other risk factors by April 2004. To help ensure that the treatment they receive is of a consistent standard, the National Institute of Clinical Excellence is developing guidelines for the management of hypertension in primary care. The Institute's report is expected next year.

Implementation of the NSF for older people is leading to real improvements in stroke services and making a difference to people's lives. The development of better services and improved standards in stroke care requires the right balance between national standards, provided by the NSF, national clinical guidelines and local control. It will be important to ensure that stroke care services are co-ordinated and fully integrated within a full range of other relevant local services.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what monitoring has taken place against the April 2002 milestone contained in Standard Five of the National Health Service Framework for Older People, for every general hospital treating stroke patients to have a plan to introduce a specialised stroke unit by April 2004; and what proportion of hospitals have met the milestone. [94579]

Jacqui Smith: An exercise conducted in autumn 2002 concluded that 83 per cent. of hospitals have plans in place to introduce a specialist stroke service from 2004.

Tobacco Products

Mr. Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the system of licensing for sale of tobacco products by retailers. [93111]

Ms Blears: There is at present no system of licensing for retailers of tobacco products.

There is a Tobacco Enforcement Protocol (published in March 1998) aimed at assisting local authorities with regard to the enforcement legislation to prevent the sale of tobacco products to minors. The Department of Health has sponsored an initiative over the last year to improve the awareness and training of trading standards officers and enforcement officers of local authorities involved in this work. This has been done in co-operation with the Trading Standards Institute (TSI) and the Local Authority Co-ordinators of Regulatory Services (LACORS).

Vehicle Fleets

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made with renewal of NHS trusts' vehicle fleets on a lower emission basis, broken down by volume and percentage for each category of vehicle, type of power unit and/or type of fuel, in each of the last three years. [96593]

Ms Blears [holding answer 10 February 2003]: Reducing vehicle emissions is a key transport issue, which has been agreed as a priority across Government. Against a baseline year of 2002–03, all Departments are aiming by 31 March 2006 to reduce road transport vehicle carbon dioxide emissions by at least 10 per cent, and requiring at least 10 per cent, of all fleet cars to be alternatively fuelled.

Progress against these targets will be reported in the Sustainable Development in Government annual reports. The first full report against the Framework will be in 2003, reporting against the baseline year of 2002–2003.

The National Health Service has a vehicle fleet of more than 40,000 vehicles but information in the format requested is currently not available.

Written Answers to Questions

TREASURY

Gibraltar

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what studies his Department has assessed of the possible effect on the (a) industry and (b) economy of Gibraltar if the UK were to enter the eurozone. [98913]

Ruth Kelly: The Government have made clear that a comprehensive and rigorous assessment of the five economic tests will be made within two years of the start of this Parliament.

Working Tax Credit

Mr. Steve Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate how many (a) couples with children, (b) couples with no children and (c) single childless people will be entitled to the new working tax credit. [94024]

Dawn Primarolo: The Working Tax Credit is expected to benefit 1.35m families with and without children.

Asbestos

Mr. Heald: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the annual cost (a) in each year since its introduction and (b) over the next five years of tax relief on work done to remove asbestos; and if he will make a statement. [98656]

John Healey: The legislation is intended to aid the regeneration of sites that are contaminated by harmful substances, not just asbestos. Estimates of the cost for cleaning sites contaminated with asbestos are therefore not available. However, the full cost of the Finance Act 2001 relief for regeneration of sites contaminated by harmful substances was estimated at £50 million in 2001–02, £85 million in 2002–03 and £75 million in 2003–04. Figures for the remaining two years are not available.

Mr. Heald: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the (a) verification and (b) auditing arrangements for claims for tax relief on work done to remove asbestos. [98657]

Dawn Primarolo: Claims for land remediation relief under the Finance Act 2001 provisions are subject to the same verification and auditing arrangements as any other entry in a Corporation Tax return.

Child Tax Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate how many couples are ineligible for children's tax credit because the income of the highest earner is too high, but would be eligible for child tax credit because their joint income is below the upper limit. [94048]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 28 January 2003]: Without FRS data for 2002–03 it is not possible to provide reliable estimates.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates his Department has made of the annual cost to British industry of the climate change levy (a) overall and (b) per sector. [98712]

John Healey: The climate change levy is expected to raise about £0.9 billion from business and the public sector in 2002–03. This has been recycled back to these sectors through a 0.3 percentage point cut in employers' national insurance contributions, support for enhanced capital allowances for investments in energy efficiency measures, and spending on renewable energy and energy efficiency, principally through the Carbon Trust.

The levy package is expected to be broadly revenue neutral between industry and the service sector. It is not possible to determine the impact on individual sectors as this depends on the extent to which they are eligible for discounts for energy-intensive users, their use of levy-exempt renewable energy and combined heat and power, and their take-up of the enhanced capital allowances and support from the Carbon Trust.

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what measures have been taken to assist sectors that are unable to comply with the Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control Directive, and are ineligible for a rebate on the climate change levy, with the cost of the climate change levy; [98714]

(2) what measures his Department has taken to assist small businesses to meet the cost of the climate change levy. [98713]

John Healey: The climate change levy (CCL) was introduced in a package which involves reductions to employer national insurance contributions and support for energy efficiency, which is broadly revenue neutral to business as a whole. As part of the package, the Government supports businesses investing in approved energy-saving technologies through enhanced capital allowances. All businesses can take advantage of the help available from the CCL funded Carbon Trust which supports energy efficiency improvements by business and the development of low carbon technologies. Some of the Carbon Trust schemes, for example their small firms loan scheme, are intended specifically to benefit small firms. In addition, many of the smallest businesses' energy use will be below that at which levy becomes payable, so will not pay any levy at all.

In recognition of the need to protect the competitiveness of energy-intensive industries subject to international competition, the Government allows an 80 per cent. discount from the levy for businesses in energy-intensive sectors covered by the Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC) regime, providing they have entered into climate change agreements with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) to meet two-yearly energy efficiency targets. The Government targets relief from the levy on those sectors covered by the IPPC as it covers the main energy-intensive sectors subject to international competition.

Finally, in order to give all businesses an incentive to agree to emissions targets, the Government have also launched the UK emissions trading scheme, with an incentive worth £150 million after tax over five years.

Departmental Staff (Northern Ireland)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the (a) numerical and (b) percentage breakdown by perceived community origin are of (i) Inland Revenue and (ii) Customs and Excise staff employed in Northern Ireland. [97791]

John Healey: The information is as follows:

HM Customs and Excise

Out of the total number of 631 the numerical (a) and percentage (b) breakdown by perceived community origin of HM Customs and Excise staff employed in Northern Ireland as at 1 January 2003 is:

	Number	Percentage
Protestant	229	36
Roman Catholic	355	57

It has not been possible to determine the community origin of 7 per cent. of staff.

Inland Revenue

Out of the total number of 1,703 the numerical (a) and percentage (b) breakdown by perceived community origin of Inland Revenue staff employed in Northern Ireland as at 1 January 2003 is:

	Number	Percentage
Protestant	745	44
Roman Catholic	838	49

It has not been possible to determine the community origin of 7 per cent. of staff.

Liquefied Petroleum Gas

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what financial aid is available for those petrol stations which wish to supply liquefied petroleum gas. [98899]

John Healey: Government policy on encouraging the use of liquefied petroleum gas (LPG) has centred on encouraging the use of vehicles through lower rates of excise duty and grants to convert cars to LPG through the powershift programme. This policy has been very successful with over 1,100 stations now selling LPG across the country compared to 150 in 1998.

Meetings

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether meetings between officials of his Department and representatives of Guernsey are held on Jersey; [98912]

(2) how often meetings are held between his Department's officials and representatives from the Isle of Man; and whether meetings are held purely when necessary; [98911]

(3) what his Department's policy is regarding consultation with representatives of Jersey on economic decisions that could affect Jersey. [98910]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 11 February 2002, Official Report, columns 114–15W.

Metallgesellschaft Case (Compensation)

Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much compensation has been paid to claimants by the Inland Revenue following the decision of the ECJ in the case of Metallgesellschaft (C-397/98); and what his estimate is of the total amount that will be paid. [98548]

Dawn Primarolo: To date, the Inland Revenue has paid a total of £32,489,711.

Other claims made on the basis of this decision are still subject to legal proceedings. It is impossible, at this time, to estimate the total amount that might be paid in the future.

North Sea Tax Regime

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made as to the effect tax changes on North Sea oil and gas companies announced in the Budget statement 2002 are having on the competitiveness of the industry. [99025]

John Healey: The Budget 2002 changes to the North Sea taxation regime make new investment in the North Sea more economic for oil and gas companies while extracting a fairer share of revenue for the taxpayer. The reforms are too recent for a comprehensive assessment of their overall economic impact, but the Government are encouraged by early evidence from the UKOOA report of November 2002, which found that > "total capital expenditure for the period 2001–2010 is forecast to increase by around £1 billion, compared with last year's forecast."

Tax and Benefits

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) families and (b) individuals have gained from tax and benefit changes since 1997; and on average by how much. [98256]

Dawn Primarolo: As a result of tax and benefit changes introduced since 1997, by 2003–04 households with children will be, on average, £1,200 per year better off. Some 6.4 million households with children will be better off.

By 2003–04, all households will be £740 per year better off on average as a result of measures introduced since 1997. Each adult will be £440 per year better off on average. There are nearly 35 million adults in households that will be better off as a result of measures introduced since 1997.

Tax Credit Helpline

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what performance targets have been set for the tax credit helpline; and what have been the monthly performance levels against those targets since the helpline was established. [94237]

Dawn Primarolo: A helpline was set up in August 2002 to handle detailed inquiries about the two new tax credits—Child Tax Credit and Working Tax Credit. The introduction of these two new tax credits in April 2003 represents a large one-off piece of work for the Inland Revenue. That work includes handling telephone enquiries and processing claims. The helpline has not been set stand-alone performance targets because, as a one-off exercise, call handling and claims processing are effectively being managed as a single stream of work—allowing resources to be allocated across the two in the light of changing workload priorities.

The underlying aim at the helpline is to ensure that people can get through when they need to. That is monitored in a number of ways, including looking at the volume of calls received and handled. The best available evidence on calls made and calls received indicates that, in each month since August 2002, a high proportion—certainly more than 90 per cent.—of callers have got through on the same day.

Taxation

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate the number of families where the principal earner has a gross income above the higher rate threshold and the gross household income is below £58,175; [93061]

(2) if he will estimate the number of families entitled to the children's tax credit where the recipient has a gross income of between £34,515 and £42,450 and the gross household income is between £50,000 and £58,175; [93060]

(3) if he will estimate the number of families entitled to the children's tax credit where the recipient has a gross income of less than £34,515 and the gross household income exceeds £50,000; [93058]

(4) if he will estimate the number of families entitled to the children's tax credit where the recipient has a gross income of less than £42,450 and the gross household income exceeds £58,175; [93057]

(5) if he will estimate the number of families entitled to the children's tax credit where the recipient has a gross income of less than £34,515 and the gross household income exceeds £58,175; [93059]

(6) if he will estimate the number of married or cohabiting couples with children whose combined taxable income exceeds £34,515 but is less than £50,000 in 2003–04; [93063]

(7) if he will estimate the number of married or cohabiting couples with children whose combined taxable income exceeds £34,515 but is less than £58,175 in 2003–04; [93065]

(8) if he will estimate the number of married or cohabiting couples with children whose combined taxable income exceeds £42,450 but is less than £58,175 in 2003–04; [93064]

(9) if he will estimate the number of married or cohabiting couples with children whose combined taxable income exceeds £42,450 but is less than £50,000 in 2003–04. [93062]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 23 January 2003]: No reliable estimates exist.

Thermal Insulation

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer further to his answer of 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 42W, on thermal insulation, what the implications are of the European Union Court Case 416/85, EC Commission v. United Kingdom for the possibilities of VAT reduction on the sales and installation of energy saving materials; and if he will make a statement. [98563]

John Healey: European Court of Justice case 416/85 concerned the scope of the UK's zero rates. The Court held that zero-rating could only be justified for clearly defined social reasons and for the benefit of the final consumer.

The long-standing formal agreements with our European partners make entirely separate provision for reduced rates (of no lower than 5 per cent.) and allow relief for the 'supply, construction, renovation and alteration of housing provided as part of a social policy'. Under this provision, the UK has been able to introduce a reduced rate for installations of certain energy-saving materials in homes. Our current policy is to restrict the relief to the installation of materials whose primary purpose is to save energy, and the European Court case has no bearing on this limitation.

As I explained in my answer of 22 January, we are not able to introduce a reduced rate of VAT for energy-efficient or energy-saving materials sold direct to the public. This is not because of the European Court case, but rather that the reduced rate provision makes clear that goods and materials can only have a reduced rate when they are supplied as part of an overall service.

UK Listing Authority

Mr. Colman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what the principal regulatory risks are that the UK Listing Authority is responsible for managing; [99159]

(2) what progress the UK Listing Authority has made in reviewing the monitoring of continuing compliance with the Listing Rules and in recommending improvements; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the review's results and recommendations; [99161]

(3) what progress the UK Listing Authority has made in reviewing the requirements for approval and vetting of listing and other documentation, and in making recommendations; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the review's results and recommendations; [99158]

(4) what the outcome was of the UK Listing Authority's risk-based review of the sponsor system and recommendations for improvements; and if he will make a statement on his policy towards including such an objective in the authority's objectives for 2002–03. [99160]

Ruth Kelly: The United Kingdom Listing Authority (UKLA) is part of the Financial Services Authority, which is independent of the Government. The duties of the FSA in its capacity as the UKLA are set out in section 73 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. Following on from these duties, the UKLA formulates and enforces Listing Rules that:

provide an appropriate level of protection for investors in listed securities; facilitate access to listed markets for a broad range of enterprises; seek to maintain the integrity and competitiveness of UK markets for listed securities.

The UKLA also has operational objectives, that are more task-specific, which are discussed each year with the Treasury. These objectives can be found on the UKLA section of the FSA website.

Issues relating to the UKLA's review of the Listings Rules are a matter for the UKLA.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Burma

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is the (a) value of imports the UK received from Burma and (b) the nature of these imports in 2002. [88773]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 8 January 2003]: I have been asked to reply.

According to figures published by HM Customs and Excise, UK imports of goods from Burma in 2002 were as follows:

£000

Product	Value
Fish, (not marine mammals), crustaceans, molluscs and aquatic invertebrates and preparations thereof	8,310
Vegetables and fruit	485
Coffee, tea, cocoa, spices, and manufactures thereof	7
Oil seeds and oleaginous fruit	10
Cork and wood	979
Pulp and waste paper	121
Cork and wood manufactures (excluding furniture)	1,302
Textile yarn, fabrics, made-up articles, nes and related products	49
Manufactures of metals, nes	14
Power generating machinery and equipment	1,225
Machinery specialised for particular industries	1
General industrial machinery and equipment, nes and machine parts, nes	2
Office machines and automatic data processing machines	1
Electrical machinery, apparatus and appliances, nes and electrical parts thereof (including non-electrical counterparts, nes, of electrical household type equipment)	2
Transport equipment other than road vehicles	29

Work Placements

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many university students her Department and associated agencies has supported or sponsored with a work placement in the last year; what her policy is on work placements; what plans she has to develop such schemes; and what her policy is on paying their university fees. [98549]

Clare Short: My Department has extensive contacts with UK Universities and supports work placements for students on an ad hoc basis.

DFID is also a corporate sponsor of the Windsor Fellowship. The Windsor Fellowship is a charity whose aim is to identify high achievers from Black and Asian communities and to offer them a development programme. We have provided six Fellows with eight-week placements. DFID also provides up to four placements a year under the Cabinet Office Summer Development Programme for potential applicants to the fast stream from within the ethnic minorities. Attachments last between six to eight weeks.

It is not our practice to pay university fees of those whose placements we sponsor.

We do not operate a formal scheme for the placement of university students and have no plans to do so.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

E-mails

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission what type of software is used to filter e-mails in the House. [98279]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: A commercially available software package is used to detect and block incoming messages containing viruses and to filter incoming e-mails containing inappropriate material.

Internet Monitoring

Mr Liddell-Grainger: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission whether use of the internet within the parliamentary estate is monitored. [98278]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: The Parliamentary Communications Directorate monitors the amount and type of internet traffic in order to manage the network and to inform planning decisions. For staff of the House of Commons, the House Authorities reserve the right to monitor individual use of the internet upon a written request from a departmental establishments officer.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Criminal Records Checks

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people applying for positions within residential care and nursing homes are awaiting clearance from the Criminal Records Bureau in (a) the East Riding of Yorkshire, (b) Hull and (c) England.[Transferred] [97721]

Hilary Benn: Data on outstanding applications for specific job types or the areas requested are not available because there are no IT procedures at present to extract this data from the Criminal Records Bureau (CRB) database. This functionality is expected to be available during subsequent system releases.

Disclosures are currently taking an average of five weeks to complete. Many of the outstanding applications at any time will be the subject of requests to applicants or Registered bodies for future information. There are 62,327 cases over three weeks old (less than two weeks output), plus a further 82,204 such cases awaiting information from customers.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether civil offences are recorded in disclosures issued as a result of criminal records bureaux checks. [97675]

Hilary Benn: At present, the Criminal Records Bureau (CRB) is issuing Standard and Enhanced Disclosures. These show spent and unspent convictions, cautions, reprimands and warnings recorded on the Police National Computer. In appropriate cases, the CRB searches a list kept by the Department for Education and Skills of people who are considered unsuitable to work with children. An Enhanced Disclosure would also include other information held in local police records which, in the chief officer's opinion, is relevant to the matter in hand and ought to be included in the Disclosure. It is possible that a Disclosure might include information about a civil offence as a result of such other enquiries.

Anti-trafficking Budgets

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much the budgets of the (a) police, (b) Customs and (c) intelligence services were to combat (i) drug, (ii) firearm and (iii) people trafficking in (A) 2001, (B) 2002 and (C) 2003. [96907]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The information is as follows:

(a) Police Authorities and Chief Officers are responsible for setting budgets and making operational decisions within them. The information sought is not available centrally.

(b) Her Majesty's Customs and Excise spent as follows on detecting and deterring the smuggling of illegal drugs and other prohibited and restricted goods: £229 million in 2000/01; and £229.6 million in 2001/02. (source: HMCE Annual Reports)

(c) It has been the policy of successive Governments not to disclose information concerning the breakdown in the allocation of resources of the Intelligence Agencies or provide information about their activities. However, in April 2001 it was exceptionally announced that the Security and Intelligence Agencies had been awarded additional funding to aid the fight against crime in the areas of drug trafficking and people smuggling. The amounts allocated were:

	2001/02	2002/03	2003/04
(i). drugs trafficking	5. 9m	6. 6m	7. 7m
(iii). people smuggling	0.6m	0.5m	0.6m

Anti-war Protest

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what mechanisms he will use to ensure that the numbers of anti-Gulf War protesters marching to Hyde Park on 15 February 2003 are accurately counted. [97956]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 24 February 2003]: The Government do not calculate the number of people participating in marches and demonstrations. The Metropolitan Police Service (MPS), as well as other police forces, use a range of techniques for estimating the numbers involved.

British Detainees (Switzerland)

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has received from Swiss authorities regarding two Britons detained in Switzerland last year on suspicion of terrorist activities at the Gösgen nuclear power station in Switzerland. [98852]

Mr. Blunkett: Due to the confidential nature of cases received in respect of Mutual Legal Assistance, I can neither confirm nor deny the existence of letters of request. In any event, we would discuss operational cases where criminal investigations may be on-going.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the letter to him dated 4 November from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Ms Mansoureli Bozorovia. [97086]

Mr. Blunkett: I wrote to my right hon .Friend on 24 February 2003.

Crime (Humberside)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people arrested in (a) Haltemprice and Howden, (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire and (c) the Humberside Police Authority area tested positive for category A or B drugs in each quarter since 1997. [97723]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: At present arrestees throughout England and Wales are not routinely tested for drugs, so it is not possible to provide the level of detail requested.

However, the New English and Welsh Arrestee Drug Abuse Monitoring (NEW-ADAM) research programme, which involves interviewing and drug testing those arrested by the police at 16 sites throughout England and Wales, does provide some information. Analysis of the data from the first eight sites in the survey, collected during 1999–2000, shows that of those arrestees that provided a urine sample, 65 per cent. tested positive for one or more illegal drugs, while 30 per cent. tested positive for two or more such substance. Indeed, 29 per cent. tested positive for opiates (including heroin) and/or cocaine (including crack).

Drug test results are also available from three drug-testing pilot sites. The Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000 gave the police power to drug test arrestees once they are charged with a "trigger offence" (these include property crime, robbery and specified Class A drug offences). The proportion of police tests, collected during July 2001 to February 2002, where results were positive for cocaine and/or heroin were: Hackney, 63 per cent.; Nottingham, 58 per cent.; Stafford and Cannock, 47 per cent.

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) prosecutions and (b) convictions were recorded in each year since 1997 in the Humberside police authority areas for (i) carrying a loaded firearm in a public place, (ii) acquiring a firearm under the age of 17, (iii) being a person under 14 possessing an air weapon or ammunition, (iv) being a person under 14 possessing an air weapon in a public place, (v) supplying an air weapon to a person under 14 and (vi) making improper use of an air weapon. [97722]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The information contained in the table gives the number of defendants proceeded against and convicted of the various firearms offences requested, in the Humberside police force area, 1997 to 2001.

Statistics for 2002 will be published in the autumn.

Group III—Air weapons as defined in section 1(3)(b) of the Act.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for Criminal Records Bureau checks processing will be postponed from March 2003 to 2004. [96589]

Hilary Benn: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 20 January 2003, Official Report, column 176W.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will commission an evaluation of the impact of the Criminal Records Bureau on volunteering in deprived communities. [96591]

Hilary Benn: We are determined that the operation of the Criminal Records Bureau should benefit the voluntary sector. As part of the Bureau's wider consultation arrangements with its customers, a voluntary and community sector working group has been established whose terms of reference specifically include monitoring the implications of the disclosure service for, and considering how the service should best meet the needs of, the voluntary and community sector.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Criminal Record Bureau plans to launch an advisory service to employers about the availability of checks in a variety of countries; how much the contract is valued at; when the contract will expire; how many people are employed in the service; how much his Department is investing in the service; and if he will make a statement. [97141]

Hilary Benn: The Criminal Records Bureau (CRB) launched an overseas information service on 4 December 2002. This provides information, via a fax-back service, on the criminal record checking regimes available in 15 countries. It is expected that the number of countries included in this service will rise during the course of 2003.

The aim of the service is to provide employers with information that will lead them to sources of information overseas, beyond those capable of being offered by the CRB, to help them make safer recruitment decisions. The only contracted-out element is the fax-back service operated by iTouch (UK) Limited. The amount received by iTouch (UK) Limited over the period of the contract will depend upon the number of inquiries made to the faxback service. The contract is scheduled to run until December 2005, at which time it will be reviewed. All other aspects of the scheme are administered by civil servants employed by the CRB. Two members of staff undertake this work as part of their other duties. The total measurable cost of providing the service during the current financial year has so far been £3,650.00.

The overseas information service is a non-statutory service provided by the CRB. Part V of the Police Act 1997 under which the CRB was created did not envisage the CRB obtaining overseas criminal records as part of the Disclosure service. Nevertheless, it was recognised that foreign nationals (and UK nationals returning from a period of residence overseas) make up a significant portion of the UK workforce. These individuals often occupy positions of trust, which would normally attract a CRB Standard or Enhanced Disclosure. However a Disclosure would be of limited use for employers seeking to recruit a foreign national, given that it is unlikely that these individuals would feature on the UK data sources accessed as part of the CRB Disclosure service.

The faxback service provides information regarding the availability of criminal records from overseas, in particular the application procedure involved in obtaining such records from overseas. Calls are charged at premium rate (£1 per minute). The following 15 countries are featured on the faxback service:

Australia
Canada
Denmark
France
Germany
Jamaica
Malaysia
Netherlands
New Zealand
Philippines
Poland
Republic of Ireland
South Africa
Spain
Sweden

The overseas information service also comprises an email enquiry facility (overseas@crb.gsi.gov.uk) and a National Rate enquiry line (0870 0 100 450).

The CRB is not involved in any application made to an overseas authority, nor is it responsible for the processes operated by or the nature of the information returned by that overseas authority. The costs incurred in the financial year 2001–02 amount to just over £25,000. The Overseas project was commissioned by the CRB Chief Executive in May 2001 and was concerned with establishing contact with, and benchmarking against, equivalent agencies overseas. This figure includes a number of fact-finding visits to many of the countries covered by the faxback service. The latest visit was undertaken in December 2001.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what date the Carter report has set for the restoration of checks against the Protection of Vulnerable Adults List; [97207]

(2) if he will list the (a) milestones and (b) targets that have been set by the Carter Inquiry into the postponement of Criminal Record Bureau checks; and when they are expected to be achieved. [97211]

Hilary Benn: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 20 January 2003, Official Report, column 175W.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place a copy of the (a) enhanced, (b) basic disclosure and (c) standard forms and the (i) old and (ii) new explanatory notes for Criminal Records Bureau checks in the Library. [97210]

Hilary Benn: Basic Disclosures are not yet available from the Criminal Records Bureau, and as such Basic Disclosure Application Forms do not yet exist. A single application form is used for Standard and Enhanced Disclosure applications and a copy of this form, along with both original and updated guidance notes, has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 29 January 2003, Official Report, column 911W, on the Criminal Records Bureau, how much was paid to each organisation who conducted research for the Department; and if he will place a copy of each of the evaluations in the Library. [97225]

Hilary Benn: The following payments were made to each organisation that conducted research for the Department:

Research Payments
Accent Marketing and Research	16,293.26
Rosslyn Research Limited	5,710.50

A copy of these evaluations will be placed in the Library in due course.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects basic disclosures to be issued again by the Criminal Records Bureau; and if he will make a statement. [97690]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 13 February 2003]: Basic disclosures are not yet available from the Criminal Records Bureau (CRB). In light of the operational difficulties that the CRB experienced in the summer of 2002, following the launch of the Enhanced and Standard Disclosure Services, the CRB decided to postpone the implementation of the Basic Disclosure Service, planned to start one year after the Enhanced/Standard Disclosure service. A revised implementation date has not yet been agreed and this is conditional upon the recommendations made to Ministers by the Independent Review Team.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 3 February 2003, Official Report, column 72W, what the total cost is of the ex-gratia payments that have been made by the CRB. [98836]

Hilary Benn: The total cost of ex-gratia payments made by the Criminal Records Bureau, up to 15 February 2003, is £40,160.

Daedalus Site

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department was made aware that the Daedalus site at Lee-on-the-Solent might be available for Home Office purposes. [99014]

Beverley Hughes: We announced on 11 February 2003 that we had identified HMS Daedalus as a potential site for an Accommodation Centre. We have put this into the public domain because, following preliminary work, we consider the site to be a serious prospect for an Accommodation Centre.

We first became aware in November 2002 that this site might become available for this purpose.

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what extra resources the Home Office will provide for Hampshire Constabulary for the policing of the Daedalus site at Lee-on-the-Solent in the event of the possible residential unit for young male asylum seekers being approved. [99015]

Beverley Hughes: The site at HMS Daedalus is being considered as a potential suitable site for an accommodation centre for single male asylum seekers. A final decision has not yet been taken. Detailed consultations have not yet begun.

Domiciliary Carers (Criminal Record Checks)

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the decision to allow employment of domiciliary carers for disabled people without them first being cleared by the Criminal Records Bureau from April 2003. [98553]

Hilary Benn: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary gave to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) on 4 November 2002, Official Report, column 100W.

Since the beginning of October 2002, the Criminal Records Bureau has issued on average over 40,000 Disclosures per week, and has produced in excess of 1 million Disclosures since 11 March 2002.

The independent review team, which my right hon. Friend announced last September, submitted its conclusions and recommendations at the end of last year. We hope to publish the team's recommendations, together with the Government's response, shortly.

Drink-driving Offences

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) drink-driving offences were recorded in each year since 1997 by the police constabulary and (b) successful prosecutions there have been in (i) England, (ii) Wales and (iii) Scotland since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [98488]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Available information on the number of proceedings and convictions for offences of driving whilst impaired by drink or drugs or driving above the specified limit for alcohol in England and Wales is given in the table by police force area. The data cannot be disaggregated between alcohol or drug offences.

Matters related to Scotland are for the Scottish Executive.

[1] Including offences under Road Traffic Act 1988 sec 4(1) and (2); 5(1)(a) and (b); 6(4); 7(6):

Driving or attempting to drive a motor vehicle whilst unfit through drink or drugs (impairment).

Driving or attempting to drive a motor vehicle while having a breath, urine or blood alcohol concentration in excess of the prescribed limit.

Failing without reasonable excuse to provide a specimen for a laboratory test or two specimens for analysis of breath if at the relevant time he/she was driving or attempting to drive a motor vehicle.

In charge of a motor vehicle while unfit through drink or drugs (impairment).

In charge of a motor vehicle while having a breath, urine or blood alcohol concentration in excess of the prescribed limit.

In charge of a motor vehicle and failing to provide a specimen for a laboratory test or two specimens for analysis of breath if at the relevant time he/she was driving or attempting to drive a motor vehicle.

Failing without reasonable excuse to provide a specimen of breath for a preliminary test.

Excluding offences under Road Traffic Act 1988 sec 3A:

Causing death by careless driving when under the influence of drink or drugs.

[2] Not available (Staffordshire were only able to submit data for a sample of weeks in 2000).

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what studies his Department has undertaken in relation to drink-driving offences from the sale of alcohol from (a) supermarkets, (b) off-licences and (c) petrol filling station forecourts; and if he will make a statement. [98489]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: No studies have been undertaken on the commission of drink-driving offences relating to alcohol purchased from different retail categories. However, the Home Office has commissioned research that determines where people had been drinking on the most recent occasion they had driven after drinking alcohol: at home; at someone else's home; in a pub/pubs; in a restaurant; in a nightclub/club; outside in a public place (e.g. park, street); or a specified other. The results are currently undergoing analysis.

The Home Office remains committed to combating drink-driving and shall maintain an emphasis on effective enforcement and publicity. The UK has shown that a combination of rigid enforcement and advertising campaigns has a dramatic effect on reducing the numbers of killed and seriously injured in crashes involving illegal levels of alcohol, although we acknowledge there is still much to do. We are currently looking at the possibilities for helping effective enforcement of drink drive legislation, for example, by introducing roadside evidential testing.

Drugs

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average number of interventions through the criminal justice system is for a Class A drug misuser before (a) treatment, (b) a drug treatment and testing order and (c) a prison sentence is imposed. [98150]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Information is not available in the form requested. A range of interventions has been developed at key stages in the criminal justice system which seek to identify and engage drug misusers, particularly those using Class A drugs, in order to access them into drug treatment delivered within a community or custodial setting. Pro-active arrest referral schemes, drug treatment and testing orders, and prison treatment services are available throughout England and Wales. Drug testing under the provisions introduced by the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000 (including testing after charge and pre-sentence) is being piloted and implemented only in certain areas.

In the Updated Drug Strategy 2002 the Government set out a comprehensive new programme of criminal justice interventions with a view to delivering an integrated "end to end system" aimed at getting drug misusers out of crime into effective treatment.

Vernon Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for merging drug action teams and crime reduction partnerships; and if he will make a statement. [98083]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The Police Reform Act, from 1 April 2003, places a statutory responsibility on local authorities, police and others to formulate and implement a drugs strategy mirroring their responsibility for crime and disorder strategies. Multi-agency partnerships are the most effective way of delivering these strategies, but we currently support separate ones for drugs (149 Drug Action Teams in England) and (376 Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships in England and Wales). To reduce burdens on partnerships, ensure they are properly resourced and reduce overlaps in the delivery of community safety, this Government believe that partnerships should be brought together, through merger or, where that is truly not feasible, by developing closer working arrangements.

Many partnerships have merged or will have merged by 1 April 2003. Others, particularly in two tier authorities, are building on already close working relationships, in discussion with Local Strategic Partnerships, where they exist. We expect that, by April 2003, there will have been a complete overhaul in the way partnerships function, and to see improvements in delivery of the National Drug Strategy and local crime and disorder strategies.

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been through the court system for (a) possession, (b) dealing and (c) trafficking of illegal drugs in each of the last five years. [98178]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The numbers of people proceeded against for possession, dealing and trafficking in illegal drugs in England and Wales in the last five available years are shown in the table.

Numbers of people proceeded against for drug offences, England and Wales, 1996–2000

Offence	1996	1997	1998	1999	2000
Possession[1]	26,927	33,125	43,516	44,603	40,738
Dealing[2]	2,148	2,233	3,875	3,644	2,707
Trafficking[3]	4,067	4,033	5,561	5,021	3,728

[1] The term 'possession' refers to those proceeded against for unlawful possession.

[2] The term 'dealing' refers to those proceeded against for unlawful supply, possession with intent to supply unlawfully and unlawful import/export.

[3] The term 'trafficking' refers to those proceeded against for unlawful production, unlawful supply, possession with intent to supply unlawfully and unlawful import/export.

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been to prison for offences under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 in each of the last five years; and what proportion of these people were from black and ethnic minority backgrounds. [98179]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The table shows the prison population in England and Wales under sentence and remand for drug offences[1].

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug treatment and testing orders have been issued to (a) heroin addicts, (b) crack cocaine addicts and (c) poly-drug users since the scheme began. [98148]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Between 1 October 2000 and 31 December 2002 (which is the latest month for which figures are available) 10,525 orders were made. Information relating to the proportion of Drug Treatment and Testing orders issued to heroin, crack or poly-drug users is not available centrally.

Iraq

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Iraqi citizens he expects to apply for asylum in the United Kingdom in the event of conflict in Iraq. [96164]

Beverley Hughes: A number of Iraqi citizens currently seek asylum in the United Kingdom on a weekly basis. It is not clear if the numbers would significantly increase following a conflict in Iraq.

Home Office officials routinely revise contingency plans to deal with increases in asylum seekers.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Iraqi refugees the United Kingdom will take in the event of conflict in Iraq. [96166]

Beverley Hughes: Home Office officials, in liaison with other Government Departments, routinely revise contingency plans, including those for large influxes of displaced persons.

There are, at present, no specific plans to take refugees from Iraq.

Point-of-sale Payment

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from (a) banks and (b) retailers on conversion to microchip and PIN technology for point of sale payment transactions. [99113]

Mr. Denham: I met representatives of the Association of Payment and Clearing Services (APACS) on 12 July 2001 and 31 January 2002 to discuss the implementation of this technology. Since then I have received regular joint progress reports from APACS and the British Retail Consortium (BRC), as well as from the implementation programme managers.

The Chief Executive of APACS wrote to me in February and again in October last year to express concern about the possible outcome of an Office of Fair Trading investigation into Mastercard interchange fees. He advised me that a ruling that these fees were uncompetitive would put the implementation of Chip and PIN at risk.

The programme managers, together with representatives from APACS and the BRC, had a further meeting with Home Office officials on 21 January this year, when they advised that the programme was going well and was on target for implementation in late 2004.

Police Officers (Brain Injury)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how frequently serving police officers returning to active duties after traumatic brain injury should be assessed by a clinical psychologist. [98674]

Mr. Denham: Police Occupational Health Units in England and Wales will review the case of each officer who has suffered a head injury before they resume duty. Where appropriate, additional psychological tests and treatments are given by either a clinical psychologist or neuropsychologist. The aim of such assessment is to ensure that each force complies with the duty of care described in the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974.

Prisons

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the rights of prison officers to undertake industrial action; and whether the Government plans to review these rights. [97127]

Hilary Benn: Section 127 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 makes it unlawful to induce Prison Officers to withhold their services or commit a breach of discipline. For this purpose a breach of discipline means a contravention of Prison Rules or the code of conduct and discipline in the Prison Service. If inducements occur and loss results, the Secretary of State may take legal action against the person or persons so inducing those staff for damages.

In addition, on the introduction of the Employee Relations Voluntary Agreement in April 2001, the union signatories (Prison Officers' Association (POA) and Prison Governors' Association (PGA)) also agreed not to induce, authorise or support any form of industrial action, which would have the effect of disrupting the operations of the Prison Service. The POA are contractually bound to honour this agreement, which in effect offers protection to the Prison Service against industrial action, in its ability to obtain injunctive relief.

There are no current plans to review the provisions of the Voluntary Agreement to which the Prison Service remain committed.

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug misusers under treatment have been (a) arrested and (b) imprisoned since 1 January 2002. [98146]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Information is not available in the form requested.Emerging evidence from the National Arrest Referral monitoring system provides some data relating to drug misusers who are arrested and voluntarily screened by arrest referral workers.

Data for October 2000 to September 2001 show that of the 48,810 arrestees screened by an arrest referral worker, 12 per cent. (5,268) were to continue in treatment they were currently receiving. The arrestees concerned are likely to be problematic drug misusers and may not be representative of the wider arrestee population.

Other research, from the New English and Welsh Arrestee Drug Abuse Monitoring programme (NEW-ADAM), has shown that of a total sample of arrestees interviewed, 29 per cent. said that they currently had a need for treatment and, of those, nine per cent. said that they were receiving treatment and 29 per cent. said that they were not.

The numbers of prisoners who have engaged in one or more of the Prison Service's range of drug interventions since 1 January 2002 are shown in the table:

Drug intervention	Number of prisoners engaging since 1 January 2002[1]
Detoxification	47,811
CARATs[2]	49,675
Rehabilitation programmes and therapeutic communities	4,334

[1] The data cover the period 1 January 2002 to 31 December 2002

[2] Counselling, assessment, referral, advice and throughcare services—a low-level intervention that provides a gateway assessment, referral and support service to prisoners both within custody and upon their initial release.

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many problematic drug users have been in prison. [98151]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Records of the actual number of problematic drug-misusing prisoners who pass through custody are not kept centrally by the Prison Service. Data from the Office for National. Statistics show that around 80 per cent. of prisoners have used drugs at some point before coming into prison, with 54 per cent. reporting drug dependency in the year prior to custody. With an annual throughput of approximately 130,000 offenders, an average of 70,000 drug-misusing prisoners may be in custody during the course of a year; with around 39,000 present at any one time.

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his estimate is of the proportion of (a) the prison population, (b) those going through the court system and (c) those going through the court system charged under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 whose offending relates to the need to support illegal drug use over the last five years. [98177]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The numbers of prisoners who have engaged in one or more of the Prison Service's range of drug interventions since 1 January 2002 are shown in the table.

Prisoners engaging in one or more drug interventions between 1 January and 31 December 2002

Drug intervention	Number
Detoxification	47,811
CARATS[1]	49,675
Rehabilitation programmes and therapeutic communities	4,334

[1] Counselling, Assessment, Referral, Advice and Throughcare Services—a low-level intervention that provides a gateway assessment, referral and support service to prisoners both within custody and upon their initial release.

The level of detail required about the court system is not collected centrally. However, the NEW-ADAM[2] research programme shows that 65 per cent. of arrestees tested positive for one or more illegal drug. 40 per cent. of arrestees reported a connection between their illegal drug use and offending behaviour—and, when those who had committed acquisitive crime were examined, this figure rose to 55 per cent.

Probation Service

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures his Department is taking to (a) increase employment to the Probation Service and (b) ensure that officers have the necessary qualifications, training and experience to manage their caseloads; and if he will make a statement. [98194]

Hilary Benn: Trainee Probation Officers are recruited across England and Wales. This is achieved by an annual recruitment drive and the number of trainee probation officers recruited by this method has increased from 254 in 1998 to 787 in 2002.

The 2003 recruitment drive will commence on 17 March and will be advertised in the national press. The target number is 1,100, distributed in proportion across the nine regions of England and Wales.

Trainee probation officers complete the Diploma in Probation Studies over a period of two years. This professional qualification combines work and university based learning.

Candidates must attain a Community Justice NVQ Level 4 and an undergraduate degree in order to become fully accredited probation officers. The programme is provided in partnership with universities, who work with Regional Training Consortia and the National Probation Directorate.

The programmes are provided in accordance with the Core Curriculum and Regulatory Framework, administered on behalf of the Home Secretary by the Community Justice National Training Organisation (CJNTO). These documents are reviewed at intervals to ensure that the curriculum is updated to address current best practice. The programmes are subject to regular inspections conducted jointly by the CJNTO and Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Probation (HMIP).

In addition, the Probation Service has increased the number of Probation Service Officers and other staff to 8,282 in 2002 from 6,612 in 1998.

Staff involved in the delivery of Accredited programmes are provided with appropriate training that is subject to rigorous quality assurance as determined by the Joint Accreditation Panel at the point of programme approval.

Probation areas provide this and other related training via local and regional training units.

Property Crime

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his estimate is of the proportion of property crime related to the need of the perpetrator to support illegal drug use in each of the last five years. [98174]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Recorded crime figures include statistics on drugs offences, such as possession, and on acquisitive crimes, such as burglary, but do not record whether the latter are related to an offender's drug habits.

However, the New English and Welsh Arrestee Drug Abuse Monitoring (NEW-ADAM) research programme, which involves interviewing and drug testing those arrested by the police, confirms a link between drug misuse and acquisitive crime, including property crimes. Analysis of the data from the first eight sites in the survey, collected during 1999–2000, shows that 65 per cent. of arrestees provided a urine sample that tested positive for one or more illegal drug. The analysis also shows that up to 29 per cent. of arrestees tested positive for opiates (including heroin) and/or cocaine (including crack).

As a guide to the proportion of crime that is drug-related, analysis of the NEW-ADAM self-report data indicates that while only 21 per cent. of non-drug using arrestees reported having previously offended in the past 12 months, this figure rises to 75 per cent. for those arrestees who use heroin and/or cocaine/crack. Moreover, while users of both heroin and cocaine/crack represented just under one-quarter of all arrestees interviewed, they were responsible for more than three-fifths of all the illegal income reported.

In support of this, 55 per cent. of arrestees who reported using one or more drugs in the last 12 months and committing one or more acquisitive crimes, acknowledged a link between their drug use and their offending behaviour. This proportion rose to 78 per cent. for arrestees who said they had used heroin and cocaine/crack.

Recidivism

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the relationship between Class A drug addiction and recidivism among criminal offenders. [98138]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Information is not available in the form requested. However, the New English and Welsh Arrestee Drug Abuse Monitoring research programme, which involves interviewing and drug testing those arrested by the police at 16 sites throughout England and Wales, currently provides estimates of repeat offending by drug misusing offenders. Repeat offending drug misusing offenders are defined as the proportion of arrestees who are using heroin and/or cocaine and/or crack at least once a week and who have offended at least twice a month in the last 12 months. Analysis of the data from the first eight sites in the survey, collected during 1999–2000, shows the proportion of arrestees falling within the definition of repeat offending drug misusing offenders category was 15 per cent.

Refuge Provision (Capital Funding)

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what revenue funding will be provided to match the capital funding for new refuge provision announced on 11 December 2002. [98010]

Mr. McNulty: I have been asked to reply.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister announced on 11 December 2002 that it was making available £7 million to the Housing Corporation to increase safe accommodation choices for women and children. This capital funding will be allocated to local authority areas where provision for victims of domestic violence is identified as an unmet need in a homelessness or Supporting People strategy. The Supporting People programme, which will go live on 1 April 2003, will provide revenue funding for housing related support services for vulnerable people, which may include support for victims of domestic violence. In addition, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will be making available £70 million in revenue support for local authorities and voluntary sector organisations in 2003–04 to support their work to tackle and prevent homelessness. These resources can be used to fund support services for victims of domestic violence if this is a priority within a local authority's homelessness strategy.

Terrorist Attacks

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures have been taken to ensure the integration of (a) planning and (b) communications between (i) the armed forces, (ii) the emergency services and (iii) volunteer organisations in the event of an NBC terrorist attack in the United Kingdom. [96254]

Mr. Blunkett: I chair three Cabinet Committees, which plan the prevention and response to terrorist attack. DOP(IT)(T) which oversees work to strengthen the United Kingdom's defence against terrorism; DOP(IT)(R) which works to build the United Kingdom's resilience and ability to manage the consequences of major emergencies; and the Civil Contingencies Committee which meets in times of crisis to manage the response. Key Government Departments and representatives of the relevant emergency services and agencies, attend these committees. The devolved Administrations are also involved in these committees. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety, was given the responsibility, on my behalf, for Chemical Biological Radiological and Nuclear (CBRN) co-ordination in 2001 and a dedicated team of officials at the Home Office supports him in this work.

The integration of volunteer organisations in response to civil emergencies of all kinds is co-ordinated through local authority emergency planning officers in accordance with the arrangements set out in the publication "Dealing with Disaster".

We are continually learning and developing the best way to protect the United Kingdom from terrorism and to manage the consequences of terrorism, in whatever form it comes. However the Government does not give detailed information on CBRN capabilities, as this information could be useful to terrorists.

Treatment Orders

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many treatment orders have been given to people with alcoholism in each of the last five years. [98175]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Powers to impose a drug and/or alcohol treatment requirement, as part of a community rehabilitation order or a community punishment and rehabilitation order, were contained in the Powers of Criminal Courts Act 1973, now the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000. However, statistics for this do not differentiate between alcohol and drugs.

The table gives figures for the numbers starting community rehabilitation orders and community punishment and rehabilitation orders that contain a drug and/or alcohol element for the years 1997 to 2001.

Persons starting probation service supervision by year: community rehabilitation orders[1] with drug/alcohol treatment imposed under the Powers of Criminal Courts Act 2000[2], in England and Wales 1997 to 2001[3]

	1997	1998	1999	2000	2001
Residential drugs/alcohol treatment	346	299	276	236	192
Non-residential drugs/alcohol treatment	1,039	1,394	1,590	1,795	1,133
Drugs/alcohol treatment by/under qualified medical person	631	843	1,131	1,101	793
Total drug/alcohol treatment	2,016	2,536	2,997	3,132	2,118

[1] Community rehabilitation order is the new name for a probation order under the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000.

[2] For 1997 to 2000 this was under the Powers of Criminal Courts Act 1973.

[3] In compiling probation statistics, each person is counted only once in the total even if several types of additional requirement started in the year. For this reason, the figures quoted above may slightly undercount those undergoing alcohol/drugs treatment.

Note:

1. From October 2000, when the Drug Treatment and Testing Order was rolled-out to courts in England and Wales, the power to attach a drug treatment requirement to a community rehabilitation order or community rehabilitation and punishment order was removed. This explains the lower total figures for drug/alcohol treatment requirements in 2001.

2. It should be noted that these figures represent those starting orders in the respective years, rather than orders made by the courts in each of these years.

Vulnerable Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women are being held in vulnerable prisoner units in prisons in England and Wales. [96246]

Hilary Benn: The number of male prisoners being held in vulnerable prisoner units in prisons in England and Wales was about 3,800 on 31 December 2002. There are no vulnerable prisoner units for women because the number of female prisoners requiring the specialist facilities that such units would provide is minimal and Governors will make specific arrangements for individuals locally.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

Equal Pay

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister for Women if she will make a statement on the pay gap between women and men. [97717]

Ms Hewitt: The pay gap between women and men currently stands at 19 per cent., down from 30 per cent. in 1975 when the Equal Pay Act came into force. The Government are taking action to tackle the complex underlying factors behind the pay gap, including promoting voluntary pay reviews and good practice on equal pay through the Fair Pay Champions and Castle Awards. Denise Kingsmill is chairing a task force "Accounting for People" which is considering human capital reporting by companies and is likely to have significant implications for women in the workplace. The Employment Act 2002 introduces measures to help parents maintain links with the world of work and better balance their work and home lives. These will help women return to the labour market and have a positive impact on the pay gap. The Act also introduces an equal pay questionnaire that will make it easier to tackle pay discrimination in the workplace. All Government Departments are committed to carrying out a pay review by April 2003.

Equal Opportunities

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister for Women what measures she intends to take to encourage the promotion of women into (a) the board of FTSE 100 companies and (b) senior positions in trade unions; and if she will make a statement. [98059]

Ms Hewitt: I have welcomed Derek Higgs' proposals on how to widen the pool from which non-executive directors are drawn, which could bring more women into the boardroom. Derek Higgs made proposals for a more rigorous, fair and open appointment process. Subject to consultation on the detailed wording, the Financial Reporting Council intends to put the changes to the Combined Code into effect on 1 July. A small group of business leaders and others, led by Professor Laura Tyson of the London Business School, is also being set up to bring to greater prominence candidates, including women, from the non-commercial sector.

The Women and Equality Unit and TUC held a joint event in November 2002 which aimed at encouraging trade union women to apply for public appointments. This was part of a wider strategy to encourage women to see that they have the skills and confidence necessary to apply for senior positions in public life more generally, including within their own unions.

I welcome the appointment in January of Frances O'Grady to the position of Deputy General Secretary of the TUC—the first time that a woman has been appointed to this position; and the appointment of Kay Carberry as Assistant General Secretary of the TUC, again the first time a woman has been appointed to this position.

PRIME MINISTER

Terrorism

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Prime Minister whether he has authorised military aid to the Civil Power in relation to the current terrorist threat to the UK. [98691]

The Prime Minister: Following a request from the police, the Government recently authorised a military deployment around Heathrow under the arrangements for providing military aid to the Civil Power. These arrangements have been used on many occasions in the past and will be used again in the future, whenever necessary, to ensure the security of the United Kingdom and its people.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Arms Exports

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of the annual level of export credits for UK arms sales, in each year from 1990–91 to 2002–03; and if she will make a statement. [96816]

Ms Hewitt: ECGD guarantees in support of exports of defence equipment and services have been provided for the following amounts:—

Year	£ million
1990–91	778
1991–92	534
1992–93	1918

Year	£ million
1993–94	2112
1994–95	756
1995–96	893
1996–97	394

Auditor Liabilities

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether she has plans to cap auditor liabilities. [99090]

Ms Hewitt: The Government are considering proposals on auditor liability in the Company Law Review and will consult on its own detailed proposals in due course.

Burma

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) which British companies have investments in Burma; [97221]

(2) what the value of UK investment in Burma, including transfers via dependent territories, was in each of the past two financial years. [97219]

Ms Hewitt: HMG has no reliable annual figures on the level of investment from the UK and the dependent territories to Burma. Burmese statistics, which are often inaccurate, suggest total accumulated British investment of about US$1440 million. The most significant British investments are believed to be Premier Oil's, which are currently in the process of being sold, and those of British American Tobacco. We believe that some of the investment identified as being British is actually foreign investment that has been channelled through dependent territories.

Coal Industry

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the results of the consultation on investment for the coal industry. [98638]

Mr. Wilson: I intend to publish shortly a formal response to the consultation on the case for investment aid to the coal industry.

An outline framework for an investment aid scheme was submitted to the European Commission on 19 December 2002. But a number of important details remain to be finalised, and these are now being worked on in the light of the commitments set out in the Energy Policy White Paper Cm 5761, published on 24 February 2003.

Electricity

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes in unit payments for electricity have resulted from the switch by her Department to purchasing renewable energy which is exempt from the Climate Change Levy. [96485]

Ms Hewitt: The actual average price of electricity purchased during 2001–02 was 4.6438 p/KWh compared to the normal price of 4.5978 p/KWh. This is equivalent to an increase of 1 per cent. in the average price paid.

Entertainment

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of the total spending of her Department on entertainment in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and if she will make a statement. [92398]

Ms Hewitt: The Department of Trade and Industry's total spending on entertainment was as follows;

£ 000's

Year	Numbers
1998–99	704
1999–2000	887
2000–01	1,089
2001–02	1,165
2002–03	1,193[1]

[1] Estimate

As a result of the implementation of a new accounting system and several Machinery of Government changes, comparable figures are not available prior to 1998–99. This expenditure was incurred primarily in the promotion of British Trade, Science and Innovation, UK Business and Energy.

Fur (Labelling)

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent research her Department has (a) undertaken and (b) begun to undertake to assess the amount of fur derived from domestic animals labelled in a misleading manner for sale to the public; and if she will make a statement. [98183]

Ms Hewitt: The DTI has received professional advice from LGC Ltd. on the possibilities for undertaking DNA testing of products on sale in the UK that are alleged to contain fur of domestic animals. The advice stated that it had not yet been possible to identify a testing method that could reliably determine the specific type of fur that a product contains—i.e. whether such fur has come from a domestic animal or otherwise. I am placing copies of this advice in the Library of the House. We have asked LGC Ltd. to advise us further on the viability and costs of developing such a testing method.

We are also in discussions with other Governments who are seeking to undertake the same type of testing, to understand the approach they have taken to this problem.

There are no regulations in place requiring fur from domestic animals to be labelled as such. Where manufacturers choose to label their products, they must provide accurate information and action can be taken to prevent misleading labelling under the Trade Descriptions Act.

However, since it is not currently possible to identify products containing specifically domestic animal furs (as explained above), it is also not possible to determine when products have been mislabelled. The Government are working hard to overcome these problems to be able to determine levels of imports of these products, and to identify any labelling problems that may exist.

Grant Allocations

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many solar installations have been completed as a result of the grants made available by her Department; what has been the average cost of these installations to (a) her Department and (b) the recipient of the grant; and what carbon dioxide savings are expected as a result of these installations. [98669]

Mr. Wilson: By grants for solar installations we assume it is meant the £20 million First Phase of the Major Photovoltaics Demonstration Programme, which was launched by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 26 March 2002.

Under Stream 1 of the programme (small individual systems up to 5kWp), 171 applications had been received by the middle of February 2003, of which 45 had been completed. The average cost of these installations to both Government and the recipient is £7,241, as the grants cover 50 per cent. of total costs. Most of the recipients are private homeowners, but there are also a few small businesses, schools and community groups. For the 45 completed installations (average 2kWp), total carbon dioxide savings are expected to be in the region of 29,000 kg a year.

Under Stream 2 (medium and large-scale installations from 5 to 100kWp), 90 applications have been made, half of which have been supported, but none have so far been completed.

IT Contracts

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list IT contracts in her Department above £50 million in each of the last 10 years; what the inception date for each system was; when it became fully functional; when it became fully debugged; and what the cost of over-runs has been. [98999]

Ms Hewitt: The core Department has let one IT contract with a lifetime value of more than 50 million in the last 10 years. This is the ELGAR PFI contract for the provision of IT desktop, application support and development, and business re-engineering services.

The contract was awarded on 27 November 1998 and the initial service became operational on 31 March 1999, as planned. System Acceptance testing of the new desk top service was completed on 30 November 1999, and the system became fully functional on 31 March 2000. Following user acceptance testing, the system was accepted by the Department and the system was fully debugged by 15 July 2000.

There were no additional costs to the Department for over-runs on this migration.

Redundancy

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the remedies to UK employees of multinationals who have been made redundant without the required (a) process of consultation, (b) notice, (c) definition of the criteria for selection for redundancy and (d) evidence that the post has become surplus to requirements. [98251]

Alan Johnson [holding answer 24 February 2003]: There is legislation in place to protect employees if they are affected by redundancy. Employees can seek redress through the employment tribunals or, in some cases, the civil courts.

(a) Consultation—Employers in the UK are under a statutory obligation to inform and consult employee representatives about proposed collective redundancies—that is, where they propose to make 20 or more redundancies at one establishment within a 90 day period. The consultation must be conducted in good faith, and must cover ways of avoiding the redundancies, or of reducing their numbers or mitigating their effects. Employee representatives may complain to an employment tribunal where they consider these obligations have not been fulfilled. The tribunal can make a protective award of up to 90 days' pay to each affected employee.

(b) Notice—depending on length of service both the employer and the employee are entitled to a minimum period of notice. Under the legislation this varies depending on how long the employee has been employed, from one week where he/she has been continuously employed for one month or more but less than two years, up to twelve weeks where continuously employed for 12 years or more. An individual employment contract may specify a longer period of notice. Employees who consider that they have incurred loss because they have not been given the minimum notice to which they are entitled under the legislation or under their contracts of employment, can bring actions for damages in the civil courts, or (if the employment has ended) in the employment tribunals.

(c) Criteria for selection— In, a collective redundancy case, the employer must disclose to employee representatives certain information in writing including the proposed method of selecting the employees who may be dismissed. Failure to do so is again enforceable through an employment tribunal.

(d) Redundancy is in principle, a fair reason for dismissal. However, subject to meeting the qualifying conditions, employees can complain of unfair dismissal through an employment tribunal if they believe that they have been unfairly selected for redundancy, that the employer otherwise acted unreasonably in dismissing them or that redundancy was not in fact the genuine reason for dismissal. The remedies available in a case where a tribunal finds in the employee's favour are reinstatement or re-engagement or a monetary award of compensation.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on her assessment of the relative susceptibility to being made redundant of employees of multinationals operating within the EU of (a) British, (b) Dutch, (c) French and (d) other EU companies. [98252]

Alan Johnson: [holding answer 24 February 2003]: Job losses due to restructuring or plant closure are reported all over Europe and recent examples of this include Dresdner Bank, Siemens and Mobilcom in Germany, HP-Compaq and Bull in France, Lucent Technologies in the Netherlands, Fiat in Italy, Alcatel in Belgium, and Santander in Spain. In some cases these job losses are part of European or global restructuring programmes, for example, Alcatel, Ericsson and Nokia. UK firms, like those on the Continent, are subject to legislation implementing the EC Directive on Collective Redundancies designed to protect employees affected by redundancies. This requires consultation of employee representatives before collective redundancies can be made. Consultation must be undertaken in good faith with a view to reaching agreement, and must include ways of avoiding the dismissals, reducing the number of employees to be dismissed, and mitigating the consequences of the dismissals. The detailed rules vary from country to country, for example, some EU countries have more lengthy consultation periods than others. The law in the UK provides greater protection in certain respects than that in other Member States. For example, Finland, Germany, the Netherlands and Sweden do not, unlike the UK, have a statutory requirement for severance pay. And UK law treats workers more equally in the event of redundancy than workers in Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Italy and Luxembourg where blue-collar workers receive lower levels of protection than white-collar workers. The system in the UK is relatively transparent and the costs involved for employers and the length of the process are predictable, unlike in many other EU countries. The Government believes that firms should not face excessive barriers to making redundancies that add to the uncertainty and time involved in what is a painful process. To do so could deter investment, and result in fewer jobs overall, not more.

Official Visits

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what official visits (a) the Minister for Science and (b) the Chief Scientific Adviser to the Government have made in each of the last three years in their scientific role. [98966]

Ms Hewitt: My noble Friend the Minister for Science and Innovation and the Chief Scientific Advisor to the Prime Minister have both undertaken a large number of visits to companies, universities and organisations in this country and overseas.

The overwhelming majority of these have been in their respective scientific capacities.

Recruitment Consultants

Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the other appointments the recruitment consultants used in the appointment of the Director General of Ofgen have advised her on; and if she will make a statement. [86203]

Mr. Wilson: Price WaterhouseCoopers were one of the firms of recruitment consultants retained by the Department on call-off contracts in 1998, and assisted in this particular recruitment. No central records are held on other appointments on which the firm may have assisted.

Royal Mail Investigation Branch

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the future of the powers of entry, search and arrest employed by the investigation branch of the Royal Mail. [97787]

Mr. Timms: Responsibility for enforcement policy for criminal offences under the Postal Services Act 2000 (the Act) is a matter for the Postal Services Commission (PostComm) who on 10 January 2003 published a decision document and statement of policy on these matters. Under the terms of its policy PostComm would look to Royal Mail to take the necessary enforcement action where offences are committed in relation to its postal services under Sections 83–88 of the Act.

Royal Mail is recognised by the Home Office as a non-police law enforcement body. They have no special powers to enter or search premises. Royal Mail investigators will only enter and search with the consent of the appropriate parties. Royal Mail investigators have the powers of arrest of a citizen as outlined in S24 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984; they have no enhanced rights to effect an arrest.

Royal Mail Group plc has no plans to seek any changes to the existing powers that apply to its investigators.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Middle East

11. Claire Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the peace negotiations between Israel and Palestine. [98792]

Mr. Straw: A settlement of the dispute between the Israelis and the Palestinians would, we believe, enhance global security, including the security of both the immediate region and the United Kingdom. This is why the Prime Minister has led the way, through political and practical support for the Quartet, in working for renewed negotiation towards the realisation through the roadmap towards President Bush's vision of a two state solution in 2005.

20. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the United States Government on establishing a Palestinian state; and if he will make a statement. [98802]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The establishment of a Palestinian state alongside Israel is at the heart of President Bush's vision of a final settlement, as set out in his speech of 24 June 2002. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary, FCO officials and I are in constant touch with US colleagues on how to realise that vision. We agree with them that the Quartet and its road map provide the right mechanism, and have given both our full support.

23. Martin Linton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will table a resolution under chapter VII of the United Nations charter to impose a duty on Israel to halt and withdraw illegal settlements in the occupied territories. [98805]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have no plans to table a UN Resolution on Israeli settlements in the occupied territories. Security Council Resolutions 446 and 465 state that they are illegal. The Government have made it clear that an early settlement freeze is essential to the continuing viability of the two-state solution.

Our priority for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict must be the implementation of those Security Council Resolutions already passed; most recently, Resolution 1435, which calls for a complete cessation of violence, withdrawal of Israeli forces from Palestinian cities and action by the Palestinian Authority to bring those responsible for acts of terror to justice. The UK played a leading role in the adoption of this resolution. We remain committed to further Security Council action, wherever this will be useful.

Mr. Best: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's activities in seeking a Middle East peace settlement. [98414]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We fully support the efforts of the Quartet to restart a peace process leading via the Roadmap it agreed on 20 December to a realisation in 2005 of President Bush's vision of a two-state solution. That support is both political and practical. We convened the London meeting on Palestinian reform and nation-building in January; it was a British initiative during the hiatus in Quartet activity caused by the Israeli election campaign. From 18–20 February we hosted meetings of the Ad-Hoc Liaison Committee and Task Force on Reform. We remain ready to do all we can to underpin and complement Quartet activity.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the prospects for a peace settlement between Israel and the Palestinians. [98798]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary gave earlier in the House today to the hon. Member for North Wiltshire.

Syria (Kidnapped Israeli Soldiers)

14. Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with President Assad of Syria regarding kidnapped Israeli soldiers. [98795]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I raised this issue with the Syrian Foreign Minister during the Syrian President's official visit to the UK on 16 to 18 December 2002.

Iraq

15. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Iraq. [98796]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given earlier in the House today by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary to the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake).

Zimbabwe

16. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of South Africa on the search for a peaceful settlement to the Zimbabwe crisis. [98797]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have regular contact with the South African Government and have shared with them our view of the problems in Zimbabwe. We have stressed our deep concern about the humanitarian situation. We have made our position clear: we want a return to good governance, respect for human rights and the rule of law. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister last discussed Zimbabwe with President Mbeki at Chequers on 1 February 2003.

Cyprus

17. Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the Annan plan for Cyprus. [98799]

Mr. MacShane: My hon. Friend's timely question enables me to commend to the House this morning's written statement on Cyprus by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. He praised the UN Secretary-General's skilful moves to bring the Cyprus peace process to a head, and explained what Britain is doing to help the UN bring the parties to agreement. A copy of this written statement was placed in the Library of the House on 25 February 2003.

22. Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent steps he has taken to promote a settlement in Cyprus. [98804]

Mr. MacShane: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today in the House to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore).

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what funding his Department makes available for projects that involve members of the (a) Greek and (b) Turkish communities in Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [98093]

Mr. MacShane: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office provides and administers two funds which finance projects in Cyprus.

In recent years, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's EU Action Plan, with a budget of £100,000 per annum has been used to finance projects such as EU accession seminars and training courses, for both the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities. These projects have been run in conjunction with the British Council and have been very successful.

Each year a portion of the Global Conflict Prevention Fund has also been allocated to fund projects such as training courses in both the north and the south of the island.

The British High Commission in Nicosia has made a significant contribution to bringing Cypriots of both communities together in a number of bi-communal projects.

European Security and Defence Policy

18. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met his French and German counterparts to discuss EU foreign and security policy. [98800]

Mr. MacShane: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary most recently met his French and German counterparts to discuss EU Common Foreign and Security Policy on 17 February 2003.

19. Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of the European Security and Defence Policy. [98801]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The comprehensive agreement between NATO and the EU, reached in December 2002, ensures that the European Security and Defence Policy of the EU will be based on close co-operation with NATO. The Government welcome this strategic partnership in crisis management. The EU and NATO are now finalising the detailed arrangements to give effect to this agreement. The EU has already expressed its willingness to take over from NATO the stabilisation mission in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

Iran (Human Rights)

21. Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to raise the issue of human rights with his Iranian counterparts. [98803]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Her Majesty's Government have an ongoing dialogue with Iran on human rights. I and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary make a point of raising human rights whenever we see our Iranian counterparts and will continue to do so.

Asset Recycling Programme

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his latest estimate is of the proceeds to his Department from the asset re-cycling programme agreed with HM Treasury for the period 1999–2000 to 2001–02; and if he will make a statement. [illegible]8440]

Mr. Rammell: The FCO achieved £90 million from recycling in the financial years 1999–2000 to 2001–02.

Chemical Weapons Convention

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the prohibitions on the use of (a) riot control agents and (b) other disabling chemicals as a method of warfare contained in the Chemical Weapons Convention 1993 would apply to potential conflict in the Gulf. [98166]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: All States Parties to the Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC) have undertaken not to use any toxic chemical or its precursor, including riot control agents (RCAs), as a method of warfare. This applies in any armed conflict. RCAs are defined in the CWC as any chemical not listed in a Schedule which can produce rapidly in humans sensory irritation or disabling physical effects which disappear within a short time following termination of exposure. (A chemical listed in a Schedule is one identified for the application of verification measures under the CWC.)

Davinderpal Singh Bhullar

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of representations to the Indian Government in the case of Professor Davinderpal Singh Bhullar. [98452]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have made no specific representations to the Government of India over the case of Professor Davinderpal Singh Bhullar. In conjunction with the EU, we have demarched India about their use of the death penalty most recently in June 2001. We continue to follow Professor Bhullar's case closely, and are in discussions with EU partners over possible courses of action to take. Foreign Office officials met Professor Bhullar's wife on 12 February to discuss the case.

Defence Exports (India)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes he has made to guidance on export licensing, with particular reference to sales of defence equipment and technology to India, following the India-Iran defence cooperation agreement signed on 19th January. [99076]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: There has been no change to the Government's policy for considering arms export licence applications for India in light of any defence cooperation between India and Iran. We continue to consider all applications on a case-by-case basis against the Consolidated EU and National Arms Export Licensing Criteria and the prevailing situation. All export licences will continue to be issued subject to the condition that the stated end-user will not re-export the equipment to a third country or end-user outside the terms of the licence.

Departmental Consultations

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list consultations his Department has conducted since 1997; and when each consultation (a) opened and (b) closed. [97422]

Mr. Straw: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has conducted the following public consultations since 1997:

1. Panel 2000: Consultation Document. Presented to Parliament on 10 September 1998 and closed on 15 November 1998. The website address is

http://www.fco.gov.uk/Files/kfile/panel2000,0.pdf

2. International Criminal Court: Consultation on draft legislation. Presented to Parliament on 1 August 2000 and closed on 12 October 2000. The website address is http://www.fco.gov.uk/Files/kfile/icc.pdf

3. Private Military Companies: Options for Regulation. Presented to Parliament on 12 February 2002 and closed on 12 August 2002. The website address is:

http://www.fco.gov.uk/Files/kfile/mercenaries,0.pdf

4. Strengthening the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention: Countering the Threat from Biological Weapons. Presented to Parliament on 12 February 2002 and closed on 13 September 2002. The website address is:

http://www.fco.gov.uk/Eiles/kfile/btwc290402.pdf

Departmental Properties

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his latest estimate is of the (a) market value and (b) same use value of FCO-owned land and buildings; and if he will make a statement. [98377]

Mr. Rammell: The current Existing Use Value of the FCO estate at home and overseas is £1,026 million. The Open Market Value is £914 million.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his latest estimate is of the (a) same use value and (b) market value of the FCO properties at (i) Buenos Aires, Argentina, (ii) Bridgetown, Barbados, (iii) Santiago, Chile, (iv) Alexandria, Egypt, (v) Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, (vi) Helsinki, Finland, (vii) Bordeaux, France, (viii) Lyon, France, (ix) Marseilles, France, (x) Paris, France and (xi) Strasbourg, France; what plans he has to sell these properties; and if he will make a statement. [98381]

Mr. Rammell: The existing use values (EUV) and open market values (OMV) of FCO properties in the overseas posts in question is as follows:

FCO overseas properties: EUV and OMV

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him today, UIN 98441, for details of individual properties at these posts which are in the process of being sold, or which are currently being considered for sale.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his latest estimate is of the (a) same use value and (b) market value of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office properties at (i) Whitehall/King Charles Street, London, (ii) Hanslope Park, Milton Keynes, (iii) Old Admiralty Building, Whitehall, (iv) 1 Carlton Gardens, London and (v) Lancaster House, London; and what plans he has to sell these properties; and if he will make a statement. [98390]

Mr. Rammell: The existing use values (EUV) and realisable open market values (OMV) of the FCO properties in the home estate are as follows:

(a) London Main Building: EUV £50 million, OMV £50 million

(b) Hanslope Park: EUV £11.5 million, OMV £11.5 million

(c) Old Admiralty Building: EUV £25 million, OMV £25 million.

1 Carlton Gardens and Lancaster House are not owned by the FCO but leased from the Crown Estate.

The FCO has no plans to sell any of its properties in the home estate.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to sell FCO properties in (a) Hong Kong, (b) Singapore and (c) France; and if he will make a statement. [98439]

Mr. Rammell: We are currently selling two staff flats in Paris but have no properties on the market in Hong Kong or Singapore.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which FCO properties his Department is (a) contracted to sell and (b) trying to sell; what sales proceeds are expected in each year to 2005–06; and if he will make a statement. [98441]

Mr. Rammell: The FCO has currently outstanding instructions to proceed to the exchange of contracts for the sale of six properties overseas. We have also instructed agents to offer a further 23 properties for sale. I am withholding part of the information requested Under Exemption 13 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Third Party's Commercial Confidence), as valuations remain confidential until contracts are exchanged in order to maximise the return from sales.

The target for the Third Triennium (financial years 2003–04 to 2005–06) is for £100 million of gross sales. The amount realised in each of the three years will depend heavily on market conditions and changing operational requirements.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria are used to decide whether to possess an embassy or consular building in a particular (a) city and (b) country; and if he will make a statement. [98376]

Mr. Rammell: If accommodation is required in a particular city or country, the value for money offered by freehold purchase as opposed to leasing is assessed by comparing the costs and benefits of the two options using the techniques prescribed by the Treasury's guidance on appraisal and evaluation in Central Government (the "Green Book"). A decision to purchase a property freehold or long leasehold will also depend on whether the requirement is permanent, whether foreign governments are permitted to acquire such interests and whether, in practice, they are available on the market, and whether a purchase can be funded from the FCO's budget for capital investment.

In addition to using Treasury Appraisal techniques when deciding whether or not to purchase property freehold, the FCO monitors the value for money provided by its existing freehold and long leasehold estate using similar criteria to check that the retention of an owned property remains a better option than leasing.

EC Accession (Poetry on the Underground)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what funding he has made available to London Underground Limited to display multi-lingual poetry to mark the 30th anniversary of United Kingdom accession to the European Community. [98475]

Mr. MacShane: A total of £15,000 was made available to cover: design and production of nine different bilingual posters; 2,000 advertising spaces in carriages for a period of eight weeks, and the design and production of 5,000 booklets containing 25 poems representing all 15 member states.

E-mail Addresses

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by what e-mail address members of the public may contact (a) his and (b) each of the Ministers in his Department; and for each e-mail address if he will state (i) the date it became active, and (ii) the number of e-mails received in each month since activation. [97464]

Mr. Rammell: All FCO Ministers may be contacted via a feedback form on the FCO website, www.fco.gov.uk/feedback. This has been the case since 1997. We do not hold statistics for messages received via this means.

In addition, the Minister for Europe can be contacted on ministereurope@fco.gov.uk This address was activated in December 2000. Figures for E-mails received are:

December 2000: 8 to February 2002: 124
January 2001: 9 to March 2002: 100
February 2001: 11 to April 2002: 116
Mar 2001:40 to May 2002: 92
April 2001: 34 to June 2002: 63
May 2001: 6 to July 2002:91
June 2001: 3 to August 2002: 55
July 2001:5 to September 2002: 133
August 2001: to October 2002: 142
September 2001: 79 to November 2002:90
October 2001: 121 to December 2002: 56
November 2001: 193 to January 2003: 104
December 2001: 82 to February 2003: 72[1]
January 2002:82 to February 2003:72

European Constitution

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to ensure that a draft European constitution reflects Europe's religious heritage. [98042]

Mr. MacShane: The EU is a multicultural group of States with a large non-Christian population.Britain is itself a multi-cultural and multi-faith society. Any reference in the EU's constitutional Treaty would need to reflect this diversity, which is one of the greatest strengths of both Britain and the EU. That said, it is difficult to see what such a Treaty reference would add.

Article 10 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights already states that everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion.

Intergovernmental Conference

Stephen Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the Intergovernmental Conference on a Future Treaty of the EU to begin work; and if he will make a statement. [98068]

Mr. MacShane: The timing of the next Intergovernmental Conference has not yet been confirmed. The Convention on the Future of Europe is due to present its results at the June 2003 European Council.

Malcolm Rennie/Brian Peters

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) whether his Department has made recent representations to the Indonesian Government about the need to co-operate fully with UN officials in connection with the investigation into the deaths of the two British newsmen. [98872]

(2) when recently released representations were first made by Her Majesty's Government to the Indonesian authorities about the deaths of Brian Peters and Malcolm Rennie; and whether he will list those representations made before June 1996. [98870]

(3) when his Department was first informed of the circumstances in which the two British newsmen died in Indonesia. [98871]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We cannot provide details of what representations were made by HMG before June 1996 about the deaths of Brian Peters and Malcolm Rennie because of the disproportionate costs involved in researching the answer.

Our Embassy in Jakarta reported on 24 October 1975 that five journalists from Australia had been killed during an attack on Fretilin forces in Balibo on 16 October 2003, and that the Australian Embassy had confirmed that two of the journalists, Brian Peters and Malcolm Rennie, were British citizens.

On 30 August 2002, at the UK's instigation, the EU urged the Indonesian Attorney General to co-operate with the UN investigation into the death of Brian Peters and his colleagues. We will continue to raise this issue with the Indonesian authorities.

Online Sales/Purchases

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what (a) products, (b) goods and (c) services were (i) bought and (ii) sold online by his Department in each of the last five years. [97465]

Mr. Rammell: This information could only be provided at disproportionate cost. The amount of fully online purchasing is limited, but for example we do currently buy some books, publications and technical supplies by this route. More generally we have increased the amount of business that is carried out in part by "e-procurement" methods and this will be further expanded when the FCO's new financial management system comes into operation later this year.

Overseas Students

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many overseas students were awarded FCO scholarships in each of the last five years; what their country of origin was; what the total cost was of the scheme for each year; and if he will make a statement. [98437]

Mr. MacShane: In 1998–99 2,196 overseas students were awarded FCO scholarships, at a cost of £39 million. In 1999–2000 2,300 scholarships were awarded at a cost of £40 million. In 2000–01 2,470 scholarships were awarded at a cost of £45 million. In 2001–02 2,510 scholarships were awarded at a cost of £46 million. In 2002–03 we expect to award 2,574 scholarships at a cost of £47 million.

These figures include scholars studying in the UK under the Chevening programme, the Commonwealth Scholarships and Fellowships Plan, the Marshall scholarships and Atlantic Fellowships. The cost includes contributions from the FCO, other Whitehall Departments and devolved Administrations, the private sector, and the higher education institutions.

The scholars came from more than 150 countries, territories and regions. I will write to the hon. Member, with further information.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his Department's policy toward awarding scholarships to overseas students. [98438]

Mr. MacShane: The FCO scholarships programme consists of Chevening scholarships, a contribution to the Commonwealth Scholarships and Fellowships Plan, and Marshall scholarships and Atlantic Fellowships for US citizens. The FCO believes it is in the UK's interest to attract top graduates and young professionals from overseas to study in this country. These individuals will go on to be tomorrow's leaders, opinion formers and decision makers in their own countries.

The FCO is working with other Whitehall Departments and the Devolved Administrations, the private sector, and UK Higher Education Institutions to increase the number of Chevening scholarships as part of the Prime Minister's Initiative to increase the number of overseas students studying in the UK.

Palestine (EU Aid)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the European Commission regarding allegations of EU aid to Palestinian territories being directed into funding terrorist activities; and if he will make a statement. [98035]

Mr. MacShane: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the to the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) on 11 February 2003, Official Report, column 726W. The European Commission took part in the London meeting on Palestinian reform on 14

January 2003 where issues of financial management were discussed. The European Commissioner for External Relations, Chris Patten, has welcomed the decision of the European Anti-Fraud Office OLAF on 5 February 2003 to investigate allegations of misuse of funds donated by the EU in the context of EU budgetary support to the Palestinian Authority.

UK Companies (Competitiveness)

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his estimate is of the expenditure of his Department, in enhancing the competitiveness of UK companies abroad in the latest year for which information is available; what contribution to this spending was made by the companies which benefited; and if he will make a statement. [98434]

Mr. Rammell: Enhanced competitiveness of companies in the UK through overseas sales and investment is the objective of Trade Partners UK (TPUK), which is part of British Trade International. The latest available figures for TPUK funding are set out in the table.

Budget	£ million 2001–02 TPUK Outturn
Programme
Expenditure	61
Income	-2
Administration costs
DTI	28
FCO[1]	136
Capital
DTI	5
FCO	1

[1] FCO administration costs are shown for the whole of BTI. The figure cannot be broken down between TPUK and Invest UK funding.

Note:

FCO admin spend for 2001–02 represents the net operating costs as set out in the FCO Expenditure Allocation Report 2001–02.

Vehicle Fleets

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the annual rate is at which his Department and its agencies renew their vehicle fleets, by (a) volume and percentage for each category of vehicle, (b) type of power unit and (c) type of fuel; and what progress has been made on the replacement of vehicles on a lower emissions basis in the last three years. [96558]

Mr. Rammell: Reducing vehicle emissions is a key transport issue, which has been agreed as a priority across Government. Against a baseline year of 2002/03, all Departments are aiming by 31 March 2006 to reduce road transport vehicle carbon dioxide emissions by at least 10 per cent. and requiring at least 10 per cent. of all fleet cars to be alternatively fuelled. Progress against these targets will be reported in "Sustainable Development in Government" annual reports. The first full report against the Framework will be in 2003, reporting against the baseline year of 2002–03.

In UK the FCO has a rolling replacement programme to renew its fleet vehicles. Details are shown in the following table:

Category of vehicle	Number of vehicles	Percentages replaced on an annual basis	Petrol	Diesel	LPG/Electric
Cars	16	12	5	6	5-LPG
Light Goods Vans	14	15	—	13	1-electric
Minibuses	4	25	—	3	1-LPG
Heavy Goods Vehicles	5	Replaced between 5–7 years	—	5	—

All UK fleet vehicles meet current government targets for emission levels. 18 per cent. of our fleet is LPG/Electric. Alternative fuel and improved emission levels are always a factor in decisions on the purchase of new vehicles.

There is no standard replacement period for vehicles held by FCO's overseas posts. The timing depends on local circumstances and conditions including the availability of adequate maintenance facilities. The type of fuel used by the fleet of some 1400 vehicles is split between petrol (60 per cent.) and diesel (40 per cent.). Around 35 cent. of the fleet is purchased in the UK and good environmental performance was one of the criteria used to decide the award of the relevant contracts. Consequently vehicles supplied under these arrangements meet current government targets on emission levels.

Our Agency, the Wilton Park Conference Centre, has three vehicles (two diesel and one petrol). Given the size of the fleet there is no formal replacement programme. Alternative fuel and lower emission options will be considered in future purchases.

Venezuela

Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action his Department is taking to promote political stability in Venezuela. [98781]

Mr. MacShane: We are in regular and extensive contacts with the Venezuelan Government and opposition, with EU partners and members of the Group of Friends supporting the OAS facilitation efforts, we have stressed the importance of respect for the constitution and for democratic principles.

Visa Fees

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his policy is on the real level of UK visa fees; and if he will make a statement. [98430]

Mr. Rammell: It has been the policy of successive Administrations that visa fees be set at a level to ensure that the full cost of providing the entry clearance service worldwide is met from fee income and that the UK taxpayer does not have to meet any of the costs. This continues to be our aim. There is also a Service Delivery Agreement (SDA) with the Treasury that there will be no increase in the real level of fees against a baseline set in 1997. The increase in fees made in July 2002 kept us within this SDA target.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much money was collected in visa fees for the latest year for which information is available; and if he will make a statement. [98473]

Mr. Rammell: Income from visa fees in financial year 2001–02 amounted to £77,403,853.

DEFENCE

Anti-rabies Tests

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason Dundrennan Range was selected as the base range for anti-rabies tests; what statutory agencies were consulted over the testing; what plans there are for further such testing; and if he will make a statement on anti-rabies testing at Dundrennan Range. [88643]

Mr. Morley: I have been asked to reply.

The trial was authorised by Defra Ministers and the Central Science Laboratory obtained licences from the Home Office for working with foxes; from the Advisory Committee on Pesticides (ACP) for the use of the experimental poison (T3327) and from Scottish Natural Heritage (SNH) to use means to reduce the risks to resident badgers on the study area. With agreement of MOD, the trial took place at a military training site with very restricted access to the public in Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland. Local residents with access rights to the site, and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds (RSPB), were informed of the trial, which was carried out between 27 August and 15 September 2002. The poison baits were laid on 4 September and picked up on 7 September. The trial was successful in obtaining data required and there are no plans to repeat such a trial.

Biological/Chemical Weapons

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his policy is on the use by HM armed forces of biological and chemical weapons in future conflicts. [98837]

Mr. Hoon: The United Kingdom gave up its offensive biological and chemical weapons capabilities in the 1950s. As a state party of both the Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC) and the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention (BTWC), the United Kingdom has renounced the use of such weapons.

We have played a leading role in the negotiations both of the BTWC of 1975, for which we are a depository Government, and the CWC which entered into force in 1997. We are fully compliant with our obligations under both conventions and continue to press for their full and effective implementation. The Government's policy is to work toward universal adoption of the CWC and BTWC and universal compliance with their obligations. The strength of our political commitment to both conventions is second to none.

Bullying (Bovington Camp)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recommendations have been made to improve protection against bullying at Bovington Camp, Dorset since October 2002; and what compensation has been paid to victims. [97832]

Dr. Moonie: So far as I am aware, no recommendations have been made to improve protection against bullying at Bovington Camp, Dorset since October 2002. It is standard practice for each new intake of recruits to be briefed personally by the Commanding Officer within 24 hours of arriving at Bovington on the Army's anti-bullying policy, outlining complaints procedures and welfare support. In addition, on arrival all military instructors must be fully conversant with the Army's zero tolerance stance on bullying and educated to spot the signs of any such behaviour. The Army's policy on harassment or bullying is clear: all incidents and allegations are taken extremely seriously and a thorough investigation is carried out in response to all formal complaints. Furthermore, appropriate action is taken against any individual(s) found guilty of practising or condoning such behaviour.

Information about compensation paid by the Ministry of Defence could lead to the identification of specific individuals. Accordingly, for reasons of confidentiality and the provisions of the Data Protection Act, it is not Ministry of Defence policy to release such information without the consent of the individuals involved.

Crichel Down Rules

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many times in each of the last 10 years the Crichel Down rules were applied by the Ministry of Defence; when the last occasion was; and in how many cases in each of the last 10 years MOD land subject to the rules reverted to the original owners. [98853]

Dr. Moonie: Information concerning the number of cases over the last 10 years where land reverted to the original owners is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The most recent case where the rules were found to apply was to agricultural land at Wroughton and the sale to the former owner completed on 27 January 2003.

The Ministry of Defence considers the application of the Crichel Down rules for all surplus sites as part of the disposal process. Where it is found that the rules apply, the site is offered back to the former owner at current market value. The land is not offered back to the former owner where, for instance, the use of the land has materially changed or where there are several former owners and a fragmented sale would realise less than a sale of the whole.

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will decide on the application of Crichel Down rules with respect to land which previously formed part of Marlborough at Falmouth, Cornwall and is now known as Swanvale OPA, Navy No. 2 site; and if he will make a statement. [98854]

Dr. Moonie: I currently expect that in April the Ministry of Defence will be in a position to write to those parties that have expressed a Former Owner interest, advising them of the application of the Crichel Down rules in this case.

Defence Estates, an agency of the Ministry of Defence, are responsible for the disposal of the former Oil Fuel Depot (OFD) at Swanvale, Falmouth. They have instructed consultants, Drivers Jonas, to investigate the application of the Crichel Down rules to OFD Swanvale, and prepare a report. DE anticipate that the final Drivers Jonas report will be received in March, after which it will be necessary to take further legal advice before writing to interested parties.

Daedalus Site

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department had for the Daedalus site at Lee-on-the-Solent in (a) 1990, (b) 1995, (c) 2000 and (d) January 2003; and when the plans changed in each case. [99012]

Dr. Moonie: In 1990 HMS Daedalus, an operational Fleet Air Station, had been identified for closure as part of the Royal Navy's rationalisation of its fixed wing flying capability.

In 1995 the site was in the process of rundown prior to closure, and early disposal planning work had commenced, involving complex legal and planning issues. A development strategy was agreed with the two local planning authorities

By 2000 the marketing of the site had commenced, but additional planning and other issues delayed marketing. Against that background, and following the publication of "In Trust and On Trust: A Strategy for the Defence Estate" in June2000, a review of all Ministry of Defence establishments commenced. In July 2001, it was confirmed that the site had potential for future MOD re-use and investment. Part of the site has since been included within a private finance iInitiative to provide MOD service family married quarters. In January 2003 it was recognised that some peripheral parts of the site might be capable of disposal without detriment to potential re-use of the remaining core site by MOD The master planning and marketing strategies to implement this were under consideration prior to the approach by the Home Office on 11 February. Tuesday 25 February 2003.

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has to construct housing for MOD personnel at the Daedalus site. [99013]

Dr. Moonie: The Defence Housing Executive, an Agency of the Ministry of Defence, is inviting PFI bidders to tender for the build of 148 houses in the Gosport area, to meet the needs of Service families. Part of the Daedalus site, sufficient to build these houses, will be offered to bidders. Planning permission has however been sought for up to 300 houses in case a further development for Service family occupation is needed at a later date.

Frigate Decommissioning

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which (a) Type 42 destroyers and (b) Type 23 frigates are to be considered for removal from the fleet. [98233]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answers my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence gave on 30 April 2002, Official Report, column 745W to the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) and on 7 November 2002, Official Report, column 458W to the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth).

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been an acceleration since the completion of the Strategic Defence Review in the rate at which Type 42 destroyers are expected to be paid off. [98243]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 7 November 2002, Official Report, column 457W, to the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth). The Strategic Defence Review envisaged the progressive replacement of the capability provided by the Type 42 destroyer with a new vessel. The Type 45 destroyer is planned to come into service from 2007. On this basis, there has been no advancement of the Type 42 destroyers' expected pay off dates since the completion of the SDR.

Gulf Forces

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether (a) mail, (b) E-blueys, (c) private telephone calls up to 20 minutes per week, (d) E-mail, (e) newspapers, (f) library services, (g) BFBS, (h) combined services entertainment, (i) Expeditionary Forces Institute, (j) operational fitness equipment, (k) rest and recuperation and (l) free laundry are available to all members of all forces deployed to the Gulf; and if he will make a statement. [95907]

Mr. Ingram (holding answer Monday 17 February 2003: All elements of the Operational Welfare Package (OWP) listed are provided to all United Kingdom military personnel already deployed to the Gulf in support of Operations Resinate and Oracle. We are building up the OWP as quickly as possible for UK military personnel deploying overseas in preparation for possible operations against Iraq.

HMS Sultan

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans the MOD has to develop the use of HMS Sultan. [98625]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the written ministerial statement given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 25 November 2002, Official Report, column 1–2WS. HMS Sultan was identified by the Defence Training Review as a potential location for the proposed Electro-Mechanical Engineering Defence Training Establishment. A final decision on the future utilisation of HMS Sultan will be made in the light of the options currently being studied in conjunction with industry.

Imams

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Imams are attached to the three services. [98847]

Dr. Moonie: There are currently no Imams attached to the Naval Service, Army or RAF. This is due to the relatively small number of Muslims serving in the armed forces. However, the armed forces have a representative-Religious Adviser from each of the major world religions, including Islam, and are working with the Religious Advisers and the nationally recognised Inter Faith Network to establish a network of local religious contacts for service personnel from those faiths.

Iraq

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contingency plans he has to limit the damage to Iraq's power supply in the event of war. [97482]

Mr. Hoon: Any military action would be in conformity with international law, including the UN Charter and international humanitarian law. In all our military planning, very careful attention is applied to minimising the risk of damage to civilian infrastructure. I am withholding further information under Exemption 1 (Defence, Security and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment has been made of the feasibility of establishing safe havens in Iraq in the event of war. [97485]

Mr. Hoon: In the event of any military operation, we would take very seriously our obligations to the civilian population of Iraq and our contingency planning takes this into account.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contingency plans have been made for (a) civilian casualties and (b) humanitarian operations in the event of military action in Iraq; what role British forces will play in such operations; whether he has issued formal guidance on (a) and (b); and if he will make a statement. [97772]

Dr. Moonie: Unlike Saddam Hussein, the United Kingdom takes very seriously its current and potential responsibilities towards the Iraqi people. In the event of conflict, United Kingdom forces will take the utmost care to minimise the risk to the civilian population through the careful choice of targets and the selection of weapons appropriate to those targets.

Although it is to be hoped that Iraq may yet choose to comply fully with UNSCR 1441, detailed contingency planning is underway to take into account the humanitarian consequences of any potential conflict. Formal guidance will be issued in the unfortunate circumstance that it becomes necessary to do so.

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with (a) the US Administration and (b) others concerning the protection and preservation of Iraq's ancient cities and monuments in the event of military conflict in the Gulf; and if he will make a statement. [97871]

Mr. Hoon: Any military action would be in conformity with international law, including the UN Charter and international humanitarian law. In all our military planning, very careful attention is applied to minimising the risk of damage to all civilian sites. I am withholding further information under Exemption 1 (Defence, Security and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Joint UAV Experimentation Project

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the (a) remit, (b) timetable, and (c) proposed expenditure for the Joint UAV Experimentation Project is. [99072]

Mr. Ingram: The Joint UAV Experimentation Programme (JUEP) will explore the potential of UAVs to significantly enhance future military capability. A variety of activities will be undertaken, ranging from computer modelling and simulation to hands on experience of complete UAV systems operating as part of multi-national exercises. It is intended to establish an initial JUEP capability in 2003. Costs are yet to be established, but total expenditure is likely to be in the region of £65 million over a three-year period.

Medical Reservists

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many medical regular reserves are (a) serving on operations; and (b) eligible for call up. [91518]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer Monday 20 January 2003]: As at 17 February 2003, there were two medical regular reservists serving on operations.

As at 1 January 2003, 2,016 medical regular reservists in the Army and Royal Air Force were eligible for call-out. As at 15 January 2003, 445 medical regular reservists in the Royal Navy were eligible for call-out.

Terrorism

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) on how many occasions since 1 May 1997 the Government have authorised military aid to the Civil Power in relation to the mainland of Great Britain; and by what means in each case Parliament was so informed; [98687]

(2) when he most recently signed an order authorising military aid to the Civil Power; [98689]

(3) what steps he is required to take to inform Parliament that the Government has authorised military aid to the Civil Power; [98688]

(4) whether he has authorised military aid to the Civil Power in relation to combating current terrorist threats to the United Kingdom. [98690]

Mr. Ingram: In common with all armed forces deployments, the provision of Military Aid to the Civil Power (MACP) is authorised by a Minister within the Ministry of Defence, following a request from the police. The legal basis for this is the common law duty of every citizen to provide reasonable support to the police should they request it. The primacy of the police is recognised at all times. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has, of course, overall responsibility for the police and for security in the United Kingdom. There is consequently close and continuous consultation between the Ministry of Defence and the Home Office concerning the provision of this support.

Support is, for the most part, routine and is linked to active police investigations and operations. By far the largest single category concerns explosive devices. Excluding Northern Ireland, there were 957 occasions in 2001 when experts from the armed forces were asked by the police to provide support in the investigation of improvised explosive devices, and 431 occasions in 2002. The provision of other support, the nature of which varies considerably, is authorised on a case by case basis. On average between 30 and 40 of these requests are authorised each year, a small proportion of which are related to the terrorist threat.

There is no specific requirement to inform Parliament on each occasion support is authorised, and in view of the sensitivity of many police operations, it would be wrong to make public all the details of the support being provided.

Ministerial Meetings

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met Mr. Donald Rumsfeld. [98974]

Mr. Hoon: I last met Donald Rumsfeld on Wednesday 12 February 2003.

Nimrod/Astute Programmes

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to the answer of 23 January 2003 to the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), Official Report, column 52W, what progress he has made with BAE Systems in resolving the outstanding financial issues arising from the Nimrod and Astute programmes. [98581]

Mr. Hoon: As my noble Friend Lord Bach announced in another place on 19 February 2003, Official Report, column WA175–77, the Government have reached agreement with BAE Systems on the way ahead for these two strategically important defence projects. We have agreed a new structure for the two contracts which reduces risk, while placing new incentives on the company to perform. This will, however, involve a rise in the overall expected cost to completion and further delays to the in-service dates of the two projects.

For the Nimrod MRA4 project, which was originally won by British Aerospace (now BAE Systems) in open competition in 1996, the company has announced that it will be making a provision of £500 million against the project this year in its preliminary results for 2002. This is in addition to a previous provision of £300 million made in the company's 2000 results. For our part, the Government have agreed to delay the start of series production until we have seen demonstrated performance from the first three aircraft, and to increase our funding of the project by around £270 million, subject to final negotiations. This covers our share of restructuring the programme and will result in the achievement of an in-service date by 2009, defined as delivery of the sixth series production aircraft. As a result of the delay to the start of production, we now have the option of considering an increase in the aircraft's capability to meet the defence requirements of the 21st century. We have already introduced improvements to existing Nimrod MR2 aircraft which use some of the technology planned for the new MRA4 aircraft, thereby both reducing risk in the new programme and increasing existing capability.

The starting point for the Astute class attack submarine project was different. The original contract was based on a single source supplier, namely GEC-Marconi (which subsequently merged with British Aerospace to form BAE Systems) as the only United Kingdom provider of this unique defence capability. We sought to establish a fair price, given the economic conditions, and agreed joint assumptions on an open book basis at the time of contract signature in March 1997 on how the project would be delivered. These related, in part, to the benefits to be derived from the first comprehensive application of computer aided design (CAD) techniques to United Kingdom submarines. This will deliver significant advantages in the future, but its benefits have proved more difficult to realise on a programme of this complexity than either we, or the company, had assumed. We now know that the introduction of CAD requires more time and effort than either of us had originally anticipated. As a result, the Government have agreed to increase our funding by around £430 million, subject to final negotiations, as against an increased contribution by the company of £250 million which it has announced will be included as a provision in its preliminary results for 2002. These increases reflect the Government's acceptance of a share of the responsibility along with BAE Systems for the underestimate of the required effort and the consequent design delays. They also cover costs incurred through restructuring and other revisions to the project, and will result in the first of class coming into service by 2008. In the light of what we now know about the costs and benefits of CAD, we are confident that the new deal represents a good deal for the taxpayer and will provide outstanding new generation attack submarines for the Royal Navy.

This agreement has been reached following intensive negotiations, carried out in a constructive and co-operative spirit since the autumn. Both the Government and BAE Systems agree that the priority now is to put these difficulties behind us. We have agreed with the company that we will introduce new methods of project control and reporting on these and other projects. The exact details of the agreement required to establish formally the new financial structure and the revised in-service dates still need to be agreed. This should take several months and the Government will report further to the House when this has been achieved.

Overall, we expect the additional cost to the Government of these two contracts to be around £700 million, although significant additional Ministry of Defence expenditure will not begin until 2008 and will be spread over the following years. The scale of the financial consequences now announced by the company demonstrates that it accepts responsibility for its share of the serious difficulties that have arisen on these two immensely complex and demanding programmes. It is, however, appropriate, for the reasons that I have set out , that the Government should make these additional contributions to the Nimrod and Astute contracts. The unique military capabilities represented by these two programmes are crucial to Britain's future defences, and there are no alternative systems capable of offering comparable levels of performance at economic costs in any existing projects anywhere in the world. The Government are satisfied that both the Nimrod and the Astute project represent value for money. We now look to the company to deliver.

Procurement

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the procedure is for emergency procurement in a deployment of the armed forces. [98296]

Mr. Ingram: The urgent operational requirements process enables both the acceleration of existing programmes and new procurements against short timescales to equip the armed forces for a specific operational environment, a particular threat faced or an envisaged operational scenario. There are also arrangements to meet surge requirements for stock and consumables. Further information on the urgent operational requirement process can be found at www.mod.uk.

Reservists

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) reservists and (b) medical reservists have responded to call-up notices in the last three months; and if he will make a statement. [97771]

Dr. Moonie: As at 14 February, 5,495 call-out notices had been issued in support of Operation TELIC. Of these, 513 were issued to medical reservists. On the same date, 1,765 reservists had been accepted for service of which 198 were medical reservists. For all other operations, 140 reservists had been accepted for service between 1 December 2002 and 14 February 2003. Of these, seven were medical reservists.

Aircraft Carriers

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether the proposed pooling of Royal Navy and French aircraft carriers for future European Union military operations will ensure that at least one will always be immediately available to the EU (a) in addition and (b) as an alternative to being available for UK and NATO tasks; [98230]

(2) whether Royal Navy aircraft carriers required for (a) UK and (b) NATO tasks when already deployed on EU tasks would be made available for UK and NATO duties. [98231]

Mr. Hoon: At the Le Touquet summit, the United Kingdom and France announced that we would "develop the interoperability of [our] aircraft carrier groups, pursuing all areas of co-operation, in particular harmonising activity cycles and training". The aim will be to maximise carrier availability over the activity cycle. Aircraft carriers available on this basis might participate in national, coalition, NATO or EU-led operations, but will remain national assets. Decisions on the deployment of national assets for operations will continue to be for the nation concerned.

The Government make decisions on the deployment (and redeployment) of UK forces on operations on a case-by-case basis. These judgments are based on factors such as operational need, what forces we and others have to offer and any international treaty obligations that may be relevant, with NATO remaining as the foundation of our collective defence.

Telephone Helplines

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many telephone helplines are sponsored by his Department; and which of these helplines are charged at (a) national rate, (b) premium rate and (c) local rate. [95720]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence sponsors many telephone helplines, covering a wide variety of subjects. The primary helplines for all general inquiries are the MOD Public Enquiry Office on 0870 607 4455 and the Welsh Language Public Enquiry Office on 01554 821 413. Both of these numbers are charged at the national rate.

The main helplines which provide advice on specific subjects are:

Helpline	Number	Charged at
Low Flying Helpdesk	020 7218 6020	National rate
Gulf Veterans Advice Unit	0800 169 4495 020 7395 2375	Freephone National rate
Medical Assessment Programme Helpline	0800 169 5401	Freephone
Porton Down Volunteers Helpline	0800 783 2521	Freephone
Veterans Agency Helpline	0800 169 2277	Freephone
Defence Vetting Agency Helpline	01904 662 644	National rate
Defence Suppliers Service Helpline	0117 913 2844 0800 282 324	National rate Freephone
Royal Navy recruiting helpline	0845 607 5555	Local rate
Army recruiting helpline	08457 300 111	Local rate
RAF recruiting helpline	0845 605 5555	Local rate
TA recruiting helpline	0845 603 8000	Local rate
Meteorological Office helpline	0845 300 0300	Local rate

Helpline	Number	Charged at
Defence Estates—Disposal of MOD Land	0121 311 2015	National rate
SaBRE (Support Britain's Reservists And Employers)	0800 389 5459	Freephone

The above list is not exhaustive and does not include those helplines created specifically for serving military and civilian personnel and their dependants. Nor does it include those helplines that may from time to time be administered by individual units or establishments to provide advice on local or short term issues. Information on this is not held centrally and could be provided only with disproportionate cost.

Type 23 Frigates

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 3 February 2003, Official Report, column 68W, on the Type 23 frigate, if he will list the systems being considered to enable attacks by small enemy craft to be dealt with. [98411]

Mr. Ingram: Lynx helicopters and close-range guns currently provide anti-ship and close in defence for Type 23 frigates. The project to provide surface vessels, including Type 23 frigates, with an improved capability to deal with the threat presented by small enemy craft is in its very early stages. The concepts currently being assessed include small and medium-calibre guns, rockets and non-lethal means. This assessment phase is expected to complete towards the end of this year.

Watchkeeper Programme

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he proposes to announce the shortlist of selected bidders for the Watchkeeper Programme; what sums were given to the bidders; and whether he is considering splitting the bid. [99073]

Mr. Ingram: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced on 7 February 2003 that the bidders selected for the remainder of the Watchkeeper assessment phase were: Northrop Grumman ISS International and Thales (UK). To date, around £25 million has been spent on the Watchkeeper programme, and the contracts for the remainder of the assessment phase will be worth approximately £9 million to each bidder. We expect to select a single successful contractor for the demonstration and manufacture phase by mid-2004.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Contingencies (South-West)

Brian Cotter: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what civil contingency plans are in place for the south-west region in the event of a terrorist attack; and if he will make a statement. [99111]

Mr. Alexander: The UK has plans in place to maintain national security and protect the public. These classified contingency plans cover a wide range of emergencies, including terrorist threats, and are based on established multi-agency local emergency arrangements. They are regularly tested, reviewed and updated as circumstances change.

In addition, each administration region in England now has its own regional resilience team made up of emergency planning specialists. Through regional resilience forums, these teams will help co-ordinate emergency planning within and across regional boundaries.

Government Shareholdings

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) what remit the Shareholder Executive Unit will have; [99114]

(2) what (a) organisational and (b) employment plans his Department has for managing government shareholdings in (i) the Royal Mail, (ii) the Royal Mint and (iii) British Nuclear Fuels; and what estimates have been made of the cost of such plans. [99143]

Mr. Alexander: The remit of the Shareholder Executive will be to work with Government Departments to improve their performance as a shareholder in a range of Government shareholdings in public and private sector companies as well as Government's more commercial trading funds. The Shareholder Executive will meet this remit in a number of ways. It will: scrutinise departmental shareholder resource requirements and assist in improving department's capabilities; help departments define their relationship with each company; set best practice standards and procedures for departments in their role as shareholder; and help departments distinguish and articulate long-term commercial and policy objectives for each shareholding. The Shareholder Executive will also become Government's centre of corporate finance and governance expertise, advising departments on shareholder-related management, corporate governance and finance issues as well as wider corporate finance and other industrial issues that arise from time to time.

The Cabinet Office is putting in place arrangements to enable the Shareholder Executive to become operational as soon as possible. An open competition is under way for the recruitment of a Chief Executive, who will be accountable directly to Lord Macdonald and the Cabinet Secretary for the performance of the Shareholder Executive. In due course, between 10 and 15 people drawn from Government Departments and the private sector will be recruited to support the Chief Executive in delivering the Shareholder Executive's remit. The costs of running the Shareholder Executive are likely to be modest relative to the potential benefits arising from improved shareholder performance.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Food Advertising (EU Funds)

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with the European Commission regarding the use of EU funds on advertising food products. [98202]

Mr. Morley: My officials regularly take part in discussions with the European Commission in meetings of the Management Committee for the Council Regulations concerning the Promotion of Agricultural Products in both Third Countries and the Internal Market. Advertising forms part of the promotional activity permitted under these regulations.

Agricultural Exports

Mr. Roger Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what market research has been undertaken by (a) her Department and (b) Food from Britain since 1995 regarding the use of Foods from Britain by agricultural export companies; and if she will place a copy of those findings in the Library. [97869]

Mr. Morley: The Department has not undertaken any market research since 1995 into the use of Food From Britain by agricultural export companies. In 2000 research into the usage and attitude of their clients and other exporters was undertaken on behalf of Food From Britain. This was updated in 2002. A copy of the executive summary of the survey will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Roger Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many companies used the services, by type, of Food from Britain in each of the last 10 years; and how many of those companies were (a) small and medium-sized businesses and (b) less than five years old when they first contacted Food from Britain. [97870]

Mr. Morley: During the last 10 years the approximate total number of companies using Food From Britain is as shown below. Of these at least 50 per cent. were small and medium-sized businesses. Food From Britain does not hold information on the age of companies with which it deals.

Total number of companies using Food From Britain

Year	No.
1992/93	700
1993/94	1,200
1994/95	1,000
1995/96	1,000
1996/97	1,000
1997/98	1,100
1998/99	750
1999/2000	800
2000/01	800
2001/02	800

Mr. Roger Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for St Ives (Andrew George) of 16 January 2003, Official Report, column 728W, on agricultural exports, how much Food from Britain charges companies by size for use of their services. [97933]

Mr. Morley: Food From Britain does not charge for services by size of the company. Fees are calculated according to a number of factors including complexity of the service offered and staff time. Membership of the Fast Track scheme, which gives access to a range of additional export services, is based on the export turnover of a company as follows:

Export Turnover(£)	Fee(£)
Nil-250	500
250–500	1,000
500–1million	1,500
1–2million	2,000
2–5million	3,000
over 5million	4,500
Associate member	1,250

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to her answer of 16 January 2003, Official Report, column 728W, on agricultural exports, how many companies used services provided by her Department's (a) agricultural exports promotion service and (b) Food from Britain in each of the last 10 years, broken down by (i) size by annual turnover and (ii) whether they were charged for those services in each of the last 10 years. [98012]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 24 February 2003]: The information is as follows:

(a) The total number of companies using services provided by the agricultural exports promotion service (e.g. participation in fairs and missions) over the last 10 years was as shown in the following table. The vast majority were small and medium sized enterprises. The companies were not charged for any of the services provided.

Year	Number of companies
1993–94	270
1994–95	230
1995–96	380
1996–97	190

1999–2000	190
2000–01	210
2001–02	360
2002–03	350

(b) The total number of companies using services provided by Food From Britain over the last 10 years was as shown in the following table. The information is not available broken down by the size of annual turnover of the companies, although more than 50 per cent. were small and medium sized enterprises. Companies will have been charged for most of the services provided.

2001–02	800

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to the answer of 16 January 2003, Official Report, column 728W, on agricultural exports, how much (a) revenue and (b) profit was raised through companies supported by Food from Britain in each of the last 10 years. [98013]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 24 February 2003]: The income (other than grant in aid) which Food From Britain generates from the activities it undertakes is shown in the Annual Report and Accounts. The Accounts are laid before Parliament each year and copies are placed in the Library. The income in each of the last 10 years is as shown in the following table. Food From Britain is a non-profit making organisation.

Bill of Rights (Animals)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if the Government will introduce a Bill of Rights for Animals; and if she will make a statement. [98101]

Mr. Morley: The Government have no plans to introduce a Bill of Rights for Animals. We are undertaking a review of animal welfare law with a view to modernising and consolidating them into an Animal Welfare Bill.

Bovine Subsidy Scheme

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when the Rural Payments Agency will complete its review of the case referred by Mr. and Mrs. McCoy of Dartmouth regarding their 2001 bovine subsidy scheme claim. [99069]

Alun Michael: The Rural Payments Agency (RPA) received a number of representations about the penalties imposed and considered them in consultation with the industry, taking account of the advice and views of the European Commission. As a result, a number of categories were identified where a review of the earlier decision was considered to be appropriate. Full details regarding the consultation and the categories affected have been sent to all bovine producers.

The RPA aims to process cases as quickly as possible but has made a commitment to the industry to complete the exercise by the end of March 2003. Mr and Mrs McCoy's case will be considered under the review provisions and a reply will be sent to them by the deadline.

The RPA is required under European legislation to cross-check bovine subsidy claims against the British Cattle Movement Service (BCMS) Cattle Tracing System (CTS) database. Discrepancies were found when checks were carried out on 2001 bovine claims resulting in a significant number of producers having penalties applied and also delays in making the subsidy payments.

The schemes affected are Beef Special Premium, Suckler Cow Premium, Slaughter Premium (including the Veal Calf Scheme) and Extensification Payments.

Bovine TB

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many bovine TB reactors were positive in (a) Herefordshire and (b) Worcestershire in 2002; and how many have been positive in 2003. [97967]

Mr. Morley: Reactors to the tuberculin test are slaughtered and examined post-mortem. Infection is confirmed by either the presence of typical, visible lesions of tuberculosis or by the laboratory culture of the causative agent (Mycobacterium bovis) in tissue samples. These post mortem examinations, carried out in abattoirs, are less than 100 per cent. sensitive. Failure to detect visible lesions or failure to culture the organism from a test reactor does not necessarily rule out infection with M. bovis. It would be misleading, therefore, to equate unconfirmed test reactors to "false positives" or "negative" reactors.

The latest available data for 2002 show there were 892 confirmed reactors in Herefordshire and Worcestershire. The information is not available separately for each of the counties.

Laboratory culture of M. bovis takes several weeks. Consequently data for reactors disclosed so far in 2003 is not yet available.

Circus Animals

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans the Government have to change the law relating to the welfare of circus animals; and if she will make a statement. [98100]

Mr. Morley: There is currently a review of animal welfare law with a view to modernising and consolidating it into an Animal Welfare Bill. The legislation relating to the welfare of circus animals is part of that review. I am considering a thorough overhaul of the present licensing system for performing animals including the welfare of animals in circuses and circus winter quarters. Officials have held discussions with representatives from the performing animal industry, welfare organisations and other interested parties about the need for better regulation.

Coastal Erosion

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what work has been done by the Environment Agency in Somerset on coastal erosion. [98280]

Mr. Morley: Maritime District Councils are empowered to carry out works in the management of coastal erosion by the Coast Protection Act 1949. The Environment Agency does not have responsibility for coastal erosion.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what funding is being made available under the Government's financial statement 2003 for (a) West Somerset District Council and (b) Sedgemoor District Council for coastal erosion. [98281]

Mr. Morley: Grant aid is made available by DEFRA to support capital projects carried out by the maritime district councils to manage the risk from coastal erosion, provided they meet specified economic, technical and environmental criteria, are on the Department's forward capital programme and achieve the Department's threshold priority score. The total allocation for all authorities for coastal erosion works in 2003–04 is £35 million. Responsibility for deciding on which projects to promote and their timing rests with the councils. West Somerset District Council has an entry for a study on DEFRA's forward capital programme for 03–04 but Sedgemoor District Council has no entries.

Laptop Computers

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many laptop computers were used by (a) Ministers and special advisers and (b) officials in her Department in each year since 1995; how many were (i) lost and (ii) stolen; what their cost was; and if she will make a statement. [97498]

Alun Michael: The number of laptop computers used by (a) Ministers and special advisers was six and (b) officials was 1,835, in the 2001–02 financial year. In that year (i) five laptops were lost, and (ii) six were stolen; the total value of these was £18,675. None of the laptop computers lost or stolen was being used by a Minister or special adviser.

The Department only came into existence June 2001 so the information requested can only be given from that date.

Drainage Boards

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the powers of drainage boards. [98288]

Mr. Morley: The Land Drainage Act 1991 provides the powers and duties of Internal Drainage Boards who exercise a general supervision over all matters relating to drainage of land in their district.

The detailed powers are set out in Sections 14, 15, 19–21, 25, 36, 55–57, 62–64 and 66 of the Act. They include powers for the improvement and maintenance of existing works, construction of new works, acquisition and disposal of land, powers of entry and the making of byelaws.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the constraints are on the fund-raising powers of drainage boards. [98289]

Mr. Morley: The Land Drainage Act 1991 sets out the financial powers of internal drainage boards (IDBs). Section 36 provides for IDBs to meet their expenses (net of payments to, and receipts from, the Environment Agency (EA)) by drainage rates and special levies. Section 37 sets out how these payments will be apportioned. Sections 38–39 deal with differential drainage charges which are set by sub-dividing the IDB area. Sections 40–54 deal with levying of drainage rates and related provisions. Section 55 provides powers for IDBs to borrow in relation to their functions under the 1991 Act or to discharge other loans. Ministerial consent is required for new borrowing. Section 56 allows IDBs to set navigation tolls. Section 57 allows IDBs to seek contributions from the EA in relation to water from higher land or dealing with water before it reaches a main river.

We intend to use the forthcoming Water Bill to restore the power for IDBs to borrow to finance contributions to the Environment Agency, which was inadvertently lost when water legislation was consolidated in 1991.

Egg Marking

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the Government's policy on the individual marking of eggs. [97712]

Margaret Beckett [holding answer 13 February 2003]: In 2001 the EU agreed new rules requiring the compulsory marking of hen eggs. From 1 January 2004 eggs will have to be marked with a code identifying the method and place of production. This will improve consumer information and choice and will assist with traceability and enforcement of EU egg marketing regulations. We will soon be consulting interested parties on the format of the producer code. There is no truth in the rumours that each egg will have to be traceable back to an individual hen.

Egg marking will only apply to class A eggs most of which are sold at retail level. Some 80 per cent. of eggs produced and sold in the UK are already marked under the industry's Lion assurance scheme. In negotiations, the UK successfully argued for the inclusion of a provision in the new rules to allow the marking of eggs to take place at any approved packing centre as well as on farms. Furthermore, eggs sold by the producer directly to the consumer for their own use (e.g. farm gate sales or at farmers' markets) will not have to be marked, nor will any non-class A eggs or those sold for processing.

Equine Cruelty

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what information she collates on the imposition of penalties for equine cruelty on a regional basis; and what plans she has to take further measures on equine cruelty. [98037]

Mr. Morley: There are no procedures in place for regularly collating information relating to the imposition of penalties for equine cruelty offences on a regional basis. Annual statistics relate to England and Wales as a whole.

We are undertaking a review of animal welfare law with a view to modernising and consolidating it into an Animal Welfare Bill. The review includes looking at ways to improve the welfare of captive and domestic animals, including equine species, and to reduce acts of cruelty.

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will bring forward proposals for an automatic lifetime ban on keeping horses following a conviction for cruelty. [98048]

Mr. Morley: The Protection of Animals Act 1911 (as amended) provides that the court may disqualify a person convicted from having custody of any animal for such a period, as it thinks fit. There is no upper limit on the period of disqualification which a court may impose.

I am undertaking a review of all existing animal welfare legislation—including the 1911 Act—with a view to the introduction of a Bill that will consolidate and modernise these laws in a single Act. This review includes the penalties available to the courts. No decisions have been taken concerning the contents of the Bill which will be issued in draft for public consultation before it is considered by Parliament.

Fishermen

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to her answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 377W, on fishermen, what proportion of the aid that will be available for measures to support (a) the training of fishermen and (b) the diversification of their activities outside marine fisheries must contribute to a reduction of the fishing effort developed by the beneficiaries if they continue fishing on a part-time basis. [98597]

Mr. Morley: Grant is available for the training of fishermen in safety measures, under the fisheries structural fund. Payments are not conditional on reducing fishing effort. Assistance available from regional sources for supporting the diversification of fishermen's activities outside marine fisheries is administered independently of the obligations under the common fisheries policy for the limitation of fishing effort.

Flooding

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what EU funding is available for flood defences outside structural fund areas. [98291]

Mr. Morley: No significant financial assistance is made available by the European Union to assist member states in the provision of flood and coastal defences.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement about how she will deal with future flood alerts. [98065]

Mr. Morley: With Defra funding, the Environment Agency has developed a clear national strategy for developing its flood warning capabilities over the next 10 years in order to deliver the highest practicable quality of flood warning service across England and Wales. It is anticipated that in order to achieve defined performance targets for an effective flood warning service to increase both its coverage and the effective action taken by recipients of these warnings that investment will be focussed on the following specific but inter-linked areas of work:

upgrade and extension of detection and monitoring systems such as telemetry and weather radar to improve the identification of conditions likely to cause flooding;

the delivery of an enhanced national flood forecasting system to improve prediction of the time, location, likelihood, severity and duration of flooding; developing a multi-media warning dissemination system to communicate flood warnings to "at risk" members of the public and to professional partners who need to respond (eg emergency services, local authorities, utilities, media and weather broadcasters); targeted public awareness programmes and effective marketing and communication of flood risk, preventative actions and appropriate reactions to warnings to achieve an effective response.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the powers of flood defence committees. [98290]

Mr. Morley: Flood defence committees, whether regional or local, are executive committees of the Agency.

Section 106 of the Water Resources Act 1991 requires the Environment Agency to "arrange for all its functions relating to flood defence under the following provisions of this Act and the Land Drainage Act 1991 to be carried out by Regional Flood Defence Committees". The exceptions are issuing of levies, making drainage charges or borrowing money.

Regional flood defence committees are permitted to arrange for their functions to be carried out:

(a) by a sub-committee, or an under sub-committee of the committee or an officer of theAgency; or

(b) by any other regional or, as the case may be, local flood defence committee.

Statutory local flood defence committees have been established in the Environment Agency's Southern, Wessex and Anglian regions and in Wales.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what financial assistance is being given to the Environment Agency to help with flood prevention and relief in the Government's spending assessment for 2003. [98309]

Mr. Morley: The Environment Agency's flood defence function is funded mainly (a) from local authority levies which in turn are supported by funding from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, and (b) from Defra grant for capital projects for new and improved defences, related studies and flood warning. Additionally, Defra makes contributions to support the cost of agency national initiatives such as for the National Flood and Coastal Defence Database and on Catchment Flood Management Plans. Defra provision for 2003–04 is:

	£ million
Capital projects	64
National initiatives	5

Game Licences

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many game licences were issued for the 2002–03 season; how much it cost to administer the game licence regime in 2002–03; and what revenue was received. [98551]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 24 February 2003]: The information requested in relation to game licensing during the year 2002–03 will not be available until later this year.

Genetically Modified Soya

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much (a) processed food and (b) soya milk, containing genetically modified soya grown in the USA, was consumed in the UK in the last year for which figures are available; and if she will make a statement. [98359]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 24 February 2003]: Official figures on the levels of (a) processed food and (b) soya milk, containing genetically modified soya, grown in the USA and consumed in the UK are not available.

The following table shows UK imports of (i) unprocessed foods, (ii) lightly processed foods (goods that retain their raw recognisable form, such as meat, cheese and butter, powdered milk, flour, sugar etc.) and (iii) highly processed foods (goods such as confectionery, canned meats, jams, alcoholic drinks, ice cream etc.) from the USA in 2001.

Grants (Farmers and Landowners)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list for the latest year that figures are available, how many grants for farmers and landowners have been given, broken down by (a) greater than £1 million, (b) £800,000-£999,999, (c) £500,000-£799,999, (d) £300,000-£499,999, (e) £200,000-£299,000, (f) £100,000-£199,999, (g) £50,000-£99,999, (h) £25,000-£49,999, (i) £12,500-£24,999, (j) £5,000-£12,499, (k) £2,500-£4,999 and (l) less than £2,500. [98608]

Alun Michael: The table breaks down the CAP payments made by the RPA in the EAGGF financial year from 16 October 2001 to 15 October 2002.

Separate lines are shown for the IACS and non-IACS payments. In the latter category the beneficiaries are largely traders rather than farmers and the coverage is wider than England alone.

It is not possible to show the number of farmers and landowners who received amounts falling within the bands stipulated in the question without disproportionate cost.

	Trader schemes	IACS schemes	Total EAGGF	Nationally/ EU partially funded schemes

Greater London Assembly (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what financial assistance her Department gave to the Greater London Assembly in 2002; and for what projects. [95853]

Alun Michael: No financial assistance was given directly to the London Assembly by central Government Departments in 2002–03.

The London Assembly is part of the Greater London Authority (GLA). It is responsible for scrutinising and reviewing the Mayor's exercise of his statutory functions. It has particular power to investigate, and prepare reports on actions and decisions taken by the Mayor or any member of the Greater London Authority. The London Assembly's specific costs are part of the overall GLA budget which is proposed each year by the Mayor is subject to the Assembly's agreement.

The GLA grants from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister in 2002–03 as reported on the RA02 form are as follows:

	£million
GLA Grants
Revenue Support Grant	659.641
Redistributed Non-Domestic Rate	267.654
General GLA Grant	27.950

IT Contracts

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list IT contracts in her Department and its predecessors above £50 million in each of the last 10 years; what the inception date for each system was; when it became fully functional; when it became fully debugged; and what the cost of over-runs has been. [99008]

Alun Michael: Defra has not let any new IT contracts with a whole-life cost above £50 million since it was established as a new Department in June 2001.

Information covering earlier periods, or for Defra's Executive Agencies and NDPBs, is not readily available and could be constructed retrospectively only at disproportionate cost.

Live Sheep Exports

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many live sheep were exported from Dover to continental Europe on 1 February 2003; when and where health certification was carried out in respect of the sheep; how many of the sheep were rejected as unfit for the intended journey, (a) during inspection for health certification purposes and (b) at Dover docks, and to where those sheep were taken, and what the address was of the final destination given on the route plan for each of the consignments. [98520]

Mr. Morley: The information requested is as follows:

Sailing date	Total animals certified	Where consignments were certified	Animals rejected at certification	Animals rejected at Dover docks	Destination
1 February	1,260	England	0	0	Germany

The sheep on the above sailing were certified within 48 hours of export and were sent to approved slaughterhouses.

These figures relate to the numbers of sheep certified for export and are subject to revision and change.

Over 30 Months Scheme

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the effect of the requirement to remove vertebral column from Over 30 Month cattle upon farmers rearing cattle in the West Country under the Beef Assurance Scheme; and if she will make a statement. [98357]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 24 February 2003]: The requirement that vertebral column be removed in licensed cutting plants has created difficulties for members of the Beef Assurance Scheme. I understand that two cutting plants in Devon and Cornwall which may be able to accommodate cattle reared under the scheme have now been licensed by the Food Standards Agency.

Rural Payments Agency

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to her answer of 11 February 2003, Official Report, column 647W, if she will list the main items of property that the Rural Payments Agency lost through theft in 2001–02, together with the value of those items. [98129]

Margaret Beckett [holding answer 24 February 2003]: The Rural Payments Agency only came into existence on 16 October 2001. Losses through theft from then until end December 2002 are as follows:

16 October 2001—31 December 2002: Loss of five laptops at £2,000 each and six mobile phones at £50 each, making a total of £10,500.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Laptop Computers

Dr. Cable: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many laptop computers were used by (a) Ministers and special advisers and (b) officials in his Department in each year since 1995; how many were (i) lost and (ii) stolen; what their cost was; and if he will make a statement. [98702]

Mr. Leslie: The information requested on the use of laptop computers in each year since 1995 is not available centrally or in the form requested, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Since the establishment of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on 29 May 2002 there have been four reported cases of stolen laptop computers, at a total cost of £6,038.

Cash Incentive Schemes

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will place in the Library a summary of the responses to the consultation on the removal of the requirement for local authorities to obtain consent to run a cash incentive scheme. [98530]

Mr. McNulty: A total of 26 responses, which were generally strongly supportive of the proposal, were received. A summary of the responses will be placed in the library of the House.

Deprivation

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what response his Office has made to the Greater London Enterprise Report on Developing New Approaches to the Measurement of Deprivation. [94522]

Mrs. Roche: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has received parts of the Greater London Enterprise Report on Developing New Approaches to the Measurement of Deprivation as part of the consultation exercise on updating the Indices of Deprivation 2000. This report is currently being considered as part of the updating process.

Empty Homes

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many empty homes his Department had five years ago. by region; if he will establish an empty homes strategy within his Department; and if he will set a target for reduction in empty homes. [92922]

Mr. Leslie: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was formed in May 2002. Therefore, we do not have information on empty homes from five years ago. The Fire Service College, an executive agency of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, currently has one vacant residential property, at the college site in Moreton-in-Marsh, which it envisages will be let shortly. The College's strategy is to ensure that residential property that is not required for staff use is held out for letting on short term tenancies. Its target is to ensure that it has no residential stock vacant for more than three months.

Housing

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what has been the ratio of population to (a) housing units and (b) bedspaces in each county of England in each year since 1997. [97407]

Mr. McNulty: This information is not available annually. Estimates of population per housing unit for 2001 will be possible later this year when figures on numbers of dwellings are published from the Census.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what proportion of new homes to be built in the UK will be transferred to the private renting sector; and what proportion will be built on brownfield sites. [98462]

Mr. McNulty: The information requested on the numbers of new homes available for private renting is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

In England, the target for the proportion of new housing on previously-developed land including through conversions of existing buildings is 60 per cent. by 2008. Latest available figures show that the percentage in 2000 was 60 per cent. and in 2001, 61 per cent.

Housing targets for other parts of the United Kingdom are a matter for the devolved Administration concerned.

Neighbourhood Renewal Fund

Mr. Battle: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much funding Leeds city council has received from the neighbourhood renewal fund; when funds were received; what projects have been funded and by how much; and which organisations are responsible for (a) managing and (b) delivering each project. [96968]

Mrs. Roche: Details of the Neighbourhood Renewal Fund (NRF) allocations made to Leeds city council are in the following table.

The purpose of the NRF is to support the improvement of mainstream service delivery in deprived areas, contributing to the achievement of the Government's floor targets in the five neighbourhood renewal themes of education, health, worklessness, crime reduction, and housing and the environment. In partnership with the Local Strategic Partnership, Leeds city council has allocated NRF across these floor target areas as follows:

Allocation 2001–02: £4,197,791

NRF resources spent in 2001–02

Education	1,724,472
Employment	960,729
Crime	366,866
Health	0
Housing and Environment	383,160
Other	41,140
Total	3,476,367

Proposed spend 2002–03: £7,018,111 (including £721,424 carry over from 2001–02)

NRF resources allocated in 2002–03

Education	2,245,690
Employment	963,440
Crime	1,511,170
Health	414,600
Housing and Environment	1,307,200
Other	701,000
Total	[1]7,143,100

[1] Over commitment to allow for slippage

NRF is paid in fortnightly instalments with the Revenue Support Grant to local authorities. Payments commenced in June 2001.

However, local authorities account for NRF expenditure through NRF Statements of Use, which are submitted to Government Offices annually in October. Leeds city council's NRF Statement of Use for 2002–03 is available on the LSP's (the Leeds Initiative) website.

Details of NRF supported projects and activities for 2002–03, including those organisations responsible for delivery, are as follows:

Supporting People Scheme

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the balance between mobile and permanent staff servicing the needs of older people under the Supporting People Scheme. [97784]

HOUSE OF COMMONS PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES (HANSARD) ● 2002-03

CHADWYCK-HEALEY Vol. 400 (Part 2) cols. W459 - 648 24 February - 7 March 2003

Mr. McNulty: Supporting People will enable local authorities to provide user-centred, flexible services designed to meet local need. Local authorities are required to review all services (including those for older people) in their area between 2003 and 2006, to ensure that services meet the needs of users, are of high quality and are cost effective. It is the responsibility of each authority (and each service provider) to ensure that adequate staffing resources are in place to meet local need, and that the balance between the use of mobile and permanent staff is appropriate.

Sustainable Communities

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the other housing programmes identified in the table on page 7 of Sustainable Communities: Building for the Future are; and how much will be spent on each of these in (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06. [98516]

Mr. McNulty: Tabled are the "other housing programmes" identified in the table on page 7 "Sustainable Communities: Building for the Future", with planned expenditure for the next three years. Note that totals may not sum due to rounding.

The "Other Housing" line in the table on page 66 covers all of the tabled items except for disabled facilities grants, which are shown separately in that table.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Class Sizes (Derbyshire)

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the class sizes of (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in Derbyshire in each of the last five years. [98887]

Mr. Miliband: The information requested is shown in the table.

Maintained primary and secondary schools[1]: Average class size[2], Derbyshire local education authority

Classroom Replacement (Somerset)

Mr Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many condemned temporary classrooms there are in Somerset; and how many temporary classrooms were replaced in Somerset in (a) 2000–01 and (b) 2001–02. [98277]

Mr. Miliband: The Department for Education and Skills does not hold information on numbers of replacement temporary classrooms.

Mr Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what guidelines the Government has issued on classroom replacement in Somerset. [98283]

Mr. Miliband: The Department for Education and Skills has not issued guidelines for replacement classrooms. Somerset, in common with other Local Education Authorities, determines priorities for its capital budgets, on the basis of its Asset Management Plan, which should take Government priorities into account.

Construction Industry Training Board

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to review the operation of the Construction Industry Training Board levy. [97911]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The CITB's levy arrangements are subject to annual approval by Parliament. They continue to have the support of all the main employer organisations within the construction industry as a way of ensuring that the costs of training the workforce are shared by the whole industry. Also, as a non-departmental public body, the CITB is subject to quinquennial reviews of its function and performance. A review is currently underway.

Drugs

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many schoolchildren were excluded from schools for drug misuse in (a) Lancashire and (b) Chorley in the last year for which figures are available. [98225]

Mr. Miliband: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on 14 January, columns 573–74W.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what support is given to (a) schools and (b) pupils to tackle drug use. [98226]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The DfES provides considerable support to schools to fulfil their statutory obligation to educate young people about drugs. In 2002–03, £15.5m has been made available via the Standards Fund to improve the extent and quality of drug education. Of this, £1.3m has been set aside under the drug, alcohol and tobacco education training package to support teachers' continuing professional development. We are currently revising and consolidating our guidance to schools to make clear the statutory responsibilities and outline good practice in drug education and incident management. This guidance along with the curriculum materials produced by the QCA and the learning and development website for PSHE will further help schools in this area. Additionally, through the National Healthy School Standard and local programmes support is given to schools in meeting national criteria in drug education.

Through schools' pastoral support systems, pupils vulnerable to drug misuse should be identified to ensure that those who need extra help either receive it in school or through access to external specialist help. Connexions advisers, which all young people should have access to, also play an important role in identifying and addressing pupils' needs.

Electronic Registration (Secondary Schools)

Jim Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his answer of 4 February, Official Report, column 188W, what benefits were envisaged when the tender process was undertaken; whether this benefit was lost by its discontinuance; whether the cessation of the tender was in accordance with EC regulations covering these matters; how many suppliers were short-listed; how many of these were unable to accept the terms and conditions and if he will name them; how many were able to accept the terms and conditions and if he will name them; what principal reason was given for being unable to meet the terms and conditions; whether issues relating to patents were cited; whether the short-listed suppliers were informed of the reasons for the discontinuance; and what ratification procedure will be used to assess applications from schools. [99110]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The tendering process was aimed at reducing burdens on schools through establishing framework contracts with a range of suitable suppliers of electronic registration solutions to offerschools choice and a simple way of contracting with their preferred supplier. The decision to abandon the procurement exercise was taken because too few of the short-listed suppliers could meet the terms and conditions of the framework contracts, thus severely restricting the choice for schools. Information about these contracts and short-listed suppliers is commercially confidential.

Tendering was stopped in accordance with all appropriate regulations and the schools included in the electronic registration project are now free to buy systems on the open market subject to ratification by the Department. Guidance on purchasing systems has been made available to schools and this, together with information on the process for the approval of systems is available to view on the TeacherNet website:http://www.teachernet.gov.uk/Management/tools/ict/IMS/Electronic_Registration/

Graduate Tax

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will publish his costings that underlie his estimate that the administration costs for a graduate tax would be in the region of £1 billion. [96671]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The estimate of up to £1 billion was not for administration costs, but for the additional upfront cash costs of implementing a graduate tax over and above the cost of variable fees and loans, as proposed in the White Paper "The future of higher education". The costs of a graduate tax system are greater for several reasons:

The graduate tax would need to support both maintenance and tuition costs, and the upfront costs of non-means tested maintenance grants for all, to be funded by the tax, are considerably more than the cash costs of means-tested loans;

Under a graduate tax there is no possible mechanism for early additional repayments. With our existing loans, graduates are making additional repayments to clear their debts faster, and this reduces Government's costs. In addition, some students may choose not to take out a loan, but to pay up-front, which also reduces costs; and

The rate of repayment is slower for a graduate tax than for loans, and so it takes longer for the Government to reach 'break even' point.

Higher Education

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his statement of 22 January, Official Report, column 303, on higher education, what the evidential basis was for his description of universities having offered great research accompanied by shoddy teaching; and to which courses at which universities he was referring. [93943]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I was highlighting the new measures announced in "The Future for Higher Education" which are aimed at ensuring that teaching is of a universally high standard. These new arrangements will mean that reputation for research excellence will no longer be assumed to be a proxy for high quality teaching. Concerns about the quality of teaching were raised by students with Ministers during their visits to universities, and reflected in some reports by the Quality Assurance Agency for Higher Education. The White Paper on Higher Education also identified a number of shortcomings in the way that University teaching was recognised, supported and awarded.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to the answer by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien), of 6 February 2003, Official Report, column 396W, on higher education, what research the Department for Education and Skills commissioned to conclude that the proposals included in the White Paper would have a positive impact on the economy; and if he will publish the research. [99128]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We are confident that the proposals in the White Paper will have a positive benefit on the economy and more widely on the quality of life. The proposals were informed by a range of research that has been published by the Department, by academics and by other organisations including:

other Government Departments including the Department for Trade and Industry (DTI),

the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE),

the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD),

Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS),

Universities UK,

Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI); and the Institute for Fiscal Studies (IPS).

In many cases, references to the underpinning research are made in footnotes to the White Paper; and the research itself can be found in these organisations' publicly available websites. The Department's own research publications are at http://www.dfes.gov.uk/research/and http://www.skillsbase.dfes.gov.uk.

Higher Education

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many people entered higher education from (a) Lancashire and (b) the North West of England in 1997 and each subsequent year. [94131]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The latest available information is shown in the table.

Accepted applicants to full-time and sandwich undergraduate courses by area of home residence[1]

Students from:	Year of entry 1997	1998	1999	2000	2001	2002
Lancashire	7,750	6,266	6,660	6,314	6,670	6,792
Blackburn with Darwen	[2]—	591	802	847	801	869
Blackpool	[2]—	502	554	566	616	574
The North West[3]	26,385	26,291	27,253	27,081	28,332	29,144

[1] As a result of local government reorganisation, Blackburn with Darwen and Blackpool which were previously part of Lancashire, became separate LEAs in 1998.

[2] Not applicable.

[3] Includes Lancashire Blackburn, Blackpool, Cheshire, Warrington, Halton, Cumbria and Greater Manchester.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of the planned increase in higher education funding is (a) tied to particular schemes and (b) for specified purposes. [98505]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The table on page 19 of the White Paper "The future of higher education" (Cm 5735) includes details of higher education funding in England from 2002–03 to 2005–06.

Based on that table, the analysis in the following table shows how each of the spending categories contributes to the total increase of funding between 2002–03 and 2005–06 of £2.3 billion.

£ million

	2002–03	2005–06	Increase of 2005–06 over 2002–03	% of total increase in funding
Research	1,910	2,633	723	31
Knowledge transfer	62	114	52	2
Teaching and learning, of which:	3,943	4,963	1,020	44
Centres of Teaching Excellence	0	35	35	2
Expansion[1]	—	32	32	1
Access and widening participation	86	132	46	2
Management, Leadership and strategic development	15	34	19	1
Student support	1,578	1,996	418	18
Other	2	14	12	1
Total	7,596	9,918	2,322	100

[1] Foundation degree development and incentives

As shown in the table above, the funding allocated to 'teaching and learning' will increase by £1,020 million between 2002–03 and 2005–06. Of that increase, £287 million will be for capital and £733 million for recurrent expenditure, made up of funding to cover increased costs and the anticipated increase in student numbers. The recurrent increase also includes additional funding for human resources and pay differentiation for those who teach well (which will be consolidated into all institutions' block grants and allocated by formula once they develop satisfactory human resources strategies) and Centres of Teaching Excellence. The funding allocated for the Centres of Teaching Excellence, and other smaller initiatives that will not be allocated to all institutions by formula, will make up around 6 per cent. of the total recurrent increase in teaching and learning.

IT Contracts

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list IT contracts in his Department and its predecessors above £50 million in each of the last 10 years; what the inception date for each system was; when it became fully functional; when it became fully debugged; and what the cost of over-runs has been. [98995]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We have no IT contracts in my Department or its predecessors for systems costing £50 million or more in the last ten years.

IT Staff (Higher Education)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what studies he has carried out into the shortage of IT staff in higher education since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [98693]

Mr. Charles Clarke: No such studies have been made by the Government itself; but the Universities and Colleges Employers Association has undertaken surveys of university staff in general. The findings indicate recruitment and retention is an issue in certain disciplines only, including some aspects of information technology. In 2000, the Government announced funding of £50 million, £110 million and £170 million in England for the years 2001–02 to 2003–04 to underpin human resource strategies in each higher education institution to address recruitment and retention among other things. The Government have recently announced further funding of £50 million in 2004–05 and £117 million in 2005–06 for the same purpose.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many IT teaching posts in higher education were unfilled in each year since 1997. [98694]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information is not held centrally. Individual universities and higher education colleges, as employers, are responsible for monitoring their own vacancies.

IT Teaching (Core Curriculum)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills why IT is no longer part of the core curriculum; and if he will make a statement. [98696]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information and Communication Technology (ICT) is currently a National Curriculum foundation subject at all four key stages of compulsory education. The 14–19 strategy document "14–19: opportunity and excellence", published on 21 January 2003, confirmed that ICT will remain compulsory during Key Stage 4, recognising the importance that ICT plays in preparing young people to participate in a rapidly changing world in which work and other activities are increasingly dependent on access to, and skilful use of, technology.

We expect that, in time, pupils will increasingly develop their ICT skills through other subjects and ICT may no longer need to be discretely specified as a statutory required National Curriculum subject.

Maintenance Grants

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills at what level maintenance grants will be introduced for university students from households where the income is between £10,000 and £20,000; and what criteria will be used to assess eligibility. [98447]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The level of grant available for students from households with income between £10,000 and 20,000 will depend on the threshold below which the full grant will be paid. I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham Selly Oak (Mrs. Lynne Jones) on 6 February 2003, Official Report, column 359W. Precise details on the eligibility criteria will be announced in due course.

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of medical students are from families whose family income is (a) less than £10,000, (b) £10,000 to £15,000, (c) £15,001 to £20,000 and (d) over £20,001, using the definition of income that he proposes to use in assessing eligibility for a maintenance grant. [98316]

Margaret Hodge: My Department collects data from Local Education Authorities on the assessed contributions by students to fees, grants and loans for all students eligible to apply for student support. This includes medical students. The latest data are for 2000/1 and relates to the definition of residual income[1] that applied in that year. It is not possible to estimate the income[1] distribution of medical students (adjusted to account for changes in definition proposed for the new maintenance grant) separately from this survey because separate data by course subject are not collected.

In respect of estimates of residual incomes under the proposed definition for maintenance grant for all students, I refer to my reply to the hon. Friend's previous question.

[1] Residual Income is gross income less the allowances detailed in my Department's guidance, "Financial Support for Higher Education Students".

National Curriculum Alternatives

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what steps he is taking to increase the flexibility of Section 96 of the Learning and Skills Act 2000 to take account of the needs of further education colleges who are working in partnership with local schools to provide alternatives to the National Curriculum; and if he will make a statement. [98980]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Any external qualification which meets the published principles for approval can be approved under Section 96 of the Learning and Skills Act 2000. The qualifications are approved for specific age groups; pre-16; 16–18 or over 18 but under 19. Approvals are independent of delivery arrangements.
